There are held here many "confidential weddings," as they are called when the ceremony is kept unusually quiet. But sometimes they are too confidential to please the relatives of the parties. The coercion of prospective brides under such circumstances is a proceeding well authenticated in fact and fiction. A kidnaped bridegroom, however, is unusual, though he happened at St. George's not long ago. He was a gentleman of position, and he wished to marry a lady who had nursed him through an illness. There was no cause or just impediment save social rank. The gentleman was determined, and the lady seconded his plans admirably. But the day and the details leaked out, and before the time fixed the bridegroom's male relatives deployed strategically through Maddox street and surrounded the church. He drove up in a hansom cab. With his eyes fixed on the expectant bride, he prepared to alight. An athletic uncle and a brother sprang forward, thrust him back, with a "Glad to meet you, old fellow" manner that deceived the cabman, who obeyed the quick direction he heard and drove the three away. The lady, with tears in her eyes, went into the vestry. "There will be no wedding," she said. "They've run away with him." And that was the last St. George's heard of them.

Forests' Unnatural Death.

The life of nearly all forests is cut short by fire or by the hand of the lumberman. When a spruce forest is entirely destroyed by fire young spruces do not at once spring up and cover the burned area. The seed bearing cones have been burned, and the spores and seeds of other plants which are readily carried by the wind find their way in first. The task of preparing for the forest is begun again, but this time it is to be a shorter one. The first year after the fire mosses and often tiny flowering plants appear. These are replaced by the fireweed and other flowers whose seeds are provided with hairs so that they reach such places quickly. These are soon joined by raspberries, roses and other bushes. Among these the young seedlings of aspens appear in a very few years. The latter grow rapidly and in a score of years form a low sunny forest. An aspen forest makes a brilliant contrast with the dark green forests of spruce.—St. Nicholas.

On the Veldt

By FRANK H. SWEET

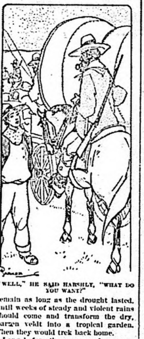
Copyright, 1906, by M. M. Cunningham

It was the dry season on the veldt, and the grass was burned down and half covered with yellow dust. Not a kraal was to be seen or a habitation, not a tree or shrub so far as the eye could reach—only the ocher brown earth stretching away and at last ending in the same level sky lines to the north and south and east and west, and crossing the sun blistered waste one little animate dot, the canvas covered wagon of a Boer family trekking with the sheep and cattle in search of a water course that had not dried up.

For three days had the dot been moving across the waterless waste, and for three days had the sun left the thirsty sky line in the east only to glare down pitilessly until it dropped behind the equally thirsty sky line in the west, and now the tongues of the cattle were hanging from their mouths and the sheep bleated piteously, and the small quantity of water brought along for the trekkers' own use was exhausted.

By the end of the second day they had expected to find water, but the stream counted on had proved but a dusty, sun dried depression, and for twenty-four hours they had followed its course, hoping to find some sink hole from which the water had not dried. Now they were pondering the necessity of seeking the next water course yet another twenty-four hours away. If that were dry also, what then?

Other families had trekked over this veldt before them, and more would follow, for this was the annual custom. When the dry season came and burned every vestige of green from the home grazing land, the Boers would load their families into the great wagons, drawn by many spans of oxen, and, driving the sheep and cattle before them, seek the water courses that had not dried up. And there they would remain as long as the drought lasted, until weeks of steady and violent rains should come and transform the dry, barren veldt into a tropical garden. Then they would trek back home.



"WELL," HE SAID HARSHLY, "WHAT DO YOU WANT?"

Long before the sun rose for a new day of burning heat and thirst the dot of wagons and animals was ready for departure. But even as it began to crawl away from the river bed that was dry toward the one that might contain water, several of the mounted Boers who were circling about the cattle "descried something" less than a third of a mile away.

In the dim light they at first thought it a wild animal, and examined their rifles; then, as the object drew near, they made it out to be a man, and that he was on foot instead of horseback. But it was not until he had approached to within a few rods that they discovered he was very young, scarcely more than a boy, and that he was an outlander.

Now there is nothing more obnoxious to a Boer than an outlander or witlander—alien. He feels that their coming into the country threatens his institutions, and that the very object of their coming is wrong. The treasures of the earth belong to the earth, and should not be wrested away. The bustle and desire for change, for wealth, for investigating, even the progressive ideas of these outsiders are causes for suspicion and dislike. So when a cherry "Hello!" came from the wayfarer their answer was but a gruff and unintelligible grunt.

All this time the train was moving forward, but slowly, for oxen are plodding travelers. The boy was obliged to pause for the animals to pass, and he watched the long, straggling line with the interest of a newcomer. After the cattle and sheep and their guard came the creaking, unwieldy wagons, with their inspanned oxen. Beside the first of these wagons rode a large, broad faced man whose white hair and air of authority proclaimed him the head of the family. As he came opposite the boy stepped forward.

"Hello," he called again cheerfully.

The man looked down at him, his face hardening, but he stopped.

"Well," he said harshly, "what do you want? Isn't it a little strange for a boy to be crossing the veldt without a horse?"

"Oh, I don't know," the boy answered carelessly. "I walked up from the coast three months ago. You see, I didn't have money enough for a horse and a good outfit, and I needed the outfit most. Besides, I was raised on a farm and am used to walking. A man I met carried my outfit to the mines, and I pegged on behind."

"And now you are going back home empty handed?" the Boer asked, sarcastically.

"No, indeed," quickly. "I didn't come here for fun. I'm going to college some time, and that takes money; and I've got half a dozen brothers and sisters who are planning for different things. It was easiest for me to leave, so all of them put in their savings toward my expenses. Of course I don't expect to get rich," frankly, "but I shall work hard to take back enough to get us all a good start."

The Boer grunted.

"Why are you going back, then, without your outfit?" he demanded.

"Got to have something to eat," the boy answered easily. "I went to the mines first, but the only opening was to work for somebody else or to buy a claim at a fabulous price, so I shouldered my outfit and struck off prospecting. I kept it up three weeks, and now," his eyes flashing eagerly into the grim ones above him, "I believe I've found a spot that will turn me in a lot of money. But I'm out of provisions and must go back after a supply. I don't suppose you have any you would sell?"

"No," shortly, "but where's your outfit?"

"Oh, I've concealed that in the sand. I guess it'll be all right. Anyway, there was nothing else to do. But I didn't stop you to talk about myself," coloring a little. "I wanted to say that your cattle are awful thirsty. At home we would drop everything to furnish such cattle with water quick."

The Boer's face relaxed somewhat.

"Even if there was no water between four days' journey?" he asked contemptuously. "You uitlanders, who would do all things, can make rivers as you need them, I suppose?"

"There is the water course only one day's journey behind you," the boy retorted, "and your cattle show they were not attended to there. No matter the hurry a man may be in, it is a crime to neglect beasts as you have yours."

"The water course behind was dry, as this is, and as the next one may be," the Boer said. "My teams have not had water in three days, and God knows what may happen if the next river bed is like this one and the last."

The boy's face paled suddenly.

"The river dry," he gasped. "Why, I counted on getting water there. I've only just enough with me to last one day." Then he forgot himself in concern for the cattle.

"You must turn back toward the place I've found," he cried authoritatively; "it's only five or six miles away. There's a hole in the river bed that has water, and it's thirty yards or more across and several feet deep. It will be enough to supply your herds for some weeks. And beyond it are three or four miles of good grazing where the soil has not yet became dry. If you keep on this course the cattle will all perish."

The Boer had straightened up, preparatory to riding on, but at this he turned sharply.

"Water," he cried, "and plenty of it." He raised his hand to his mouth and called to the men in front. One of them rode back. To him he gave a quick, peremptory order. Then he turned back to the boy.

"Do you understand what you have done?" he demanded. "This place you have discovered will need water to work it, and if we use that, as we doubtless shall, you will lose all the benefit of your discovery for this season."

The boy threw back his head as though to ward off the insinuation.

"The cattle need the water more than the land," he returned. "If the water is gone when I return with the provisions, I can go and prospect somewhere else, and perhaps come back after the rains set in. The folks at home would not want me to put by money at the expense of suffering."

The Boer leaned down and held out his hand.

"It is well," he said simply. "You will go back to the basin with us. We do not sell provisions, but we have plenty which we will give you. And it may be," with a friendly twinkle banishing the last trace of hardness from his eyes, "that we will be able to advance the success of your object here."

"Chamois" Skins.

Charles C. Druedling has written an article in the Journal of Pharmacy on chamois skins. The commercial article of that name, he says, is really oil tanned sheep or lamb skin lining. The supply of skins from the chamois animal is very limited. Enough could not be obtained in a year to supply the United States for more than a single day. He made special inquiry on a visit to Switzerland about the annual crop of the chamois skins and ascertained that from 5,000 to 6,000 skins would be a fair average yearly crop. This skin is heavier than the skin of the sheep or lamb, also much coarser. For strength and durability the chamois skin is preferable, but for ordinary use and appearance the oil tanned sheepskin lining would in most instances be preferred.

A FAMOUS OLD HYMN.

Pathetic Origin of "Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

A pathetic and yet charming story is told of the origin of the well known hymn, "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," which was written by Rev. John Fawcett, an English Baptist, who died in 1817, having spent nearly sixty years in the ministry.

It was in 1772, after a few years spent in pastoral work, that he was called to London to succeed the Rev. Dr. Gill. His farewell sermon had been preached near Moinsgate, in Yorkshire. Six or seven wagons stood loaded with his furniture and books, and all was ready for departure.

But his loving people were heartbroken. Men, women and children gathered and clung about him and his family with sad and tearful faces. Finally, overwhelmed with the sorrow of those they were leaving, Dr. Fawcett and his wife sat down on one of the packing cases and gave way to grief.

"Oh, John," cried Mrs. Fawcett at last, "I cannot bear this! I know not how to go."

"Nor I either," returned her husband, "and we will not go. The wagons shall be unloaded and everything put in its old place."

His people were filled with intense joy and gratitude at this determination. Dr. Fawcett at once sent a letter to London explaining the case and then resolutely returned to his work on a salary of less than $200 a year.

This hymn was written by Dr. Fawcett to commemorate the event.

FASTING FADS.

They Should Find No Favor With Nervous, Anaemic People.

It is said by some physicians that a good deal of the insomnia, extreme thinness and general debility from which Americans suffer is due to the various fasting fads. Here a man goes without breakfast, there a woman makes a point of going hungry to bed. Another systematically omits a meal at noonday, and so it goes. Where people are constitutionally below par and in a position where they can only hope to maintain a fair degree of efficiency by keeping up their vitality such "stunts" are of questionable virtue. Sturdy, full blooded people, with iron nerves and digestions that can negotiate nails, may try starving themselves with impunity perhaps. Thin, anaemic, nervous people, on the other hand, generally need all the food they can eat and all the blood they can make. If such people would eat before going to bed they would generally see an increase in vigor, for the reason that while the wear and tear of the body were suspended digestion and assimilation would still be going on. In other words, the body would be making more tissue than it destroyed; hence an increase in blood, in weight and in health. At least that's the way one physician explained things to a woman of the pale, thin type who applied to him "all run down."

A Humming Bird's Umbrella.

In front of a window where I worked one summer was a butternut tree. A humming bird built her nest on a limb that grew near the window, and we had an opportunity to watch her closely—in fact, we could look right into the nest. One day when there was a heavy shower coming up we thought we would see if she covered her young during the rain. Well, when the first drops fell, she came and took in her bill one of two or three large leaves growing close by and laid this leaf over the nest so as to completely cover it. Then she flew away. On examining the leaf we found a hole in it, and in the side of the nest was a small stick that the leaf was fastened to or hooked upon. After the storm was over the old bird came back and unhooked the leaf, and the nest was perfectly dry.—Exchange.

The Lost Golf Ball.

"Once in Scotland," said a professional golf player, "I saw a lost ball cause a great commotion. Over there, you know, a lost ball means a lost hole. Two professionals were playing, and one of them lost a ball in the tall grass. He searched for it a long time. Nearly half an hour passed. His opponent kept urging him to admit that the ball was lost and to forego a hole, but this the other refused to do. And finally, with a triumphant laugh, he pounced down, fumbled in the weeds and rose with a ball in his hand.

"'Here's my ball. I've found my ball,' he shouted.

"'Yer a liar,' said the other professional, 'for I've got it here in my pocket.'"

Rather Rough.

Above the stairway there flickered a candle, and then a deep voice called from the shadows:

"Katherine, Katherine, who is that sandpapering the wall this hour of the night?"

A long stillness and then:

"No one down here, father, dear. I guess it must be next door."

The candle vanished and then from the gloom of the parlor:

"George, you big goose, I told you never to call on me unless you had been shaved!"

After the Fall.

"I always pitied Adam and Eve for being driven out of Eden in such insufficient clothing, just as winter was beginning."

"How do you know it was winter?"

"Why, it was just after the fall, wasn't it?"

OBESITY A DISEASE.

It Is Not, as a Rule, the Result of Laziness or Gluttony.

It is a mistake and an injustice to many abstemious folk to assume that all fat persons are gluttons or large eaters. Very many excessively corpulent people, especially women, are small eaters, while some of the most doughty trenchermen are gaunt and thin.

It is not the quantity so much as the quality of the food one eats which determines the putting on of flesh. Yet it is not always the kind of food that makes the obese, for some stout people eat very sparingly of sugars and starches, while there are large consumers of sweets who never put on flesh. In such cases it is a question of constitution, often of heredity, and not at all, or very little, one of diet.

Another prevalent error in regard to fat people is that they are inert or lazy and never exercise. Of course exercise does increase the processes of nutrition and so leads to the burning up of superfluous fat, but at the same time it causes an increase in the appetite and thus tempts to the consumption of a greater quantity of food. So one thing balances the other, and want of exercise alone is not a very potent cause of obesity. Many very fat persons are, it is true, sluggish, but they have become so since putting on their flesh, for it makes a great difference whether one carries 150 pounds about when one walks or whether it is necessary to propel half as much again or even double the weight. It is a tremendous handicap, and there is small wonder that the lightweights do the most exercising.

Obesity, indeed, is usually a disease and not merely the result of laziness or gluttony. Its cause lies deep down in the animal economy, in among those mysterious chemical changes by which the food we take into the mouth is converted into blood and bones and muscles, skin, hair and brain cells. It can often be warded off by a proper diet and mode of living, especially if taken in hand from the very first and not allowed to get the upper hand, but the tendency to stoutness will generally persist through life and can only be modified, but never removed.

Any treatment for the radical removal of flesh should be carried out under the advice of a physician, as violent measures directed to this end may be productive of terrible harm to the constitution.

POINTED PARAGRAPHS.

The only way some people know is their way.

Hospitality is often nothing more than loneliness.

A secret is never safe after some one knows you have it.

If you are naturally rude it's pretty hard to disguise the fact.

Are you so conceited that you believe people never talk behind your back?

The trouble is some pushers are as liable to push on the wrong side as on the right.

Watch your side issues. Don't give them so much attention as to ruin your main issue, which makes you a living.

Don't be mad if you are interrupted when you are talking. It may have prevented you from saying something foolish.

Why They Got No Mail.

An official of the postoffice department at Washington tells of a new postoffice that was established in a certain small town. A native of the place, the proprietor of a grocery, was installed as postmaster. It was not very long before complaints were filed with the department that no mail was being forwarded from the new office, so an inspector was detailed to investigate the matter. When he called upon the postmaster and asked why no mail had been sent out, the former pointed to a large mail bag hanging up in a corner and said:

"The mail's in that bag. I ain't sent it out yet because the bag ain't nowheres nigh full."

Beit's Generosity.

One of the many persons whom Alfred Beit, the diamond multimillionaire, had befriended repaid him with ingratitude and abuse. Later the ingrate fell on evil times. Though down in the gutter, he still had a little shame left and would not ask Mr. Beit for help. The South African diamond magnate sent for one of the unlucky one's friends and said: "Go and see So-and-so. Ask if he wants any help and give it to him, but don't let him think it is from me. I have had a difference with him, and perhaps it would annoy him."

Politics.

"Mornin', congressman. I"—

"Well, it's old Jim Smith. Jim, how are you? Have a cigar, Jim."

"Thought I'd come around to tell you that I'd moved out of your district, but"—

"Indeed, Mr. Smith."

"You see, I wanted to find out if"—

"Yes, Smith."

"If you could use your influence to"—

"Sorry, my man, but I can't stop. Good morning."

She Suspected It.

"Why, Mrs. Parvenu, this is unmistakably an old master," said the enthusiastic caller.

"That's just what I told John. I'll send it back to have it repainted and a new frame put on."

The Eyes of Man

And the brain centres that do their work were built up for, and originally adapted to, out-door use, and when they are required to do near work constantly, then a strain takes place deep in the middle of the brain to sustain the near focus and convergence of the eyes, and this strain continued, produces nervous breakdown, in many cases wrecking the health. A noted specialist says: "People living in bright and sunny countries are irritable and have nervous temperaments due to strong light, persons living in foggy countries, have calm, quiet nervous systems, many physicians advise their patients to go to foggy climates for rest and recuperation," but this is not necessary if such will wear the "Prentice glasses," as THEY will have the same effect; we have had many proofs of this of late in our own experience. Splendid Banquet At the Quinte Last Night.

Large Attendance and Tempting Spread in Honor Of a Distinguished Visitor and the Recently-Returned Delegates to the London Congress of Chambers of Commerce--Bright and Witty Speeches and Enjoyable Musical Numbers.

"Many Toasts, and Neatly Buttered."

The above line, which appeared on the menu card, aptly describes one phase of the banquet which took place at Hotel Quinte last night—and this morning—for (tell it not in Gath) it was 2.20 when the festive banquetters wended their way homeward, after taking part in what may truly be described as one of the most—if not the most—enjoyable banquets ever held under the Quinte's hospitable roof. To say that it was a success is—to use a trite phrase—putting it mildly. The attendance was large and very representative, and the spread provided by the skilled culinary artists of the Quinte was tempting to the last degree. The Quinte's chef fairly outdid himself last night. It was a magnificent feast, splendidly served. The banquet was in honor of Mr. F. B. Girdlestone, of Bristol, Eng., and Messrs. Graham, Ponton, Johnson and Reid, the latter gentlemen, as everyone knows, having represented Belleville at the recent Congress of Chambers of Commerce in London. That the guests of honor had reason to be proud of the many appreciative things said of them—and that they were proud—can safely be assumed. It was well-nigh an impromptu affair, for there was but forty-eight hours to make all the arrangements, but in this case, as in many others, the outcome proved that things gotten up on the spur of the moment turn out to be the best. At any rate, no one could cavil at any of the arrangements of last evening. The speeches were bright, witty and very much to the point, the musical features pleasing to a superlative degree, and the audience in the jovial, receptive and appreciative mood which goes so far towards making occasions of that kind joyous. And the audience was not by any means fed on chaff, for, mind you, wit and wisdom walked hand in hand. No one wore the motley, but everyone was ready with some mot or quip, which added to the stock of knowledge or gayety of those who did the listening. Mr. W. B. Northrup, M.P., was the chairman, and that bright and talented gentleman was surely in his element. Apt anecdote and merry metaphor fairly oozed out of him. It is to be hoped that the wish of many of those present may be gratified, namely, that other banquets of the same character may follow the one which was so highly successful last night.

It was nearly 10 o'clock when the guests filed in to dinner, and a glance round the tables showed the following gentlemen in attendance:

Rev. J. P. Wilson, B.A., asked the blessing.

At the conclusion of the more serious matters of the evening, after the wants of the inner man had been supplied by the fair and deft waitresses, the chairman rose, and, in glowing words, in which he referred to the spotless life and many virtues of the late Queen Victoria, and the inherited wisdom of her noble son, proposed the first toast, which was received with the loyal enthusiasm which Bellevillians always exhibit. "God Save the King" made the rafters ring.

"THE KING."

The chairman read several letters of regret, among them being one from the President of the Delaware and Lackawanna railroad, who, with a party of officials, is at present in the city, and was invited to the banquet; also from Mr. E. W. Rathbun, M.P.P.

The next toast was

"CANADA."

In proposing this toast the chairman showed all the silver-tongued eloquence which has given him national fame. He dwelt on the grand resources of Canada, her vast lakes, mountains and plains, her mineral wealth and rolling prairies, where the grain to make the bread of the Empire will some day be grown. Mr. Northrup had a grand subject, and hardly a man in Canada could have handled it better. Very few, indeed, have the historical knowledge which would enable them to treat the subject in the way Mr. Northrup did.

EX-MAYOR JOHNSON.

In replying to the toast of "Canada," Ex-Mayor Johnson, who was very heartily received, as one of the returned delegates, thanked the audience for their warm welcome. The banquet showed that the Belleville Board of Trade was very much alive. He was glad to see so many representative men present, especially those representing our new banking institutions. He also noticed Mr. Culverwell among the guests. Messrs. Elliott and Culverwell represented two things Belleville needed—money and power. He also welcomed the gentlemen who were connected with the rolling mills (cheers), and he rejoiced to see that that institution was now on a permanent basis. Speaking to the toast, Mr. Johnson said now was Canada's day. He had just returned from a visit to the British Isles, and said that Canadians should be proud of the races from which they sprung. Mr. Johnson waxed enthusiastic over the C. P.R. steamer on which he travelled, and praised it as the property of a grand corporation, the stock of which, once quoted at 40, was now selling at 180. (Cheers.) All this had happened in 25 years, and there was the same record all over Canada. What caused it? The National Policy, he believed. He was glad to see that the Government's policy to-day was still Canada for Canadians. Twenty-five years ago Canadians were flocking to the United States, and Canada had given the U. S. many great men, among them Jim Hill and Principal Sheridan, of Cornell University. They had raised the status of Canadians in that country. And in return we had gotten many great men from them, among others Mr. Hays, of the Grand Trunk, and Sir William Van Horne, of the C.P.R. Outside capital was now coming to Canada as a result of the foundation laid by the National Policy. All capital was welcome here, and the speaker told Mr. Girdlestone of the deep and abiding love Canadians had for British institutions. Speaking of the visit to the Chambers of Commerce, Mr. Johnson paid a high compliment to Messrs. Graham and Ponton for the part they took there. He dealt with the British preference in a practical way, and speaking of the case of Newfoundland, which now complained that her rights had been sacrificed, said he did not think that, had Newfoundland been larger and better able to take care of herself, she would have been so treated. The only way Newfoundland could get her grievances redressed was to join the Canadian confederation. Her interests would be as safe in Canada's hands, whether Canada was ruled by Laurier or Borden, as they would be in the hands of Churchill or Lord Elgin. Mr. Johnson struck a happy note when he recalled the fact that, 400 years ago Sebastian Cabot and his son sailed from the port of Bristol and landed in Canada, and to-night we had a gentleman from Bristol among us (cheers), who was here to try to better conditions making for trade between Canada and the Mother Country. The port of Montreal, the speaker believed, should be a national port. Again thanking the Board of Trade for the warm welcome tendered his fellow-delegates and himself, Mr. Johnson closed a happy speech amid applause.

Mr. J. Vincent Doyle sang, in excellent style, "Pretty Nancy."

"THE TRADE OF THE EMPIRE."

Mr. Girdlestone arose to reply to this toast, and was given a splendid reception, with musical honors. He felt, he said, a feeling of diffidence, for the toast was fraught with matters of deep importance, and his cordial welcome filled him with deep emotion. He had travelled over a very large portion of the British Empire, and this was his third visit to Canada and the United States in the interest of the port of Bristol. The speaker told of how, in early life, he commenced service with the famous East India Company, and described feelingly what British rule had done for India, with her 300 millions of people, who, under the beneficent rule of Britain, were now living in peace and quietness. It was one of the most mighty portions of the Empire, and there was no better example of good government in the world. (Cheers.) The Civil Service of India, and the self-sacrificing work of the men in it had made that country what it is to-day, the brightest jewel in the British Empire. Mr. Girdlestone then spoke enthusiastically of the C.P.R. steamer Empress of Ireland, on which he came to this country, and said that no stronger link to bind Canada to Britain had been forged than the magnificent C.P.R. steamers. The object he had in coming to Canada this time was to try to establish better communications between this country and Bristol, a city of 400,000 inhabitants, which, up to 10 years ago, had spent $15,000,000 in bettering her docks, and which was now about to spend fifteen millions more, which action was made necessary by the fact that larger ships were being built. At the Royal Edward dock, now in course of construction at Bristol, vessels over 900 feet long and 100 feet beam could be docked. This was being done because Bristol people were looking to Canadian trade. Why, Mr. Girdlestone asked, if Bristol, a city of 400,000, could afford to spend thirty millions on her docks, could not the Government of Canada spend some of its rapidly growing revenue in providing docks like those of Bristol? The trade of Canada depends on those big ships he spoke of, and he thought it was time the Canadian Government faced conditions as they were. He thought that, in the future, cargo and passenger ships would be distinct, and that the latter would attain great speed. He hoped that Belleville people would do all in their power to bring about the improvement he had told them was needed. Their cheese and cattle would be handled better when that was done. Speaking of conditions in Canada, Mr. Girdlestone said he had visited Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Belleville, and was absolutely astounded at the progress made in Canada since he was here four years ago. There were signs of progress on all sides, and he felt convinced that there was a great future for this Dominion. Many things impressed him. Among others the healthiness of the people, their size, enterprise and quick thinking; those, he thought were the most important features of the people of this country, which, he felt sure, had a great destiny. But more vigor and energy was needed in regard to national docks. In closing, Mr. Girdlestone waxed eloquent on the subject of Canadian patriotism, and said he was sure that a country which had given the Empire a Dunn, who took part in the great Balaklava ride, or a Bruce Carruthers (cheers) would be animated in the future by the glorious spirit which had guided her in the past. In conclusion he again thanked them for their splendid welcome and reception, and hoped and believed Canada, with her wonderful resources and people, would go on and prosper. Warm applause followed Mr. Girdlestone to his seat.

A quartette composed of Messrs. S. R. Burrows, J. V. Doyle, H. Wrightmeyer and Taylor sang, very melodiously, some topical selections, and were exceedingly well received.

The next toast was:

"BELLEVILLE DELEGATES TO THE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE."

which was proposed by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who received a very warm reception. He said he had extreme pleasure in proposing health, long life and prosperity to the delegates, who had made a mark for themselves over in London. Those of us who had read their speeches had been filled with pride and admiration. The delegates had proven themselves to be clever men and brainy men, but it should cause us no wonder when we reflected on their origin, for they were descended from races which had always made their mark. They were—if he might use the term—half-breeds—at least three of them were. Mr. Graham was a mixture of Scotch and Dutch; Mr. Ponton a mixture of Scotch and Irish; Mr. Reid a mixture of Irish and English, while Mr. Johnson was an Irishman who had been improved by long residence in Canada (Laughter). No wonder the delegates commanded the admiration of the people of England when they rose to their feet to advocate better trade relations between Britain and her colonies. Col. Ponton's speech at Bristol, Sir Mackenzie said, would immortalize him. Canadians, the speaker said, desired to see better trade relations with Britain and he assured Mr. Girdlestone that the policy of both parties in Canada was to make the port of Montreal what that gentleman contended it should be — the national port of Canada. A Conservative Government assumed the

CHANCELLOR INACCURATE

Declares Mr. Wilson, K. C., Before Insurance Commission—Also They'll "Have to Get After Somebody."

Toronto, Oct. 12.—The story unfolded by Matthew Wilson, K. C., before the Insurance Commission yesterday, of the sale of the Union Trust Co. last June to himself, E. E. A. DuVernet, acting for English capitalists, and Messrs. Gurney and O'Grady, of the Crown Bank, was the distinct feature of the sitting.

Mr. Wilson, together with Mr. DuVernet, took $500,000 worth of stock in the new Trust Co. on the distinct understanding that this block was to be distributed among English capitalists at a profit of $25,000 to him.

A mysterious cheque given to Mr. Wilson, and the gift of $2,500 to him by Mr. DuVernet, was the subject of earnest examination by Mr. Shepley. Mr. Wilson could not remember who signed the cheque, and whether he had been given the $2,500 the same day as he endorsed the cheque.

Mr. Wilson had not yet put up any money for his stock, and does not know who is financing the game. He had been offered the managership of the company at $10,000 per annum, but did not want it and took the presidency at $5,000 salary with $2,500 extra that Mr. DuVernet was putting up out of his own pocket. Mr. Wilson was asked to produce the cheque and other documents.

Pope and Fowler Option.

Mr. Shepley, when the session opened, took up the Pope and Fowler option. Mr. Wilson explained that the syndicate first bought a one-half undivided interest, the other half to be financed by a syndicate composed of Pope and Fowler and some others. This would not work, for the other syndicate could not get together on certain points, with the result that the Foster syndicate took over the whole option. Mr. Wilson objected strenuously to assuming any more liability, but Mr. McGillivray suggested that the Union Trust Co. finance the whole business, and Mr. Foster said that if it was a good thing the Union Trust ought to get a chance to make some money out of it.

Commissioner Kent asked the witness if he thought when a trust company borrowed from a bank it would make any difference if a majority of the directors of the Trust Co. were also directors of the bank.

"If the transactions were above board and concurred in by the other directors it would make no difference," was the witness' answer.

The Chancellor Inaccurate.

Counsel dealt with Chancellor Boyd's version, that he was given to understand that the members of the syndicate, including Wilson, were putting up equal shares, and that the Union Trust Co. was only a partner.

Mr. Wilson said that Sir John Boyd's recollection was inaccurate. He had explained the transaction in full to him twice.

The land transactions were gone into briefly. Witness said that he was very much surprised that Pope and Fowler had retained 7,000 acres of the selected land, and that the Great West Land Co. had bought an additional 9,000 acres to make up the 200,000.

"I do not say that Mr. Fowler is a dishonest man, but he should have given up all the lands selected under the option. If that statement is correct we ought to have that 7,000 acres, and we will have to get after somebody and get them back," he said.

Mr. Shepley questioned Mr. Wilson further on the negotiations that resulted in the formation of the Great West Land Co. at the afternoon session.

Mr. Fowler Has Arrived.

At last George W. Fowler, M. P., (King's and Albert) has arrived. He reached the city last night from Winnipeg. No sooner had he registered at the hotel than Mr. Ross, secretary of the Insurance Commission, advanced and served him with a formidable legal document, which required him to appear and testify before the Insurance Commission this morning, and also to show cause why he should not be fined or imprisoned for contempt.

"Isn't it cheap?" was Mr. Fowler's comment.

Wife Is a Canadian Girl.

Kenosha, Wis., Oct. 12.—Mary Harriet Forrester, wife of E. L. Forrester, a contractor, who disappeared from her fine home in this city on Sept. 8, has been located at Cleveland, where she is working as a seamstress in an hotel. She would not make a statement in regard to her departure, and says she is satisfied. Forrester started for Cleveland Wednesday night, and will make an effort to get his wife to return with him and her children. Mrs. Forrester was formerly Mary Harriet Moore of Sudbury, Canada.

"T. P." in Ottawa.

Ottawa, Oct. 12.—T. P. O'Connor arrived here last evening accompanied by Mrs. O'Connor. Local Irishmen were out in force to welcome him. To-day Mr. O'Connor will address a public meeting. Another speaker will be Hon. Daniel O'Connor, formerly Postmaster-General for Australia.

THE MACHINE EXPOSED

Amazing Revelation by J. G. Pritchard, Ballot Switcher.

Worked With Liberal Party Organizers—Found Ballots to Be Used by Deputies for Switching—Taught D.R.O.'s How to Do the Trick—Once Paid by W. T. R. Preston, But Usually by O'Gorman—Scott's Evidence.

Toronto, Oct. 12.—It was a quarter to twelve yesterday before the London bribery case was resumed in the Police Court.

The defendants, George Hardy, John O'Gorman, W. J. Mulloy, Tom Wiley, and George Ardy, were on hand an hour earlier.

Widespread Conspiracy?

The first man in the box was J. G. Pritchard, a London contractor. He is secretary of the Plasterers' Section of the Builders' Exchange. He knew all the defendants except Mr. Wiley.

"Have you taken any part in elections matters with any of the defendants?"

Witness protested in vain over the scope of the question, and then proceeded to give Magistrate Denison an amazing story of campaign debauchery, covering West Elgin, North Hastings, Brockville, South Ontario and West Huron. The five defendants gave almost breathless attention to Pritchard's recital. John O'Gorman, who, with his brother, was declared to have been one of the chief actors in the story, was the least moved. George Reid, whose brother's name came into the narrative, grew red and purple as detail after detail was added to the chain.

Ballots Were Switched.

Pritchard swore that when an election would be coming on he and O'Gorman, Organizer Smith and Tom Lewis would confer at the Walker House or at O'Gorman's office, and as a result of arrangements then made, the ridings would be visited. It was Lewis' part to bribe and Pritchard's to switch ballots.

The witness swore that he got money from O'Gorman for his work and, in South Ontario he was paid forty dollars by W. T. R. Preston. He said that returning officers' deputies would be introduced to him and he would pick out the likely ones and train them. They would get usually five dollars for every ballot switched, but in West Huron the rates were wholesale. The switching was sometimes done simply by calling out the wrong name as the ballots were being counted. In other cases the deputy returning officer would have ballots ready, marked and initialed for the favored candidate.

Tricks of the Trade.

These would be substituted for ballots marked by Conservative voters. The real ballots would be then brought to O'Gorman as vouchers and the deputy returning officers paid accordingly. The witness always found a bundle of ballots in a convenient place.

Pritchard told of such tricks as kissing the thumb in taking the oath and having a piece of pencil lead under the finger nail for marking ballots.

He told of operations in West Elgin, South Ontario, Brockville, North Hastings and West Huron. He had Vance as his superior in Hastings. These things, he said, were done years ago. Four or five years ago he stopped electioneering.

One of the statements made by Pritchard was that the moneys paid in his operations were always in new Dominion notes.

Work of the Deputies.

Witness, during his evidence, said he had himself switched ballots as J. D. Johnson, D.R.O., West Elgin, and that the trained deputies switched from three to 23 ballots each.

Recalled at the close of the afternoon session, Pritchard made the flat statement that Lewis, after the West Elgin election, sought to get him to sign a false affidavit that he had not been at Brockville.

"I've had enough of politics for a thousand years," he said near the close of his examination.

$10 Envelopes Again.

A number of London voters told the familiar story of envelopes containing money being delivered through the agency of Jerry Collins or Serviss. In practically every case, the assurance was made by the witness that he would have voted Grit anyway. Several witnesses showed the effects of "bracers." These men were Joe Rusten, A. E. Fitch, Hugh Clark, Wm. McCausland, James Quimby, Charles Evans, James Smith, Frank Prior (who also received $5 for his vote at the provincial election), Wm. McAdam, A. McMurphy, James Ewen, and latter had held envelopes for two brothers named Gregory.

H. J. Lamoth, Clerk of the Chancery Court at Ottawa, testified that the bye-election ballots were destroyed in July, following the election month in conformity with the usual regulations.

Premier Scott Called.

Premier Scott of Saskatchewan, then called, explained that he had been in London for two weeks, leaving the day after the election. His examination yielded little beyond persistent denials that he knew of any campaign fund having been used in the election, and his equally firm refutation of the suggestion that he had been in the habit of holding conversation with O'Gorman and others. He did so in the face of DuVernet's intimation that he would produce witnesses who would testify otherwise. Premier Scott's manner was equable almost throughout. Only once or twice did he show slight asperity, when persistently queried on certain points.

Pritchard Again.

It was stated by the counsel for the examiners that the witnesses to be offered to-day had not been decided upon. It is probable, however, that Pritchard will again adorn the stand.

The understanding is that Premier Scott will again appear on Monday to hear the evidence of the witnesses alluded to by Mr. DuVernet. Hon. Mr. Hyman is also expected to give evidence on Monday.

E. F. B. Johnston has been retained for the defence in the conspiracy case, and will be on hand to-day.

DISQUALIFIED FOR SEVEN YEARS

Supreme Court Dismisses Mr. Dan Gallery's Appeal With Costs.

Ottawa, Oct. 12.—The Supreme Court yesterday gave judgment in the St. Anne's case in dismissing the appeal of Mr. Dan Gallery, ex-M. P. for St. Anne's Division of Montreal, against the judgment of the court below. This confirms the disqualification of Gallery for seven years from sitting in the Dominion Parliament, or holding any office in connection therewith. The statute does not disqualify as far as provincial or municipal affairs.

When the Supreme Court met, Chief Justice Fitzpatrick said that the judgment of the court was that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Adverse to Modus Vivendi.

St. John's, Nfld., Oct. 12.—The Cabinet met last night to consider the advisability of a policy of protest against the modus vivendi between the British and American Governments relative to the Newfoundland fisheries. Leading fish merchants also met and adopted resolutions adverse to the modus vivendi. The organ of the Opposition blames the Premier for the whole trouble.

Turn Your Face Into Dollars.

MANY A MAN HAS FAILED BECAUSE HIS FACE WAS A PICTURE OF CALAMITY.

It takes sunshine to produce a rose, a perfect rose. And so man, to be successful, must have sunshine inside. The life which has it not, which has no health and no happiness, is sour, surly, pessimistic, and a failure. The world already has too many vinegar faces that breathe ill-will and strife. The world wants joy, comfort, sunshine, and will cling to the man who has it, who radiates gladness and triumph wherever he is and under all circumstances.

Some people have a genius for seeking out the disagreeable, the crooked, the bad and the ugly. These are the destroyers; they travel in schools, they herd together, for they love their kind, and the cheerful part of the world will have nothing to do with them.

And why is it that so many peddle disaster, knowing at the same time that if they do, their lives will be ruined? Some people cannot help it, for pessimism usually comes from bodily disorders, and this cannot always be prevented. The stomach, for instance, is the most common cause of discontent, sour face, recklessness, disgust and lack of ambition. A bad stomach—there is the secret of many a failure. Anyone can have a good stomach, a strong stomach, a stomach that can take care of anything and everything that is put into it, no matter whether it is a very bad stomach now or not. Then why not have it?

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets do this very thing. One ingredient of these little tablets digests 3,000 grains of food, and no matter how bad is your dyspepsia or indigestion these tablets will digest everything in your stomach, thoroughly and completely, and better and quicker than a healthy stomach can do the same thing. Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will cure quickly loss of appetite, brash, irritation, burning sensations, nausea, heartburn, eructations, loss of vim and spirit, bad memory and dyspepsia and indigestion in their very worst forms.

No other little tablets in the world can do so much. You should carry Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets around with you wherever you go and take them after meals. Then only will you realize what it is to enjoy a meal, and what perfect digestion means. Your whole body and your mind will feel the effects; your vim will increase, you will be more satisfied with what the world does, you will think happier and be happier and your face will be one of supreme content. That will bring you success and then more success. Your face will bring you dollars. Try it. It will cost you just 50c for a package of these wonderful Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, at any drug store on earth.

A REGULAR LOVE FEAST

Sir Wilfrid's Description of the Premiers' Conference.

Prime Minister of Canada Is, However, Insistent Upon a Final Settlement of the Subsidy Question, and Wants to Leave No Unsatisfied Claims to Be Adjusted by Future Arrangement—Have Not Arrived at Conclusion.

Ottawa, Oct. 12.—"There is nothing to give out," said Chairman Gouin of the conference of Provincial Premiers last evening.

"You can say," said another of the delegates, "that we are making progress, but no decision has been arrived at."

The delegates were particularly reticent yesterday, and it is concluded that the situation is scarcely as harmonious as it was.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said yesterday morning: "Just say that everything is lovely," adding that it was "a regular love feast."

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Aylesworth, Mr. Fielding and Mr. Lemieux were present at the conference yesterday morning, but were not present in the afternoon, and it is believed that Sir Wilfrid has given his fiat regarding the subsidy issue.

Sir Wilfrid Wants Finality.

The Prime Minister is known to favor a settlement which will have the element of finality, and, accordingly, he is said to have so informed the conference, pointing out the importance of determining the subsidy issue once and for all, and impressing upon the provincial delegates the inadvisability of reserving certain unsatisfied claims for future arrangement. To accomplish a complete adjustment Sir Wilfrid is believed to have agreed to the demand for a straight increase, but to have submitted a proposition in amendment to the resolution embodying his views as to the finality of the arrangement.

Consider But Do Not Conclude.

The provincial representatives took this suggestion into consideration yesterday afternoon, but no decision was arrived at, according to one of the representatives, and the discussion will be continued to-day. The compromise proposed by the Prime Minister is said to be acceptable to the representatives of all but one of the older provinces.

MAY KILL VALLILEE.

Trouble Expected When the Military Leave Buckingham, Que.—Public Opinion Veers to Strikers.

Buckingham, Que., Oct. 12.—Matters have now quieted down in connection with the strike, and there will probably be no more developments until Monday, when the inquest opens.

Public opinion is very strong regarding the attitude assumed by the MacLaren party and Henry Aylen, K.C., their counsel. They took Charette out of the funeral procession and improvised court. Mr. Aylen, without any authority and though only private counsel for the MacLarens, assuming the roll of crown prosecutor, and refusing to adjourn the court until they had heard evidence from one side only.

Mayor Vallilee is MacLarens' manager, and he has filled the town with armed police and military. The fact that he made no attempt to read the Riot Act, but merely turned the police in line, is also causing opinion to veer round to the side of the strikers.

It is expected that there will be trouble whenever the military leave. It is feared that an attempt will be made on the life of Mayor Vallilee. The strikers are buying ammunition.

An immense throng attended the funeral yesterday of the two dead strikers.

Detective Warner is dying.

King's Daughters' Convention.

Ingersoll, Oct. 12.—The closing session of the provincial convention of the King's Daughters was held last evening, when addresses were given by Rev. R. J. M. Officers as follows were elected in the afternoon: Provincial secretary, Mrs. Savage, Toronto; recording secretary, Mrs. Wallace, Cornwall; executive committee, Mrs. Austen (Toronto), Dr. Bertha Dymond (Toronto), Miss Hislop (Stratford), Mrs. W. G. Button (Ingersoll), Mrs. Courtwright (Inwood), Miss Strange (Kingston), Mrs. Hal. Palkett (Ottawa), Mrs. Biggar (Ottawa), Miss Wilson (Hamilton).

Students Fined $5 Each.

Toronto, Oct. 12.—President Hutton announced yesterday that the university caput had decided to fine each of the 36 students engaged in the medicals' "hustle" last Monday, $5 each. The caput also called the attention of the students to section 4 on page 116 of the present calendar, which provides for expulsion for such doing, with the intimation that it would in future be enforced.

Tunnel Explosion.

New York, Oct. 12.—Three men were killed and a dozen others rendered unconscious by an explosion and fire in the Pennsylvania's tunnel under Long Island City yesterday. The cause of the explosion is unknown. At one time 15 of the rescuers were stretched out on the sidewalks under treatment to resuscitate them after vainly attempting the rescue.

Brouwer Wanted Divorce.

Toms River, N. J., Oct. 12.—At the trial of Dr. Brouwer, charged with the murder of his wife, Miss Elizabeth Hyer, sister of the dead woman, testified that she was called to Dr. Brouwer's house several times during her sister's illness, and Dr. Brouwer told her that he was going to get a divorce.

Five Killed.

Cheyenne, Wyo., Oct. 12.—Five men were killed in a head-on collision on the Union Pacific Railway near Laramie, Wyo., Wednesday night. The collision was caused by the misunderstanding of orders.

BUSINESS SECTION ESCAPED.

One Hundred and Fifty-Five Buildings Burned At Summerside.

Charlottetown, P.E.I., Oct. 13.—In the fire at Summerside Thursday, 155 buildings were destroyed, including the courthouse, the jail, the electric light station, seven hotels and three churches, the Baptist, Episcopal and Christian, with the Episcopal rectory and Willard Hall.

The total loss is estimated at $225,000, with about $90,000 insurance.

The path of the fire was mainly through the residential section; the principal business establishments escaped. The postoffice and the Presbyterian Church were saved with difficulty.

The fire was the worst ever experienced in Prince Edward Island. The town has no water supply, but wells and tanks, and only one steam and two hand fire engines.

Some prisoners in the jail were hastily liberated: chiefly drunks and prohibition violators.

Complaints From Farmers.

Toronto, Oct. 13.—At the meeting of the grain commission yesterday, Peter Sherk, a miller from Bridgeport, was asked regarding complaints from farmers that they were receiving poor mill feed, and gave the explanation that, if farmers had any cause for complaint the fault was their own for bringing in dirty, half-cleaned grain for grinding. He suggested that the Farmers' Institute and the Millers' Association define what should constitute the different mill feeds. He also supported inspection. The commission received some suggestions respecting noxious seeds from R. L. D. Taylor, grain merchant of Toronto. Government control of grain elevators was advocated in the morning by L. Goldie, a Guelph miller.

Absorbs the Ontario Bank.

Bank Of Montreal Will Protect Depositors In Crisis.

Misappropriation of Funds the Cause Says the President of Ontario Bank–Amount May Reach a Million–Official Statement of Bankers Asso. ciation Says the Public Need Not Be In the Slightest Degree Alarmed.

Toronto, Oct. 13.—As a result of financial difficulties, following unfortunate investments or speculations on the part of the general manager, Charles McGill, the Ontario Bank will to-day be taken over by the Bank of Montreal.

Losses to the Ontario Bank, placed in round figures as at least one million dollars, have caused this unusual transaction.

AN Official Statement.

Alexander Laird, assistant general manager of the bank of Commerce, authorized the following brief statement after the meeting at 2 o'clock this morning:

"A meeting of the representatives of the Toronto banks was held last night to consider what action should be taken in connection with the Ontario bank.

"Arrangements are now in progress, to be consummated on the arrival this morning in the city of the representative of the Bank of Montreal, for securing payment of all liabilities."

A meeting will be held early in the morning at which it will be settled whether the bank will be opened. All arrangements depend on the initiative of the Bank of Montreal.

Public Need Not Be Uneasy.

The object of the bankers is to prevent any run on the bank and to protect the depositors and this will be done. The general public need feel no uneasiness

As to the position of the stockholders, nothing was announced, but it was rather intimated that their position is not so comfortable.

The Ontario Bank was incorporated in 1867. Its officers are: G. R. R. Cockburn, president; Donald Mackay, vice-president; R. D. Perry, Hon. R. Harcourt, R. Grass, Thomas Walmsley and John Flett.

It has branches in Alliston, Aurora, Bowmanville, Buckingham, Q., Collingwood, Cornwall, Fort William, Holstein, King City, Kingston, Lindsay, Montreal, Mount Forest, Newmarket, Ottawa, Peterboro, Port Arthur, Sudbury, Toronto, Trenton, Tweed, Waterford, and Warsaw.

Funds Misappropriated.

G. R. R. Cockburn was interviewed as to the cause of the trouble. He stated that misappropriation of the funds was the real difficulty, and this had all occurred in the last few months. The bank as a bank was all right, and in a healthy working condition, and the branches so far from being a hindrance were very productive and of great benefit.

The depositors and noteholders, he stated, would be guaranteed against loss by the Bank of Montreal, which was taking over the assets and business of the Ontario Bank. The other banks were guaranteeing the Bank of Montreal in this, the Bank of Montreal thus acting as the agent of the others.

With regard to the amount of misappropriation of the funds, Mr. Cockburn was not in a position to speak definitely, but admitted that it might exceed $1,000,000.

The question of prosecution of Mr. McGill, it is understood, remains in abeyance.

LATE GRAPES DAMAGED.

Second Blow to Niagara Growers Means Thousand Tons Loss.

St. Catharines, Oct. 13.—Heavy damage to grapes was done Thursday night by the severe black frost which visited the Niagara district.

It is estimated that there was about a fifth of the entire output of the peninsula still unpicked, being nearly a thousand tons, and a prominent dealer said yesterday morning that practically all of this was ruined by the frost. One grower is said to have lost 2,500 baskets alone.

This is a second blow to the hopes of the grape growers around here, who, when the Ontario Grape-Growing Co.'s wine-making plant was destroyed by fire last week, feared they would have nobody to take their grapes. However, the company had fitted up a temporary plant, and would have been prepared to take in most of the grapes, notwithstanding the fire.

Tomatoes which remained out are a total loss.

FATALITY AT GODERICH.

Engine Falls Into River Bed—One Dead, Three Badly Hurt.

Goderich, Oct. 13.—One man was killed and three badly injured yesterday morning at the bridge the C. P. R. are constructing across the Maitland River here. A hoisting engine was on the bridge raising a girder when the engine, which was mounted on a flat car, fell over to the river bed below.

Engineer Jack Maddeford, an Englishman, was knocked into the river, and received severe injuries on the head, which resulted in his death almost immediately.

Jack Campbell and D. Lynn of this town were badly hurt, the former having some ribs and an arm broken, and the latter an arm broken.

Harvey Gillman of Peterboro was hurt in the back, and is said to be the worst injured of the three.

Two other men who were on the engine saved themselves by jumping.

Government Will Act.

Hamilton, Oct. 13.—At the meeting of the National Council of Women yesterday, Dr. Helen McMurchy, Toronto, announced that she was collecting statistics for the Ontario Government with reference to feeble-minded women, and that the Government would take some action as soon as it found out how many there were.

The council was in turmoil during the afternoon over the question of the extension of the franchise to women. By a vote of 52 to 22, the members declared themselves in favor of political equality for the sexes.

French Parliament Called.

Paris, Oct. 13.—The Cabinet has decided to convoke Parliament for Oct. 25. The greater portion of the session will again be devoted to the vexed church and state separation question.

If a person determines early in life that a cheerful disposition is worth having and strives to obtain it and does so that person is a success in a fine sense of the word.

HOW THE MONEY GOES.

FIELDING'S CONSTITUENCY!

There are other ways of corrupting constituencies than by $20 bills extracted from a "reptile fund." No one knows how to do it better than the Hon. Mr. Fielding. In addition to the ready cash distributed among the electors by his agents who get out of the way when wanted as witnesses, Mr. Fielding dips his fingers into the public chest and lavishly extracts therefrom public funds, and expends it in the way of grants for wharves, ditches, bridges, etc., in his own constituency, and Nova Scotia generally, receiving in return the votes of those who profit by its expenditure.

Few have an opportunity of seeing and examining the public accounts or Auditor-General's Report, if they had they would be staggered at the sums thus squandered for which the Finance Minister is primarily responsible.

In Nova Scotia it is the practice just before an election to make lavish appropriations by the Legislature of money for roads and bridges, which it is also known is used in such a way as to secure the return of Government supporters. The same policy has been introduced into Dominion politics, by Mr. Fielding, and no man in the Government resorts to this means of corruption so effectually as the Finance Minister, Mr. Fielding, who is now without a seat, having lost it owing to the same kind of bribery and corruption now being exposed in the London election case.

Look at the manner in which this immaculate and pure Minister of Finance has been manipulating and using the public money for election purposes. The Toronto News' Ottawa correspondent has been exploring the Public Accounts and Auditor-General's Report, and has given the result to the readers of that journal. Our space does not permit of the reproducing of the whole facts, but we give the summary, from which the reader will learn how the rest of the people of the Dominion have contributed to Mr. Fielding's constituency, and to the Province of Nova Scotia, generally.

The following figures show how Nova Scotia, and Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding's constituency), have fared since he entered the Government:

Year.	Total Vote for Public Works Nova Scotia.	Expended in Shelburne and Queens.	Percentage.
1897-98	$ 151,979.6	$ 2,468.00	1.6
1898-99	167,018.74	23,384.12	14
1899-00	195,055.49	39,875.00	20
1900-01	204,607.06	20,914.00	10.2
1901-02	315,161.14	12,450.00	3.5
1902-03	232,203.1	19,504.00	8
1903-04	315,211.65	17,514.00	5.
1904-05	507,913.51	18,057.00	3.5
	$1,145,020.13	$154,251.00	7

The correspondent adds:

"During the same period the appropriations for the neighboring constituency of Lunenburg, with a somewhat shorter coast line and a somewhat larger population, seem to have been from $5,900 to $10,000. Lunenburg, it will be remembered until 1904, was Conservative.

"If we apply statistics to the expenditures in Mr. Fielding's constituency we get some amusing results, which show how carefully he scrutinizes expenditure, in this constituency, at least. During the eight years covered by this statement $154,250 has been spent among 24,500 people, or about $6.30 per head. Had this rate been applied everywhere in Canada, the votes for public works during these eight years would have been $35,000,000, exclusive of money spent on important national enterprises; for none of these expenditures, it will be noticed, were for bigger objects than wharves for small villages and a public building for a town of less than 2,000. Or, if we take the vote polled as our guide, we find that during those eight years, $36.50 was spent for each vote cast in 1904; or, let us say about $70 for each vote cast for Mr. Fielding. It is good to be the Finance Minister's constituents."

How do the taxpayers of Ontario like it?

Is it any wonder that Shelburne and Queens support Fielding?

A Hint For Health.

We're enthusiastic about Bu-Ju because it does help. People give verbal evidence every day.

It isn't the talking that convinces—but the earnestness—and the cheery smiles of gratitude, which say more than any words. You can't help smiling when you get rid of pain and feel perfectly right. Health smiles—gratitude prompts it.

If you must have something to right the kidneys, use Bu-Ju. But we hope you don't require it. You certainly shan't after giving Bu-Ju the trial we ask. Samples free. Get some.

A property-owner, discussing conditions in this city at present, risked the opinion that owners of vacant building lots, by demanding too high a price for their lots, were working inimically to the interests of the city by causing people to buy lots on the outskirts and build there. Very properly, they demand that the utilities, gas and water, be supplied them, and the city is compelled to spend much money which could be saved were vacant lots nearer the centre of the city built on and the city kept in a more compact condition. The very ready to answer to this, of course, will be that men who own property have the right to demand whatever price they please for it. Very true. But our informant claims that certain parties are demanding more for their properties than it is assessed for. In that case it would appear to be the plain duty of the Assessor to advance the assessment. There is hardly any chance for an argument over that proposition.

"Canada and Australia," said Winston Churchill in a speech at Glasgow last evening, "are now fully assured that the Liberal ministry means to cherish their interests and respect their rights." What has assured them? In view of the betrayal of poor little Newfoundland's interests Canada and Australia will require some more satisfactory assurances than the smooth phrases of the glib young under-secretary.

The decision of Judge Anglin relative to the ownership of the land under our streams, will be hailed with satisfaction by the people generally. Hitherto it was in doubt whether the owners of the land on the shores of streams, or the government owned the land beneath the water. But by Judge Anglin's decision the beds of all rivers, small and large, belong to the government, that is, to the public.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

Armour's Solid Extract of Beef

(POTTED IN CANADA)

is the kind that is simply the natural Essence of Prime Beef—concentrated. It is not a manufactured article like many extracts and fluid beefs, made from extract bought on the open market without any knowledge of its purity, and mixed with salt, water and other ingredients. Beef in fluid form offers opportunity for adulteration without detection. This cannot be said of solid extract.

THE SOUTH HASTINGS TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

ANNUAL MEETING BEGAN YESTERDAY — MR. JOHN JOHNSTON RE-ELECTED PRESIDENT — SOME CLEVER ADDRESSES.

The annual meeting of the S. H. Teachers' Institute assembled in the City Hall at 9.30 a.m. on Friday, Mr. J. Johnston, I. P. S., in the chair.

The first business was the election of officers for the ensuing year. A nominating committee, consisting of Mr. P. W. Fairman, Trenton; Mr. Barragar, and Mr. Simpkins, of Belleville; Mr. Bell, of Frankford, and Mr. Luck, of Deseronto, brought in the following report which was unanimously adopted;

Mr. J. Johnston, I. P. S., President.

Mr. Luck, Vice-president.

S. A. Gardner, Secretary-Treasurer.

Committee of Management — Mr. Noon, Miss Rush, Mr. Kiernan, Mr. Morton and Mr. Fairman.

Delegates to Ontario Educational Association — Mr. P. W. Fairman, Trenton, and Miss Smith, Deseronto.

The first subject taken up was "Reading in Second Class," by Miss Vincent of Queen Victoria School. She gave a practical illustration of her method of assigning and teaching a lesson in the Second Book, with a class from her own room, consisting of Helen Hunt, Ruth Sinclair, Eva Lazier, Ida Carwardine, Jessie Cobb, Joe Stewart and Arthur Barragar.

The committee were fortunate in securing the services of Mr. J. C. Morgan, M.A., for many years inspector of Public Schools, Simcoe Co., now Superintendent of the Orphans' Home, Foresters' Island, Deseronto. Those who had had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Morgan before knew what a treat was in store for the Institute and were not disappointed. After a brief but appropriate introduction, Mr. Morgan addressed the teachers on teaching reading to Parts I. and II. of First Book. A class of little boys and girls from Miss Bruce's room, Jessie McIntosh, Helen Gordenier, Mary Foster, Theo. Green, Don Smith, Cecil Holway, and N. Kerr was used to illustrate the method of teaching children phonics, word-recognition, emphasis. He afterward, with a class from Part II. from Miss Aull's room, consisting of Nellie Alford, Florence McCurdy, Hilda Ackegill, Pearl Homan, May Holland, Harold Holway, Arthur Dunning and Charlie Armstrong, showed how he would continue the work in the higher classes. His address was one that will appeal to the good sense of those who heard it, and spur them on to better things.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

On reassembling in the afternoon the first subject was on teaching Geography, by Mr. Barragar, who gave a very clear and comprehensive explanation of his methods of teaching physical, mathematical and political geography, the ocean current, chief commercial centres and products and exports of each country, and gave an illustration of teaching map drawing.

Mr. J. C. Morgan followed with a talk on the teaching of spelling, and in the discussion following a number of teachers took part, asking questions or explaining them, method of dealing with the difficulties that present themselves to teachers in teaching this subject.

Mr. P. W. Fairman gave a very interesting explanation of his method of teaching writing. This subject provoked an animated discussion on the various ways in which the subject is taught, in which many teachers took part, showing the awakened interest that is pervading the profession regarding the teaching of this very important subject.

Adieu to Canned Fake.

Washington Oct. 12.—Say adieu to the "frankfurter" manufactured in the stockyards at Chicago. Bid farewell to the "Virginia" ham cut from a pig born and brought up in Kansas. Likewise give good-bye to "Philadelphia" squab, which never got within 1,000 miles of Philadelphia. Look no more for the picture off a chicken on potted chicken made of veal nor for the deceptive portrait of a pig upon the can containing odds and ends of a steer's carcass. The secretary of agriculture has decided upon reforms in connection with the enforcement of the new pure food law, which goes into effect soon, which make it a real reform. Neither by word nor by picture shall the public be coaxed, hereafter, into the belief it is eating "little pig sausage" when the sausages was made from a big pig.

That the consumer may know just what to expect hereafter, the department of agriculture gave out its rulings on the subject to-day. They apply particularly to canned goods. Anything savoring of a false or deceptive name will not be tolerated for a minute. Not only will it be a crime to mislabel canned goods, but it will be just as pernicious and illegal to try to trick the public by the aid of pictures, which give false indications of the contents of the can or the places whence the contents came. If the packers went to put pictures on their canned products there will be no objection to engraving a picture of the president of the company or the portrait of Washington monument thereon. But if pictures of things to eat are used, a calf must be called a calf, and not a chicken.

Geographical names are allowed to be used only with the words "cut" type, brand or style, as the case may be, except upon foods produced or manufactured in the place named. For instance, Virginia ham must be marked Virginia style ham. English brawn must be English style brawn; Westphalia ham must be Westphalia style ham.

The word ham without a prefix indicating the species of animal is considered by the department to be pork ham, but trimmings removed from the ham and used in the preparation of potted meats or sausage, or when used alone may be known as potted ham or ham sausage.

Frankfurter sausage must be called Frankfurter style sausage.

The rules clearly define what constitutes pure lard but prescribe that a substance composed of lard, stearin or other animal fat and vegetable oil may be labelled lard compound.

Among the restrictions are the following: Picnic hams cannot be called hams, but may be called picnics or picnic shoulders; little pig sausage may be called little pork sausage or pigmy sausage; extract of beef actually must be made from beef, and veal loaf cannot be called such unless the meat is veal only.

The same rules apply to other canned products and manufacturers are warned that the rulings do not exempt them from the enforcement of state laws.

ORANGE MEAT

Talks on Orange Meat
(THE PURE FOOD)
Mixing and Flaking.

After the wheat is thoroughly cooked—all starch cells broken—and starch converted into carbohydrates—it goes to the mixing machines. Here, malt is added, which converts the starch into maltose (Malt Sugar), which makes ORANGE MEAT so nutritious and wholesome. Then the malted wheat is passed through special machines, which turn the wheat kernals into individual flakes. Orange Meat is then ready for the ovens, to be baked a deliciously crisp golden brown.

Mercerized paper lining of every package insures Orange Meat being always fresh, and clean. At all grocers in 15c and 25c packages.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

Returns to Ontario

Rev. J. W. Forster, formerly of this district, but who some time ago went to Beaconsfield, P. Q., has returned to Ontario at the request of Bishop Mills. That the Rev. gentleman was appreciated by his Beaconsfield parishioners may be gathered from the following letter, which was sent to him on behalf of his former parishioners;

Beaconsfield, Oct. 2, 1906.

Rev. J. W. Forster,

Rev. and Dear Sir, — In wishing you good-bye, and success in your future labors, we desire to say, on our own behalf, and on that of the congregation, that we greatly appreciate your work amongst us, during this summer.

Not only have you been careful and thorough in rendering the services in the church, but also in visiting and getting in touch with the people, and we owe you hearty thanks for so materially assisting us in raising the funds towards the debt, incurred in placing the fabric in better condition.

Yours very faithfully,

HIS PLEDGE.

(S. E. Kiser in Chicago Record-Herald.)

She gazed upon him with a sigh;
'Twas seven years since they had parted,
She proudly bidding him good-bye,
He turning from her, broken-hearted.
She vividly recalled the place
And each sad word that he had spoken,
Hot tears had trickled down his face,
Her own heart had been nearly broken.

Without her he had sadly said
That life would be a burden to him;
She had supposed that he was dead,
For he had left the haunts which knew him.
He'd said that he must pine away
Because she would not let him claim her;
Her conscience since that dismal day
Had often roused itself to blame her.

She gazed upon him with a sigh
Who once had left her broken-hearted;
He had not gone away to die,
As he had promised when they parted;
He had not pined, 'twas plain to see,
And as he stood there smiling at her
She murmured to herself: 'Ah, me,
He's gone and got a whole lot fatter!'

German Government statistics show that 43,421 horses and 2451 dogs were slaughtered for food, under government inspection during the first three months of 1906. This was an increase of 7,522 horses and 366 dogs over the number slaughtered during the same time in 1905. And this only accounts for the dogs and horses killed under government supervision. It is estimated that among the poorer classes, forced to resort to dog and horse meat by the exclusion of American and other foreign meats from the country, the consumption of this sort of meat was much larger than the official records show.

Beit's vast wealth came from mines—diamonds, gold and copper — like the immense fortune of Senator William A. Clark, of Montana; like the $25,000,000 or more accumulated by Cecil Rhodes. The earth was also the source of the wealth of both John D. Rockefeller and his brother William. The same thing is true of Carnegie's great store of wealth. It was really dug from iron mines—iron and coal. Krupp piled up the largest estate in Germany in like manner. He made his money by manufacturing the product of iron mines. The earth is a magnificent storehouse of wealth. It has proved more fruitful of immense fortunes than the vast transportation business which made the fortunes of the Vanderbilts and the Goulds, Hill, Harriman and the rest of the American railroad kings.

"A RECOGNIZED FACT"

Men in Every Election Looking For What They Can Get.

Hyman Workers Had "Surmise" as to What Collins Was Doing in the Other Room With Electors — Raised Objection to Presence of Conservative in Committee Room—More Electors Tell of Taking Bribes.

Toronto, Oct. 13.—While the evidence brought out in the London bribery investigation proceedings yesterday was less sensational than that of Thursday, when J. G. Pritchett told his round, unvarnished tale of rascality in elections, the prosecution rolled up a number of added points from the testimony of a procession of witnesses who had "voted right," and received pecuniary reward. Mr. Robinette was, as usual, at particular pains to bring out that the votes had not been bargained for, and that they would have been recorded for Hyman without the soft persuasion of lucre, but, in this, he was not uniformly successful.

A Game of Graft.

J. F. Ellis, ex-president of the Toronto Board of Trade, testified that John O'Gorman had come to him for figures on tendering for envelopes for the Grand Trunk Pacific, and that, on receiving a cheque, he found that $70 or $80 had been added on for, as O'Gorman explained, his commission. Mr. Ellis had returned the extra money, as he did not like O'Gorman's tactics. Magistrate Denison asked what this evidence had to do with the case, and Mr. DuVernet replied that it showed how money was collected, and connected Mr. Reid, a brother of the defendant, Reid, who, he declared, the evidence showed, had sent Pritchett into West Elgin.

$10 for "Voting Right."

Enoch Fowler of London had received $10 for voting "right" on the suggestion of Tom Lewis. In the previous election he had received $5 from Jerry Collins for a supposed Hyman vote, which he had really given to Gray.

Charles Howse had also voted for Gray, he said, though given $10 the day before the election by Sifton.

Thomas Tanstone said he had been solicited by Collins to vote for Hyman, and had been handed $9.50 at the Lewis Hotel by Collins. Witness signed a receipt.

Joseph Tait had been promised $10 by Collins to "vote right."

John A. Norman had been canvassed about his vote by Servias, Collins and another man. He was told, "If you vote for Hyman, there is $10 in it for you." The money was given to witness' father, who also received some for himself. He would not have voted without inducement.

Collins Would Know How He Voted.

John H. Andrews testified that Hardy had told him Collins wanted to see him at Lewis hotel, where he met Mulloy also. Collins said he would know how he voted. Three weeks latter, he called for his envelope, which was given him by a man named Donahue.

James Bone said he was promised $10 by Lewis to switch from voting for Gray. He got $10 from Collins in Lewis' hotel.

Oscar Moonton, who is employed in Mr. Hyman's tannery, had seen Sifton, Lewis, Ardy and Milne in the committee rooms. Witness was appointed a deputy returning officer. The magistrate remarked that the appointment of a worker in this way would hardly conduce to a fair election.

Jones Admitted It.

Charles White identified Francis Jones, chairman of the Hyman committee in Division 3, as a man to whom Collins had handed an envelope containg $10, that was to be paid to the witness.

Jones admitted holding the envelope, but swore that he had no knowledge of its contents. He was simply told to give it to White, and he did not give it to him on the spot, because White was then going out of the door. Jones wouldn't swear that more was not told him. He was asked if he knew what Collins and Mulloy were doing with electors in the other room, and his reply was that he surmised. He told the court that it was a recognized fact that in every election there were people looking for what they could get, and they usually got it. He had objected to Collins "having anything to do" with one, Gatuliff, a Conservative, who "might squeal."

A Hyman Reception Echo.

In the afternoon the chief witness was Edgar Jeffreys, a young barrister, identified with organization work before and during the campaign. Jeffreys professed lack of knowledge of any campaign fund. Incidentally, was brought out the rather amusing fact that Hon. Mr. Hyman had contributed to the expense of holding reception in his own honor.

BISHOP SWEATMAN NAMED.

Primate of All Canada by Synod—The Funeral of the Late Archbishop.

Montreal, Oct. 13.—The Anglican synod yesterday appointed Coadjutor Bishop Carmichael Lord Bishop of Montreal, and decided to recommend Bishop Sweatman of Toronto to be primate of all Canada.

The funeral service for the late Archbishop Bond took place at Christ Church Cathedral at 2.30 yesterday afternoon and brought out an exceptionally large attendance of clergymen, many of whom represented other denominations than the Church of England.

There was also a representation from the City Council, headed by Mayor Ekers. Hon. Rodolphe Roy represented the Provincial Government.

The service was under the direction of Venerable Archdeacon Norton, rector of the cathedral, and Bishop Carmichael. The opening sentences were read by Venerable Archdeacon Naylor; psalm, selection by the Bishop of Quebec; the lesson by the Bishop of Ottawa, after which the hymn, "Now, the Laborer's Task Is O'er," was sung. The committal and prayers following were read by Bishop Carmichael, followed by the hymn, "Peace, Perfect Peace," after which the Bishop of Ontario pronounced the benediction.

The funeral procession then formed and proceeded to Mount Royal cemetery.

BY FRED M. WHITE

Author of "Tregarthen's Wife," "The Robe of Lucifer," Etc.

Copyright, 1905, by R. F. Fenno & Company.

"Here!" the girl cried. "Impossible! In the house! The night before last! Why, we were all in bed long before midnight."

"I am not aware that I said anything about midnight," David responded boldly.

An angry flush came sweeping over the face of the girl, annoyance at her own folly, David thought. She added quickly that she and her uncle had only been down in Brighton for three days.

"Nevertheless, I was in this room two nights ago," David replied. "If you know all about it, I pray you to give me certain information of vital importance to me; if not, I shall be compelled to keep my extraordinary story to myself, for otherwise you would never believe it. Do you or do you not know of my visit here?"

The girl bent her head till Steel could see nothing but the glorious amber of her hair. He could see, too, the fine old lace round her throat was tossing like a cork on a stream.

"I can tell you nothing," she said. "Nothing, nothing, nothing."

It was the voice of one who would have spoken had she dared. With anybody else Steel would have been furiously angry. In the present case he could only admire the deep, almost pathetic, loyalty to somebody who stood behind.

"Are you sure you were in this house?" the girl asked, at length.

"Certain!" David exclaimed. "The walls, the pictures, the furniture—all the same. I could swear to the place anywhere. Miss Gates, if I cannot prove that I was here at the time I name, it is likely to go very hard with me."

"You mean that a certain inconvenience——"

"Inconvenience! Do you call a charge of murder, or manslaughter at best, inconvenient? Have you not seen the local papers? Don't you know that two nights ago, during my absence from home, a strange man was practically done to death in my conservatory? And during the time of the outrage, as sure as Heaven is above us, I was in this room."

"I am sorry, but I am sure that you were not."

"Ah, you are going to disappoint me? And yet you know something. You might have been the guiltiest of creatures yourself when I disclosed my identity. No prisoner detected in some shameful crime ever looked more guilty than you."

The girl stood there, saying nothing. Had she rang the bell and ordered the footman to put him out of the house, Steel would have had no cause for complaint. But she did nothing of the kind. She stood there torn by conflicting emotions.

"I can give you no information," she said, presently. "But I am as positive one way as you are another that you have never been in this house before. I may surmise things, but as I hope to be judged fairly I can give you no information. I am only a poor, unhappy girl, who is doing what she deems to be the best for all parties concerned. And I can tell you nothing, nothing. Oh, won't you believe that I would do anything to serve you if I were only free?"

She held out her hand with an imploring gesture, the red lips were quivering, and her eyes were full of tears. David's warm heart went out to her; he forgot all his own troubles and dangers in his sympathy for the lovely creature in distress.

"Pray say no more about it," he cried. He caught the outstretched hand in his and carried it to his lips. "I don't wish to hurry you; in fact, haste is dangerous. And there is ample time. Nor am I going to press you. Still, before long you may find some way to give me a clue without sacrificing a jot of your fine loyalty to—well, others. I would not distress you for the world, Miss Gates. Don't you think that this has been the most extraordinary interview?"

The tears trembled like diamonds on the girl's long lashes and a smile flashed over her face. The sudden transformation was wonderfully fascinating.

"What you might call an impossible interview," she laughed. "And all the more impossible because it was quite impossible that you could ever have been here before."

"When I was in this room two nights ago," David protested," I saw——"

"Did you see me, for instance? If not, you couldn't have been here."

A small, misshapen figure, with the face of a Byron—Apollo on the bust of a Satyr—came in from behind the folding doors at the back of the dining room carrying some letters in his hand. The stranger's dark, piercing were fixed inquiringly upon Steel.

"Bell," the latter cried; "Hatherly Bell! you have been listening!"

The little man with the godlike head admitted the fact, coolly. He had been writing letters in the back room and escape had been impossible for him.

"Funny enough, I was going to look you up to-day," he said. "You did me a great service once, and I am longing to repay you. I came down here to give my friend Gates the benefit of my advice and assistance over a large philanthropic scheme he has just evolved. And, writing letters yonder on the subject, I heard your extraordinary conversation. Can I help you, Steel?"

"My dear fellow," David cried, "if you offered me every intellect in Europe I should not choose one of them so gladly as yours."

"Then let us shake hands on the bargain. And now I am going to stagger you; I heard you state positively that two nights ago you were in this very room."

"I am prepared to testify the fact on oath anywhere, my dear Bell."

"Very well; will you be good enough to state the hour?"

"Certainly. I was here from one o'clock—say between one and two."

"And I was here also. From eleven o'clock till two I was in this very room working out some calculations at this very table by the aid of my reading-lamp, no other light being in the room, or even in the house, as far as I know. It is one of my fads—as fools call them—to work in a large, dark room with one brilliant light only. Therefore you could not possibly have been in the house, to say nothing of this room, on the night in question."

David nodded feebly. There was no combating Bell's statement.

"I presume that this is No. 219?" he asked.

"Certainly it is," Miss Gates replied. "We are all agreed about that."

"Because I read the number over the fanlight," Steel went on. "And I came here by arrangement. And there was everything as I see it now. Bell, you must either cure me of this delusion, or you must prove logically to me that I have made a mistake. So far as I am concerned, I am like a child struggling with the alphabet."

"We'll start now," said Bell. "Come along."

Steel rose none too willingly. He would fain have lingered with Ruth. She held out her hand; there was a warm, glad smile on her face.

"May you be successful," she whispered. "Come and see me again, because I shall be very, very anxious to know. And I am not without guilt. . . if you only knew!"

"And I may come again?" David said, eagerly.

A further smile and a warm pressure of the hand were the only reply. Presently Steel was standing outside in the road with Bell. The latter was glancing at the house on either side of 219. The higher house was let; the one nearest the sea—218—was empty. A bill in the window gave the information that the property was in the hands of Messrs. Wallace and Brown, Station Quadrant, where keys could be obtained.

"We'll make a start straightaway," said Bell. "Come along."

"Where are you going to at that pace?" Steel asked.

"Going to interview Messrs. Wallace and Brown. At the present moment I am a gentleman who is in search of a house of residence, and I have a weakness for Brunswick Square in particular, especially for No. 218. Unless I am greatly mistaken I am going to show you something that will startle even the most callous novelist."

CHAPTER VIII.

The queer, misshapen figure striding along by Steel's side would have attracted attention anywhere; indeed, Hatherly Bell had been an attractive personality from his schooldays. A strange mixture of vanity and brilliant mental qualities, Bell had almost as many enemies as friends. He was morbidly miserable over the score of his personal appearance despite the extraordinary beauty of his face—to be pitied or even sympathized with almost maddened him. Yet there were many women who would gladly have shared the lot of Hatherly Bell.

For there was strength in the perfectly moulded face, as well as beauty. It was the face of a man possessed of marvellous intellectual powers, and none the less attractive because, while the skin was as fair as a woman's and the eyes as clear as a child's, the wavy hair was absolutely white. The face of a man who had suffered fiercely and long. A face hiding a great sorrow.

Time was when Bell had promised to stand in the front rank of operative physicians. In brain troubles and mental disorders he had distinguished himself. He had a marvellous faculty for psychological research; indeed, he had gone so far as to declare that insanity was merely a disease and capable of cure the same as any ordinary malady. "If Bell goes on as he has started," a great German specialist once declared, "he will inevitably prove to be the greatest benefactor to mankind since the beginning of the world." Bell was to be the man of his time.

And then suddenly he had faded out as a star drops from the zenith. There had been dark rumors of a terrible scandal, a prosecution burked by strong personal influence, mysterious paragraphs in the papers, and the disappearance of the name of Hatherly Bell from the rank of great medical jurists. Nobody seemed to know anything about it, but Bell was ignored by all except a few old friends, and henceforth he devoted his attention to criminology and the evolution of crime. It was Bell's boast that he could take a dozen men at haphazard and give you their vices and virtues point-blank. He had a marvellous gift that way.

A few people stuck to him, Gilead Gates amongst the number. The millionaire philanthropist had need of someone to pick the sheep from the goats, and Bell made no mistakes. David Steel had been able to do the specialist some slight service a year or two before, and Bell had been pleased to magnify this into a great favor.

"You are a fast walker," David said, presently.

"That's because I am thinking fast," Bell replied. "Steel, you are in great trouble?"

"It needs no brilliant effort on your part to see that," David said, bitterly. "Besides, you heard a great deal just now when you—you——"

"Listened," Bell said, coolly. "Of course I had no intention of playing eavesdropper; and I had no idea who the Mr. Steel was who wanted to see Miss Gates. They come day by day, my dear fellow, garbed in the garb of Pall Mall or Petticoat Lane as the case may be, but they all come for money. Sometimes it is a shilling, sometimes £100. But I did not gather from your chat with Miss Gates what your trouble was."

"Perhaps not, but Miss Gates knew perfectly well."

Bell patted his companion, approvingly.

"It is a pleasure to help a lucid-minded man like yourself," he said. "You go straight to the root of the sore and cut all the superfluous matter away. I was deeply interested in the conversation when I overheard just now. You are in great trouble, and that trouble is connected with 219, Brunswick Square—a house where you have never been before."

"My dear chap, I was in that dining-room two nights ago. Nothing will convince me to the——"

"There you are wrong, because I am going to convince you to the contrary. You may smile and shake your head, but before an hour has passed I am going to convince you beyond all question that you were never inside No. 219."

"Brave words," David muttered. "Still, an hour is not a long time to wait."

"No. But you must enlighten me if I am to assist you. I am profoundly interested. You come to the house of my friend on a desperate errand. Miss Gates is a perfect stranger to you, and yet the mere discovery of your identity fills her with the most painful agitation. Therefore, though you have never been in 219 before, you are pretty certain, and I am pretty certain, that Ruth Gates knows a deal about the thing that is touching you. On the contrary, I know nothing on that head. Won't you let me into the secret?"

"I'll tell you part," Steel replied. "And I'll put it pithily. For mere argument we assume that I am selected to assist a damsel in distress who lives at No. 219, Brunswick Square. We will assume that the conversation leading up to the flattering selection took place over the telephone. As a matter of fact, it did take place over the telephone. The thing was involved with so much secrecy that I naturally hesitated. I was offered £1,000 for my services; also I was reminded by my unseen messenger that I was in dire need of that money."

"And were you?"

"My dear fellow, I don't fancy that I should have hesitated at burglary to get it. And all I had to do was to meet a lady secretly in the dead of night at No. 219 and tell her how to get out of a certain difficulty. It all resolved itself round the synopsis of a proposed new story of mine. But I had better go into details."

David proceeded to do so. Bell, with his arm crooked through that of his companion, followed the story with an intelligent and flattering interest.

"Very strange and very fascinating," he said, presently. "I'll think it out presently. Nobody could possibly think of anything but their toes in Western Road. Go on."

"Now I am coming to the point. I had the money, I had that lovely cigar-case, and subsequently I had that battered and bleeding specimen of humanity dumped down in the most amazing manner in my conservatory. The cigar-case lay on the conservatory floor, remember—swept off the table when I clutched for the telephone bell to call for the police. When Marley came he asked if the cigar-case was mine. At first I said no, because, you see——"

"I see quite plainly. Pray go on."

"Well, I lost that cigar-case; I leave it in the offices of Mossa, to whom I pay nearly £1,000. Mossa, to spite me, takes or sends the case to the police, who advertise it not knowing that it is mine. You will see why they advertise it presently——"

"Because it belonged to the injured man, eh?"

David pulled up and regarded his companion with amazement.

"How on earth——" he gasped. "Do you mean to say that you know——"

"Nothing at present, I assure you," Bell said, coolly. "Call it intuition, if you like. I prefer to call it the result of logical mental process. I'm right, of course?"

"Of course you are. I'd claimed that case for my own. I had cut my initials inside, as I showed Marley when I went to the police-station. And then Marley tells me how I paid Mossa nearly £1,000; how the money must have come into my hands in the nick of time. That was pretty bad when I couldn't for the life of me give a lucid reason for the possession of those notes; but there was worse to come. In the pocket of the injured man was a receipt for a diamond-studded gun-metal cigar-case, purchased the day of the outrage. And Walen, the jeweller, proved beyond a doubt that the case I claimed was purchased at his shop."

Bell nodded gravely.

"Which places you in an exceedingly awkward position," he said.

"A mild way of putting it," David replied. "If that fellow dies the police have enough evidence to hang me. And what is my defence? The story of my visit to No. 219. And who would believe that cock-and-bull story? Fancy a drama like that being played out in the house of such a pillar of respectability as Gilead Gates."

"It isn't his house," said Bell. "He only takes it furnished."

"In anybody else your remark would be puerile," David said, irritably.

"It's a deeper remark than you are aware of a present," Bell replied. "I quite see your position. Nobody would believe you, of course. But why not go to the post-office and ask the number of the telephone that called you up from London?"

The question seemed to amuse David slightly. Then his lips were drawn humorously.

"When my logical formula came back I thought of that," he said. "On inquiring as to who it was rang me up on that fateful occasion I learnt that the number was 0017 Kensington and that——"

"Gates's own number at Prince's Gate," Bell exclaimed. "The plot thickens."

"It does, indeed," David said, grimly. "It is Wilkie Collins gone mad. Gaboriau in extremis, Du Boisgobey suffering from delirium tremens. I go to Gates's house here, and am solemnly told in the midst of surroundings that I can swear to that I have never been there before; the whole mad expedition is launched by the turning of the handle of a telephone in the house of a distinguished, trusted, if prosaic, citizen. Somebody gets hold of the synopsis of a story of mine, Heaven knows how——"

"That is fairly easy. The synopsis was short, I suppose?"

"Only a few lines, say 1,000 words, a sheet of paper. My writing is very

SAVED BABY'S LIFE.

There are thousands of mothers throughout Canada who have no hesitation in saying that the good health enjoyed by their little ones is entirely due to the judicious use of Baby's Own Tablets. And there are many mothers who do not hesitate to say that at critical periods the Tablets have saved a baby life. Mrs. Wm. Fortin, St. Genevieve, Que., says: "I feel sure that Baby's Own Tablets saved my baby's life. When I first began giving them to him he was so badly constipated that the bowels could only be moved by injection, and he suffered terribly. After the first day I saw a marked change, and in less than a week the trouble was entirely removed, and he has since enjoyed the best of health." You can get Baby's Own Tablets from your druggist or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

without any Smoke, Dust or Gas.

Most furnaces are put together like two joints of stove-pipe. That is, the steel and cast-iron are bolted together, and cement rubbed into the cracks.

In a month after starting the fire, the difference in expansion and contraction of iron and steel loosens the bolts—cement drops out—and gas and smoke come into the house.

It is a case of plugging up the cracks with cement—or living in a dusty, smoky house.

A man, who takes my advice and buys a "Hecla" Furnace, saves himself all that trouble and annoyance.

In the "Hecla", joints between steel and cast-iron are FUSED and are absolutely and permanently tight. That means that HECLA generates fresh, clean hot air—untainted by gas or smoke.

Let me send you the Hecla catalogue, which tells all about these ideal heaters. Give me the dimensions of your house, and I will tell you the cost of installing a "HECLA". Both services are free. Address "Clare's Furnace Builder", care of 34

HERPICIDE

Beautiful Women

NEWBRO'S HERPICIDE

MISS MILDRED HOLLAND,
the Charming and Deservedly Popular Theatrical Star, writes as follows:

"I am delighted with Newbro's Herpicide. It is just what I have been looking for. I find that it not only prevents dandruff, but that it stops the hair from falling out. It is a most delightful hair dressing, and no lady's toilet table is complete without it."

(Signed) MILDRED HOLLAND.

A woman to be pretty must have pretty hair. There is a subtle charm about beautiful hair that lends more to personal adornment than all of the skill of all of the "beauty doctors" combined. The hair need not be of extraordinary or abnormal length, but it must have that distinctiveness of appearance that comes from intelligent care and is the result of perfect hair health.

The most cultured ladies in every community use Newbro's Herpicide; and when you see a head of hair that glistens with beauty and is radiant with life, it is a fairly good indication that Newbro's Herpicide has been used.

A common cause of dullness of the hair is the presence of fine dust and soot in the streets that is kept in constant motion by trolley cars, automobiles, etc. This fine dust—frequently laden with disease germs—adheres to the hair and dulls its natural lustre.

A delightful way to cleanse and beautify the hair is to moisten a cloth with Newbro's Herpicide and draw it carefully through the hair, taking one small strand at a time. It may be done daily or less often, as desired.

The result of this cleansing process will prove a surprise, not only in the amount of dirt removed, but in the added beauty of the hair and the sense of cleanliness and comfort that follows. Shampooing will also remove this dust, but too frequent washing of the hair is harmful.

"Newbro's Herpicide is the Original remedy that "kills the dandruff germ." It eradicates dandruff and stops falling hair. It is the only real scalp prophylactic in existence. A delightful and refreshing hair dressing. Stops itching of the scalp almost instantly.

A Profitable Cow

A good example of what the Holstein cow will do in the hands of the average dairy farmer is furnished by Mr. Fred C. Clark, Victoria, P.E.I. Mr. Clark writes:

"I am sending you the yearly milk record of Jacoba E., bred by Logan Bros., Amherst Point, N.S. We began weighing March 20th, 1905, and weighed every milking with the exception of the week she spent at the "fair," which was estimated from previous week. Regular samples of milk were taken from six or eight consecutive milkings and tested by our creamery man, from whose figures the amount of butter is taken. As correct an account as possible was kept of feed consumed, and were charged her at the following figures: Roots, $2 per ton; hay $10 per ton; grain and meal, $1 per hundred, and pasture and green feed, $12 for season, make a total cost of $40.55. Her monthly amounts of milk were as follows: March 464, April 1231, May 1170, June 1092, July 1208, August 1170, June 1092, July 1208, August 1170, September 1003, October 1221, November 791, December 638, January 661, February 559, March 841, total 11,449 lbs. milk and 515 lbs. estimated butter. Her milk at average price received at Tryon creamery, where the milk was sent, amounted to $93.70, and the skim milk at 20 cents per hundred was worth $20 more, or a total of $113.70, which, after deducting the cost of feed, leaves to her credit a total of $73.16, to say nothing of a bouncing heifer calf. I consider the use of scales and keeping a dairy record of great value in a dairy herd, as I am convinced that Jacoba E. gave several thousand more than the previous year, as we were able to keep track of how she was doing, and took greater interest in the work, and next season intend to keep a record of the rest of the herd."

Increased Pay For Jurors

Ottawa Citizen: Essex County jurors want an increase of pay when serving. The grand jurors in their presentment asked that they be allowed three dollars a day and Chancellor Boyd agreed that in view of the prosperous condition of the county the advance would be justified. The statute provides that jurors shall receive a minimum pay of two dollars per day, but the county councils have it in their power to increase the allowance to three dollars. The pay would appear to be a matter purely of county politics and the jurors of Essex or any other county will receive the larger sum just so soon as the councils orders it.

There is a feeling among Carleton county jurors that they are inadequately paid, receiving only the minimum allowance fixed by statute. Albeit it has been the practice in Carleton for years back to allow jurors who have served over night or on a jury after 8 p.m. for an extra day. This rule was not observed in the Boyer trial in the late assize and dissatisfaction was freely expressed by jurors who had served one night, for which they were refused the extra pay, this disallowance being ordered, it is said, by Judge Anglin. At the same time officers of the court were allowed for the extra time. This policy of retrenchment will scarcely be popular. Chancellor Boyd's view may be taken to more truly reflect the sentiment of the people. Under altered conditions, with the prevailing higher price of living and the wonderful prosperity of the country, an increase of pay for jurors will not fail to command popular approval. The addition of one dollar a day to the pay of jurors means much to men who are compelled to leave their farms and possibly hire help during their absence, while it would be an inappreciable addition to the taxes of the body of the ratepayers.

Too Busy to Whistle.

It is said the art of whistling will soon be counted among the lost unless there is a revival of the cheery spirit that seems to be forsaking men. Nobody whistles as he works in these strenuous days. He has too much on his mind to pucker his lips in a whistle. Nor does he hum or sing to himself for that matter. Life is, if not downright sad, too busy for that joyous and unconscious expression of contentment.

Happy Days.

Advertisements under this heading TWO CENTS word; subsequent consecutive insertions one cent a word. No local charged as less than twenty-five words.

A great deal is said in advertisements about the quality of goods, but we think nothing is so convincing as the offer of the "SALADA" Tea Co, who are always inviting the public to go into their grocer's, get a packet of their tea and try it for a couple of days, and if they do not find it much superior to the tea they are using, it can be returned to the grocer, they getting the full amount paid for the packet in return for the half empty one. This is a more convincing proof of quality than a dozen page advertisements.

FOUR MAGAZINES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

COOPERATION IN ADVERTISING MAKES IT POSSIBLE.

Half price offers are but combinations of advertising. In a word, four magazines band together, use the same publicity and share the expenses. Four magazines working together reduce the cost of publicity about one-fourth of what it would be if taken up alone. The receipts are approximately the same as if the publicity were carried on independently. And who receives the benefits from this publicity club? The patron of the magazines, inasmuch as he secures a reduction in the subscription price made possible by economy. And thus the home can now secure three, four and five periodicals, which present-day needs require, for little more than the old-time price of a single magazine, that once was the solitary visitor to the family circle.

For instance, Combination No. 2, advertised by the Central Magazine Agency in our columns, offers The Cosmopolitan Magazine, $1.00; The Harper's Bazar, $1.00; The Home Magazine, $1.00, and The Reader Magazine, $3.00—total value, $6.00—all four for $3.00, one-half price, a saving of fifty per cent.

Another good offer is The Delineator, McClure's Magazine, The World's Work and The Home Magazine. These four may be had for just $3.50.

One of the best bargains ever offered is The Cosmopolitan Magazine, The World To-day and The Home Magazine, all three for one year for just $2.00.

For $2.00 you can secure a year's subscription to The Cosmopolitan The World To-day and The Home Magazine.

For $2.50 you can have The Cosmopolitan, $1.00; Home Magazine, $1.00; The Reader Magazine, $3.00, at one-half price, $2.50. All three for less than the price of one.

The best bargain of the year, however, is The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, Harper's Bazar and The Reader Magazine, total value, $6.00—all for half price, $3.00. This is positively the best bargain of the year.

Before subscribing to any magazines our readers should write the Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind., for prices. Further than this if you have spare time and want to earn Christmas money, the Central Magazine Agency will pay you a liberal commission on these great magazine combinations. You will be surprised to find how easy it is to make from $10.00 to $100.00 a week in securing orders from your neighbors. You can save them from 40 to 50 per cent. on their year's magazines and make a handsome commission for yourself.

To any newsdealer, druggist or agent who will act as our agent we will run their name and address at the bottom of our large display advertising. Our commission to agents or newsdealers is 35 cents an order.

Write to-day for our special offer or send your order for any of the combinations mentioned above. Remember, The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, The Reader Magazine and Harper's Bazar—all four for $3.00—total value, $6.00. You save 50 per cent. To-morrow's International Sunday School Lesson.

THE TEN VIRGINS — GOLDEN TEXT: "WATCH, THEREFORE; FOR YE KNOW NEITHER THE DAY NOR THE HOUR WHEREIN THE SON OF MAN COMETH."

HISTORICAL SETTING.

Time—Tuesday afternoon, April 4, the third day before the crucifixion. The afternoon of the same day as last lesson.

Place.—On the way from the temple to Bethany, on the Mount of Olives overlooking Jerusalem.

Place in the Life of Christ.—The last day of his public teaching. The beginning of his final instructions to his disciples before his crucifixion.

THE PARABLE ENFORCING THE DUTY OF WATCHFULNESS.

The parable of the virgins is one of the most beautiful and touching of the parables. Poetry, painting, and the drama have combined to give it an exceptional hold on the Christian imagination. The weird pathos of the story is unspeakable. The occasion is so happy, the agents so interesting, the issue so tragic.

1. Then, at the coming of the Lord and his kingdom, as decribed in the last chapter. The kingdom of heaven, which Christ came to inaugurate on earth. Be likened unto ten virgins. The condition of things at that time, and the duties and dangers connected with it, are represented and illustrated by the following parable, which applies to every stage of that coming, especially to the coming completed at the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the final coming at the end of the world. The destruction of Jerusalem, marked the end of the old dispensation, and the separate beginning of the new. The forty years from the return of Christ by the resurrection and the coming of the Holy Spirit, up to the end of the old dispensation, was the period of grafting the new on to the old. And went forth to meet the bridegroom. Went forth from their homes to meet and join the procession as it moved from the house of the bride to the home of the bridegroom, where the wedding feast was held.

2. Five of them were wise, and five were foolish. There is no significance in the number, nor in the fact that the wise numbered the same as the foolish. The representation is simply that there are two kinds of people, those who watch and those who do not.

3. They that were foolish took their lamps. The band of maidens who by arrangement were to join the procession at an appointed stage, to sing a hymn of welcome, were furnished each with a lamp. It was small and flat, shaped like a butter-boat, prolonged somewhat at one end, where was a hole from which protruded the wick, and at the other end was the handle by which it was carried. It was filled from a hole in the top. Being generally of small capacity, it required to be accompanied by some kind of oil vessel, for the supply of that which was necessary to keep up the light. Took no oil with them, in a vessel to be carried for this purpose. They were careless and failed in watchfulness.

4. The wise took oil in their vessels. The point of this in the parable is that these virgins were watching in the only way they could watch, by making full preparations for what was coming.

5. While the bridegroom tarried. When the wedding day arrived the bride put on white robes, often richly embroidered, decked herself with jewels, fastened the indispensable bridal girdle about her waist, covered herself with a veil, and placed a garland on her head. The bridegroom, arrayed in his best attire, set out from his home for the house of the bride's parents, attended by friends, accompanied by musicians and singers; and, if the procession moved at night, by persons bearing torches. Having received the bride from her parents, he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father's house with song, music and dancing. On the way back they were joined by the maiden friends of the bride and groom. Tarried. Everywhere, but especially in the Orient, where time seems to be of little account, delays are almost certain to occur.

6. And at midnight. After long and unexpected delays. There was a cry made. Either the cry of heralds, as was sometimes the custom, or the noise of the approaching crowds with shouts and snatches of song and the flash of the torches. Behold the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. This was literally the substance of his dragoman's call.

7. Trimmed their lamps, which had been kept burning.

8. The foolish, who had come without forethought of so long a delay, said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. Rather, as in the R.V., "are going out," for want of oil.

9. Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you. The reply is not selfish, even in the figure, for there was not enough for us and you. To have divided the oil would have entirely defeated the purpose of the procession, and all would have gone to the wedding with emblems of mourning.

Go . . . to them that sell, and buy. That is as applied to us, go to the means of grace, to the sources whence character and principle can be gained, to the Holy Spirit, to the Scriptures.

10. And while they went to buy. The stores would all be shut before this time, and the keepers be watching the procession. It is not possible to prepare for emergencies and testing times at the moment. He that would swim ashore from the wreck must have learned to swim before the emergency came. The bridegroom came. To his destination. They that were ready went in. Such only can go in by the necessity of the case. And the door was shut. As was the custom, in order to give security and peace to those within, and to keep out intruders who have no right to enter.

11. Afterward came . . . . the other virgins. As Esau came too late for the blessing, which no tears could give him.

12. I know you not. I do not recognize you as belonging to the procession and to the guests. In the application of the parable this means that they were not fitted to enter the kingdom of heaven and to enjoy its blessings because they had refused to use the divine helps for cultivating the character by which alone any one could enter.

13. Watch, therefore, because your circumstances will be in many respects like those of the virgins in the parable. There are three Greek words used for "watch," Gregoreite, in this verse, presents the picture of a sleeping man rousing himself, awake, alert.

For ye know neither the day nor the hour. This fact is one of the great motives for watching by being prepared. Many a young man finds no oil in his lamp when the procession of opportunities passes by him. He imagines that he is unlucky. In reality, he was simply unprepared. Wherein the Son of Man cometh. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." The comings of the Lord are ever unexpected to us—his coming at death, his coming to judge the world, his coming in the crisis of our lives, his coming with opportunities and open doors, his coming with the power of the Holy Spirit. The only way is for us to be ever about our Master's business, ever doing his will, ever loving his presence, ever walking with God, and we shall be ready and glad when he comes.

Usually we cannot prepare for the testing times of life at the moment. When the opportunity to rule "the cities" comes, we are not prepared to do it, unless we have faithfully used the "ten talents." When the great work of our lives comes to us, we shall fail, unless our past has been preparing us for it.

The Great Value of the Things We Should Watch for. We are to watch for the coming of the Lord, watch for it with hope and joy; watch for the signs of his special presence and power, watch for openings to serve him by helping his poor children, watch for opportunities of comforting the sad, upholding the weak, reclaiming the erring, teaching the ignorant, leading men to Jesus, aiding his cause. "The church should march with its face towards the future." "When Christ bids us watch, he bids us thus look forward for our Christ"—to be "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ."

The Greatness of the Dangers We are to Watch Against. The terrible times Jesus had foretold were full of temptations to desert his cause, to deny the Master, to become cold and worldly. Life is full of temptations from without and from within. We have to watch against the evil tendencies of the times, the pervading iniquities which fill the air with moral malaria, or even chill the piety of the church; against the sudden assaults of the temper to passion, or lust, or dishonesty, or selfishness; against failure in duty; against the loss of the warmth of first love; against the day of death and of judgment, so as to be prepared for them when they come.

It does do good baking

This is the range that bakes better because the diffusive oven flue draws in cold air from the kitchen-floor, carries it around the oven, and pours it HOT down into the oven FROM THE TOP in a current that moves all round the whole oven and up and out the flue. When that clean, hot air leaves the oven it takes with it all the moisture, all the odors, which in OTHER ovens stay in and saturate the baking food. Perfect draft control, perfect oven, draw-out oven rack for easy basting,—all points singular to

And the brain centres that do their work were built up for, and originally adapted to, out-door use, and when they are required to do near work constantly, then a strain takes place deep in the middle of the brain to sustain the near focus and convergence of the eyes, and this strain continued, produces nervous breakdown, in many cases wrecking the health. A noted specialist says; "People living in bright and sunny countries are irritable and have nervous temperaments due to strong light, persons living in foggy countries, have calm, quiet nervous systems, many physicians advise their patients to go to foggy climates for rest and recuperation," but this is not necessary if such will wear the "Prentice glasses," as THEY will have the same effect; we have had many proofs of this of late in our own experience. Cars Derailed

At a late hour last night some cars of a freight train were derailed near Napanee. No person was injured and the damage done was slight. The auxiliary from here was sent to the scene to assist in replacing the cars upon the track.

Why do you shun real publicity. Failing to use the "wants" sometimes amounts to that."

Jury Imputes Neglect To Trenton Electric Co.

WELSH INQUEST CONCLUDED LAST NIGHT—MANY MORE WITNESSES EXAMINED—THE VERDICT REACHED.

The inquest to enquire into the cause of death of the young man, Wm. J. Welsh, who on Friday evening, the 5th inst., was killed, it is alleged, by coming into contact with a live electric wire, which had fallen, was continued and concluded last night.

Dr. Yeomans, coroner, presided. Mr. F. J. M. Anderson represented the Crown, and Mr. S. Masson was present on behalf of the Trenton Electric and Water Company. Many interested spectators were present and considerable evidence was submitted.

THE EVIDENCE.

George Belcher testified that he was a blacksmith by occupation. He had lived about nine years near where the accident occurred. Knew the young man Welsh, who was killed on Friday evening last. At about 6.10 the witness saw the wire was down and he had heard warning given to Mr. Stepley not to drive over the wire. Witness helped James Ross to carry the body of Wm. Welsh home. This was about 6.30. He never knew of the wire being down before, but had heard that it was down before. After the accident witness went to Mr. Aselstine's place of business, and the latter telephoned to the police station. Mr. Aselstine told witness that he had previously sent word to the power house of the wire being down. The wire was not pulled up until 8 o'clock. Could not tell what condition the cross-arm of the electric pole was in, as he did not examine it.

Examined by Mr. Masson — It was five minutes after 8 o'clock when Mr. Thompson came down from the pole after elevating the wire. Witness was positive of the time as he looked at his watch. They were 10 or 15 minutes making temporary repairs to the wire.

Wm. J. Hanna swore that he, a boilermaker by profession, remembered the night Welsh was killed. He went to the power house and notified Mr. J. Munro that the wire was down. This was about 6.30. Witness asked Mr. Munro if he could not shut off the power, as he (witness) said that this might better be done than have any person killed. Munro said he could not do that, but offered witness 50 cents if he would go and watch the wire. When witness went back to where the wire was down, Welsh had been killed and parties were carrying the body into the house. The power was not turned off. Did not see Mr. Ostrom at the power house, but saw the fireman, Mr. Munroe was the only person he spoke to Witness saw the wire was down before he went to the power house and it was down when he returned. Saw no sparks or light from the wire. Mr. Thompson came and fixed the wire. Witness saw the cross-bar on the pole on Saturday morning, and it was rotten. Saw Mr. Ross cut a piece of the cross-bar off. Could not say that there was an insulator on the cross-piece, as he had not seen it. Where the accident occurred there is considerable traffic. A year ago the wire was down at this same place.

Examined by Mr. Masson — It took witness about 10 minutes to reach the power house from his home. Was not at the power house more than five minutes, and ran all the way back. Could not tell what time the doctors arrived.

Charles Kelleher sworn, said he was a boilermaker. First knew of the accident to Welsh about twenty minutes to 7 o'clock. Did not know the wire was down until he heard of the death of the young man. Heard the wire was down before, but he did not know of it personally. Saw the wire down, and it was, in his opinion, dangerous. Did not notify any person or warn any person, as there were others who were doing this. Could not tell in what condition the cross-bar was. Saw the deceased at his father's place just before the accident. Had no conversation with any of the employees of the Electric company. The wire had been up about three years. Could not tell whether the line had been inspected or not.

Examined by Mr. Masson—The line might have been inspected previous to the accident, but he was not aware of it.

John Munro testified that he remembered the evening Mr. Welsh was killed. Witness was at the power house of the Trenton Electric Company at the time, he being in charge. George Cronkwright, another employee, was there at the time, engaged in firing. On the evening in question, from 6.20 until 9 o'clock, a portion of the power for supplying lights about the city came from the city power house. When the plant was shut down at 9 o'clock it did not affect the current upon this particular wire. From the power house here the current could have been shut off and the wire would have been harmless. He remembered seeing Mr. Hanna that evening. The time was between 6.40 and 6.45. He remembered distinctly looking at the clock on the wall, whilst Mr. Hanna was talking to him. Hanna remained there about five minutes, as witness hurried him away as quickly as possible after being informed of his mission. Witness did not hear Hanna say that the power should be shut off. If he did say this witness did not hear it. Witness told Hanna that he would give him 50 cents if he would go back and watch the wire, as any person touching it would be killed. Had no instruction to shut down the plant if a wire was down, and if the power was off the city would be in darkness. Witness received his instructions from Mr. Hicks, superintendent of the company. The instructions to witness were to keep the line in repair. There was no particular instructions as to what to do if a wire was down, except to raise it. Witness was also instructed to make inspection of poles, cross arms, wires, etc. These instructions were not hung up in the office. The cross arm where the wire fell was inspected by witness on the 2nd of April, as he was wiring a bracket on the pole at that time. Witness, at that time sat on both sides of the cross arm. The end at that time did not exhibit any signs of being rotten. He was in charge of the men when the arm was first placed in position, and it appeared to be perfectly sound. The arm was painted when it was received here. He had not discovered any unsound arms on the poles about the city since the accident. Mr. Ostrom was not at the power house that evening. After Mr. Hanna left, witness heard from Mr. Ostrom by 'phone that young Welsh had been killed. This was about 6.50. As soon as possible after the accident Mr. Thompson was secured and he went to where the wire was down and raised it up.

Examined by Mr. Masson—Witness said his duties were those of a foreman for construction. The pins did not give way when he made repairs upon the cross piece in April last. The arm was put on in 1901. It was about 7.45 when Hanna was at the power house. As soon as Hanna left witness went to the 'phone to call Mr. Ostrom, but the 'phone was ringing and Mr. Ostrom was calling witness in reference to the accident. When the power is shut off at 9 o'clock the switch is turned off and the power comes from Trenton to supply the light.

Re-examined by the Coroner—The cross arm produced was the same one that he was working upon on April 2nd, and he did not discover that it was all rotten.

To a juryman—The current was not shut off when the repair was made on the night of the accident. Had he shut down when Hanna came to the power house, Welsh might not have been killed.

Henry Thompson testified that his position with the Trenton Electric Company was to look after the meters and to make repairs when he is called upon to do so. Never heard of any one being appointed as an inspector of the line. The only inspection witness knew of was that made by Mr. Munro. On the night of the accident Mr. Ostrom came to witness' home about 7.10 and told him a wire was down and some one had been killed. Witness drove to the scene of the accident and found the wire down about two feet from the ground. The wire was an obstruction to traffic, and was also dangerous. The pin coming out of the cross bar caused the wire to fall. From its looks the end of the cross bar was rotten, which caused the pin to come out. Could not tell how long it would take a sound piece of timber to become in the condition of the piece produced. Witness never before repaired the line at the place of the accident.

Examined by Mr. Masson—It probably took 10 minutes to tie up the line. When he was through, in company with Mr. Ostrom, he drove to the police station. It was then 5 minutes to 8 or 5 minutes after 8.

W. R. Ostrom testified that he was Assistant Secretary of the Trenton Electric Company, and had been in their employ about 10 years. He was the local representative here. Mr. Hicks, of Trenton, was the mechanical engineer. Mr. Munro was foreman of construction and repairs, and looked after the line in the city. Witness never made any inspection of the line, but an inspection is being continuously made. Was not aware that any wires about the city were not properly covered. It was Mr. Munro's duty to replace such wires. The voltage that night, he was told, was 2080. There were no printed rules regarding inspection, so far as he knew. There was a book kept for all complaints and Mr. Munro is informed and immediately makes repairs. He believed the cross arm produced was the one that was taken from the pole where the wire dropped.

Cross-examined by Mr. Masson—The wire is the best that can be secured, and he (witness) had seen the wire where the accident occurred and it appeared to be all right. When he went to the police station, after temporary repairs had been made to the wire, it was 7.55.

Re-examined by the Coroner—The piece of wire that was down is now at the office. It was taken off the day after the accident and another piece substituted. Mr. Hicks, the superintendent, ordered the wire cut and he (witness) had inspected it. It was perfectly insulated. It was in possession of the Belleville office at present.

This concluded the evidence.

CORONER SUMS UP.

The Coroner briefly summed up the evidence submitted and complimented the jury upon the careful attention they had given. He touched upon the facts as presented and told the jury their duty was to record a verdict in accordance with the evidence and the oath they had taken. The questions they had to determine was this: Was it negligence on the part of the company, negligence on the part of the deceased, or purely an accident that caused young Welsh's death? The jurymen must also decide whether, to their minds, a proper inspection of the wires and poles was made.

THE VERDICT.

The jury, after being out for some minutes, returned the following verdict:

"That the said Wm. J. Welsh met his death on Friday, Oct. 5, by coming in contact with a live wire, which fell from a pole on the corner of Moira and St. Charles streets, through the defect of the cross arm upon the pole, and through the neglect of the Trenton Electric and Water Company in not making a proper inspection."

Two Runaways

Last evening a team of horses belonging to Mr. W. Lambert, and attached to a hack, became frightened at the G. T. R. station and ran away. The animals ran for some distance and whilst they were proceeding down Victoria avenue the hack came in contact with a pole. The result was that the vehicle was considerably damaged. No person was in the rig at the time.

A horse belonging to Mr. A. Watson, and attached to a bread wagon ran away yesterday afternoon on Mill street, and shortly after proceeding over the upper bridge the wagon was upset and somewhat damaged. A few loaves of bread were scattered about the street.

IN AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE EAST HASTINGS CONSERVATIVE ASSOCIATION—OFFICERS ELECTED FOR ENSUING YEAR.

Shannonville, Oct. 12.—The annual meeting of the East Hastings Conservative Association, held here this afternoon, was well attended, representatives being present from nearly every part of the riding. President H. K. Denyes occupied the chair, and, after briefly referring to the encouraging outlook for the Conservative party in Dominion politics, asked for nominations for officers for the ensuing year. The following were unanimously elected;

Hon. President—Dr. Newton.
President—H. K. Denyes.
Vice President—G. M. Campbell.
Secretary-Treasurer — W. J. Malley.

The following were elected vice-presidents for the different municipalities;

Tyendinaga—Matthew Hill.
Thurlow—C. Weese.
Hungerford—Geo. Brown.
Deseronto—Jas. Fairburn.
Tweed—Dr. P. T. Bowlby.

Mr. A. A. Richardson, the Conservative candidate at the last provincial election, made an interesting and inspiring address. He referred to the great natural resources of the Province of Ontario, its healthy climate, and vigorous population, and said he was proud that after a struggle of 34 years against an unscrupulous party, the province was blessed with good, honest government. He contrasted in a forcible manner the business-like principles of the Whitney Government with the corruption and maladministration of the Ross regime, referring particularly to the difference in the disposal of the vast pulpwood concessions of the country. If we were to enjoy civil and religious liberty, he said, it must come through the efforts of the Liberal-Conservative party.

Mr. W. B. Northrup, M. P., held the attention of the meeting while he described at length the extravagance and graft of the Laurier Administration. He referred to the purchase and equipment of a Government yacht which had cost the country over $18,000 and had never been of the slightest service to the country. The Opposition during the last session had been actively engaged unearthing scandals and would vigorously follow up the work during the approaching session. The speaker was confident that there was a feeling against the Laurier Government sweeping over the country as strong as that which had driven out the Ross Administration.

Addresses were delivered by other prominent Conservatives of the riding, after which resolutions of confidence in the Whitney Government and the Opposition at Ottawa were unanimously passed. The next annual meeting will be held at Roslin.

The Ontario Bank Situation in Toronto

LIVELY RUN ON THE MAIN AND BRANCH OFFICES THIS MORNING, BUT ANXIETY SOON ABATED — PRESIDENT MAKES A STATEMENT.

Toronto, Oct. 13.—(Special.)— There was a lively run on the main and branch offices of the Ontario Bank here to-day, but as soon as placards were hung up in conspicuous places bearing the words "Bank of Montreal," the anxiety seemed to abate and the crowding and shoving ceased. Up till noon, however, the clerks were kept busy paying out sums varying from $5 to $5000.

Before the doors of the Bank were opened the Bank of Montreal had placed many thousands of dollars at the disposal of each office, and with this in hand, in addition to ready money which was already in the offices, no difficulty was experienced in paying all who demanded withdrawals of their deposits. At 12 o'clock the doors of the offices closed, and on Monday all the Ontario bank books will be exchanged for Bank of Montreal books.

Mr. Geo. R. R. Cockburn, President of the Ontario Bank, is authority for the statement this morning that the speculations of General Manager McGill will reduce the bank funds by $1,250,000. The public are assured, however, of getting all their money through the Bank of Montreal surety.

Masons at Tweed.

The dedication of a new Masonic hall at Tweed last night was the reason for many prominent craftsmen of this city going out there. Col. Ponton, acting Grand Master, performed the dedicatory ceremonies. The banquet which followed was most enjoyable. Happy and eloquent speeches were made by Messrs. Northrup, Ponton, Johnson and O'Flynn, of this city. The Quinte quartette, Messrs. Burrows, Wrightmyer, Doyle and Taylor, was present, and the boys covered themselves with glory in their numbers.

Threatened to Use Axe On His Wife.

Henry Brant, a member of the Mohawk tribe, was arrested last night on a warrant which charged him with threatening to harm his wife. It is alleged that Brant said he would take an axe and kill his wife and other members of the family. It appears that there has been for some time trouble in the family over money matters. The accused is a man about 60 years of age, and has a grown-up family.

Brant was this morning up before Magistrate Flint, when the matter was investigated.

As a result of the investigation Brant was bound over in his own recognizances to keep the peace and an amicable arrangement was effected between the accused and members of the family.

Mr. Carnew appeared for the prosecution and Mr. McMahon for the defendant.

When the Liver is out of Order calomel, cascara, salts, strong liver pills and purging mineral waters won't do any permanent good.

When a person is bilious, the liver is not giving up enough bile to move the bowels regularly—and some of the bile is being absorbed by the blood. In other words, the liver is in a weakened, unhealthy condition.

Now, purgatives don't act on the liver at all. They merely irritate the bowels, and afford only temporary relief. But FRUIT-A-TIVES are the one true LIVER TONIC. They act directly on the liver—strengthen and invigorate this vital organ—and put it in a normal, healthy condition.

FRUIT-A-TIVES also stimulate the glands of the skin—and regulate the kidneys and sweeten the stomach. When skin, liver and kidneys are normally healthy, there can be no biliousness, no constipation, no kidney trouble, no impure blood, no headaches.

No other medicine known to science is so reliable and so effective in curing Biliousness as these fruit-liver tablets.

FRUIT-A-TIVES are fruit juices with tonics added—and are free from alcohol and dangerous drugs. 50c. a box or 6 for $2.50. Sent on receipt of price, if your druggist does not handle them.

McINTOSH BROS.

FOWLER SAYS "I WON'T"

M.P. Refuses to Tell Commission of the Ryan $55,000.

Arraigns the Tribunal—Lively and Prolonged Colloquy Between Witness and Counsel Concludes With a Red-Hot Attack on Commission, Which, Mr. Fowler Says, Has Been Actuated by Political Vindictiveness.

Toronto, Oct. 13.—Mr. E. F. A. DuVernet, K. C., explained to the Insurance Commission yesterday certain dealing in connection with the reorganization of the Union Trust Co., Mr. Wilson's evidence of Thursday afternoon having made it necessary for Mr. Shepley to call him.

Mr. DuVernet characterized as an "absolute mistake" Mr. Wilson's statement that he (Mr. DuVernet) was giving him $2,500 out of his own pocket.

No Penalty For Mr. Fowler, M. P.

Mr. Shepley asked the Insurance Commission to impose a penalty on Mr. G. W. Fowler, M. P., for his continued absence from the inquiry. After hearing Mr. Fowler's defence, however, the Commission decided not to impose such penalty, but warned him to be more careful in future.

Mr. Fowler in his evidence said that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann endorsed a note for $14,000 which was part of their first payment to the C. P R., and there was also an arrangement that if the lands remained on their hands to be sold by retail Mackenzie and Mann would finance seven-tenths of the property for which they were to get one-half of the seven-tenths.

Mr. Fowler also told how they had been refused the C. P. R. lands for $3.50 per acre at first, but after two interviews with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy and other officials they got them at that price, on the grounds that that was the price the lands were selling for at the time of the application, which was just before the raise to $5 per acre.

The Ryan Options.

Mr. Fowler told of the different options he had got from Mr. Ryan—one for $200,000 and one for $250,000. The difference he was to have as his profits. Mr. Shepley asked numerous questions, and the witness explained that the property was bought under the conditions that he was to make money out of it, and in good faith because he took one-quarter interest. When the Foresters bought the property they paid $265,000; it was now worth $600,000.

"Would you consider it proper to put before your intended partner the statement that you had paid more than you did?" asked Mr. Shepley.

"No," replied witness.

"Did you intend them to believe that you had paid the amount of the $250,000 option?"

"I won't answer that," was the firm rejoinder.

"Then the option was reduced to $225,000, which you put forward to your partners as indicating the price you were paying Ryan?" pursued counsel.

"You can put any inflection or inference you like on it. I put it forward to indicate what I was paying Ryan."

"Do you suppose they believed that was the correct option?"

"I did not suppose anything. They could believe what they like. They never asked me and I never told them. If they would have asked me if I was making a profit I would have told them."

"Will you make any further answer?" queried Mr. Shepley.

Fowler Says "I Won't."

"No, I won't." The refusal was flat.

"Did Ryan pay you the $55,000?"

"That is between Ryan and myself. I decline to answer."

Mr. Shepley asked for a ruling, and Judge MacTavish told witness to answer, but he declined again, and Judge MacTavish said: "It is a proper question and must be answer."

Mr. Fowler addressed the Commission. This might be subject to litigation. He would not answer it.

"Did Peter Ryan pay you $55,000?" asked Mr. Shepley.

"Not all of it."

"How much does he owe?"

"Can you find out?"

Mr. Shepley produced certain cheques, which witness assented to, showing that he received up to the amount of $40,000. He would find out what $2,000 cheques that he had forgotten.

"Who did you pay the money out to?"

"I don't know whether I will tell or not. Why should I tell?"

Mr. Shepley explained very carefully what the enquiry was for. Mr. Fowler argued that the whereabouts of the money was not revelant. He had sold the property to the Great West Land Co., and whether he got a portion or not made no difference.

Mr. Shepley then read Mr. Foster's evidence, which said that Fowler was the agent of the Union Trust Co.

Doesn't Care What Foster Said.

"What do I care what Foster said? I was not agent," declared Mr. Fowler.

"Must I be bound by what you say?"

"No."

"I won't waste any more time," said Mr. Shepley. "Will you answer the question."

"No. I was not an agent of the company."

"Will the court rule on this also?" asked Mr. Shepley.

Again Judge MacTavish sparred for wind, and Mr. Fowler explained the whole story again and swore positively that he was not an agent at any time.

Judge MacTavish explained the reasons why Mr. Fowler should answer.

"If you can show one tittle of evidence that I was an agent, I will tell you all. I claim I was not. It is painful to me to put myself in this position."

Judge MacTavish: "We are here to enquire into the affairs of the insurance company, to find out if we can where their money is, where it has gone to, and how it has got there, and we would not be doing our duty under the order-in-council which appointed us unless we followed it to a conclusion, and where, as in this case, there is evidence both ways, witnesses on both sides—put it that way if you like—our duty is not to stop the enquiry but to go on with it."

Says He Was Not an Agent.

Mr. Fowler: "Supposing I am not an agent; your honors surely will tell me that if I am not an agent of the Union Trust Co. that it was my money. Then the documents will show whether I am an agent or not, and if they can produce one tittle of documentary evidence that I am an agent of the Trust Co. in the Kamloops matter I will give you all the information you want as to where the money went to. I say I was not, and the documents show it, and I was acting absolutely and entirely for myself."

Mr. Shepley: "If you had been here in obedience to your subpoena and given us the information you were entitled to furnish your private affairs would not be gone into."

A "Grand Stand Play."

Mr. Fowler: "It was not necessary to take up my private affairs. You knew I would be here, and the whole thing was a grand-stand play. If you want to take this matter up I want you to understand the end of it is not with the Commission. There is a tribunal before which it will be discussed, and the true inwardness, will be shown. It will be shown why this very severe investigation with respect to the Foresters was because it happened, forsooth, that there were some Conservative members of Parliament in connection with this thing. That is why you are pursuing this like a sleuth-hound. That is why we see all this vindictiveness. I do not say the court is lending itself to it, but I can quite understand the influence the crown prosecutor or crown officer would have."

"Does your lordship think it is useful to pursue this?" Mr. Shepley asked, and Judge MacTavish said "No."

Witness then begged pardon for "this digression."

Charcoal Kills Bad Breath.

BAD ODOR OF INDIGESTION SMOKING, DRINKING OR EATING CAN BE INSTANTLY STOPPED.

Sample Package Mailed Free.

Other people notice your bad breath where you would not notice it at all. It is nauseating to other people to stand before them and while you are talking give them a whiff or two of your bad breath. It usually comes from food fermenting on your stomach. Sometimes you have it in the morning,—that awful sour, bilious, bad breath. You can stop that at once by swallowing one or two Stuart Charcoal Lozengers, the most powerful gas and odor absorbers ever prepared.

Sometimes your meals will reveal themselves in your breath to those who talk with you. "You've had onions," or "You've been eating cabbage," and all of a sudden you belch in the face of your friend. Charcoal is a wonderful absorber of odors, as every one knows. That is why Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are so quick to stop all gases and odors of odorous foods, or gas from indigestion.

Don't use breath perfumes. They never conceal the odor, and never absorb the gas that causes the odor. Besides, the very fact of using them reveals the reason for their use. Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges in the first place stop for good all sour brash and belching of gas, and make your breath pure, fresh and sweet, just after you've eaten. Then no one will turn his face away from you when you breathe or talk; your breath will be pure and fresh, and besides your food will taste so much better to you at your next meal. Just try it.

Charcoal does other wonderful things, too. It carries away from your stomach and intestines all the impurities there massed together and which causes the bad breath. Charcoal is a purifier as well as an absorber.

Charcoal is now by far the best, most easy and mild laxative known. A whole boxful will do no harm; in fact, the more you take the better. Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made of pure willow charcoal and mixed with just a faint flavor of honey to make them palatable for you, but not too sweet. You just chew them like candy. They are absolutely harmless.

Get a new, pure, sweet breath, freshen your stomach for your next meal, and keep the intestines in good working order. These two things are the secret of good health and long life. You can get all the charcoal necessary to do these wonderful but simple things by getting Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges. We want you to test these little wonder workers yourself before you buy them. So send us your full name and address for a free sample of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges. Then after you have tried the sample, and been convinced go to your druggist and get a 25c box of them. You'll feel better all over, more comfortable, and "cleaner" inside.

Send us your name and address today and we will at once send you by mail a sample package, free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 60 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

GOLD IN SOLUTION.

There Are Billions of Tons In the Waters of the Oceans.

Do you know that the waters of our globe hold thousands of millions of tons of gold in solution, and that if it were possible to extract the precious metal from the aqueous constituent of our planet gold would be the commonest of the metals? More than 100 years ago the salt boilers on the coast of Maine found slight traces of the precious metal on the sides of the evaporators, and later on Scottish tradesmen in the same article reported gold settlings in the water taken from the mouth of the Dundee. In 1852 the chemists Malaguti and Durocher analyzed waters from several different localities in the several oceans and seas, the result being that they found a slight trace of gold and silver in every specimen tested. Finally, in 1855, they made a grand summary of all their findings, the figures presented with that report being without doubt the most wonderful exhibit that has ever been given to the scientific world.

It was there shown that the average depth of all oceans is 2,500 fathoms, and that the surface area is sufficient to make a grand total of 400,000,000 cubic miles of water, or not less than 1,837,030,272,000,000,000 tons. Each ton of that vast amount of surging liquid holds, at a very low estimate, one-thirteenth of a grain of gold, or a total of not less than 10,250,000,000 tons of the precious metal. If this vast amount of gold could be extracted and thrown upon the market the best financier in the world cannot imagine what the result would be.

A Famous Dwarf.

Count Browiaski, the famous Polish dwarf, was born in 1739 and visited every court in Europe in the century. When six years old he was only seventeen inches in height, though at thirty years of age he grew to be three feet three inches. He had a sister, also a dwarf and so much smaller than himself that she could stand erect under his arm.

The first submarine telegraph wire was laid in 1850 from England to France. Two years later Scotland and Iceland were connected.

Tops.

Tops are cut from pieces of box, ebony or other hard wood by a turning machine. The machine is automatic and turns the top complete from the handle at the upper end to the tip. The metal point is afterward put in by hand.

ASKS $1 PER CAPITA.

Premiers' Conference at Deadlock Over British Columbia's Claims—Unanimity Must Be Reached.

Ottawa, Oct. 13.—The Provincial Premiers have not yet arrived at an agreement regarding the financial demands embodied in the Quebec resolutions. British Columbia was the one question which monopolized the proceedings of the conference all day today. What Premier McBride holds out for is a sliding scale grant of an increased amount for his province, or to refer the whole matter to a commission.

What British Columbia Wants.

Mr. McBride suggests that British Columbia should get $1 per capita, and that as the population increased this amount could be gradually reduced to 25 cents when the population reached two and one-half millions, and to remain permanently at that figure.

The conference does not approve of this. What is suggested is that a special additional grant of from $50,000 to $100,000 should be given to British Columbia, more than the other provinces, because of the difficulties connected with the administration of public affairs in that province.

All the other provinces are agreed, but British Columbia is expected to hold out to the end.

The Premiers will meet again to-day, and if no agreement is arrived at nothing will be done meanwhile.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has made the pronouncement that unanimous decision must be come to by the provinces, else the whole question for the different provinces will revert to himself for decision.

The Fisheries Question.

The special affairs peculiar to the different provinces can be taken up separately with the Dominion Government. Take, for instance, the fisheries in which Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are not concerned. All the provinces with the exception of British Columbia and Ontario have informed the Dominion Government that there will be no difficulty in arranging to give control to the Dominion. Mr. Whitney feels disposed to this as far as the great lakes are concerned, but he would like to consult his colleagues first. Mr. McBride admits the principle that Dominion control is desirable, but has not agreed to it.

As far as Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are concerned they will arrange to give control to the Dominion, so that the work of the conference is progressing satisfactorily.

TROOPS STILL AT BUCKINGHAM.

But Some Arrests Are Expected Within Next 24 Hours.

Buckingham, Que., Oct. 13.—Everything was quiet here yesterday. Work is being continued on the logs and the troops are still on guard, although there are no indications of another attack.

Coroner McMahon, Montreal, has been appointed to conduct the inquest, which will be resumed Monday, and some arrests may be effected by the Theil men within the next 24 hours.

Detective Warner is still in grave danger, but Picuard and Bryant are doing nicely.

The Ottawa troops left for home last night.

Another Writ Issues.

Toronto, Oct. 13.—The sale of the old Upper Canada College grounds loomed up again yesterday when the governors of the Toronto University entered suit against Robert B. Barber to set aside an agreement dated Aug. 5, 1904, claiming that the lands were procured by conspiracy and deceitful and fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the defendant. An accounting of all rents and profits made by the defendant is also asked. It is alleged that Thomas W. Hollwey asked Barber in the same way as he did Foulds to secure the property for himself.

$2,000 Worth of Jewels Stolen.

Toronto, Oct. 13.—Mr. and Mrs. Walter Beardmore of St. George street discovered upon their return home Thursday from a brief trip to Acton that $2,000 worth of jewelry, consisting of a diamond necklace, bracelets and rings, had been stolen from the house in their absence. The house was perfectly locked, as they had left it, but the plunder had been taken from the top drawer of Mrs. Beardmore's dresser, which had been broken into. The police have no clue to the robbery.

Boss Had a Revolver.

London, Oct. 13.—(C. A. P.)—The Chronicle and other papers publish the alleged experience of six Yorkshire men who engaged in railway construction work in Canada, and who state they were made to perform dangerous work by a boss with a big revolver. They complain of the scandalous accommodation.

Man Badly Scalded.

Toronto Junction, Oct. 13.—Yesterday morning at the Martin & Levack abattoir David Logan, one of the employes, turned off a valve in one of the steampipes when it blew off. In staggering away from the escaping steam he fell into a vat of hot water. He was badly scalded, but will recover.

250 Women In Fire Panic.

Protest to Waterways Commission.

Winnipeg, Oct. 13.—The Great Falls Power Co. intends to make representations before the International Waterways Commission at its session in Chicago this month against the proposed diversion of the water of Rainy River, and other sources of the Winnipeg River.

Labor Secretary Guilty.

Proof in Belleville.

Mrs. Green, of East James street, has proven what Anti-Pill can and will do.

"I think Dr. Leonhardt's Anti-Pill is the best medicine I have ever known," says Mrs. A. V. Green. "For years I have suffered with constipation, and I got so bad at last that no ordinary dose of medicine would help me. I suffered with piles a great deal.

"I am a working woman and always very busy, and I got nothing to help me till I tried Dr. Leonhardt's Anti-Pill. I found this a very satisfactory remedy and can cheerfully recommend it to any who may be suffering as I did."

Right at home here in Belleville is this case, and Mrs. Green will cheerfully testify to anyone in earnest what she knows of Anti-Pill, the Twentieth Century Cure for Constipation.

T. P. IN TORONTO.

Queen City Contributes $2,000 to the Irish Parliamentary Fund.

Toronto, Oct. 15.—"At this moment, in a room in Dublin Castle, an Irishman and a home ruler is drafting the scheme which will be proposed to Parliament next February," were the comforting words which T. P. O'Connor, M. P., for the Scotland division of Liverpool, addressed to an audience of 2,500 in Massey Hall last Saturday night. In Dublin Castle, he proceeded, was being laid the foundations of a Irish Parliament.

"I am not ashamed to beg for Ireland. I hope when my history is written that it may be said I was the last beggarman for Ireland since Dan O'Connell."

In this respect also the meeting was very successful, a collection of $1,600 being taken up, which the committee undertook to make up to $2,000 for the funds of the Irish Parliamentary party.

After briefly replying to the address of welcome, Mr. O'Connor delivered his speech on Ireland and home rule.

THE REAL POINT.

Breaking of Irish Union With England Not Canada's Concern.

London, Oct. 15.—(C. A. P.)—Concerning Premier Laurier's declaration that all Canadians are home-rulers. The Times doubts if it will commend itself to the Protestant and Orange feeling in Ontario.

"The real point, however, is that the breaking up or modifications of the union is essentially a matter in which other portions of the empire have no direct concern."

Fever Patient Commits Suicide.

Toronto, Oct. 15.—Despondent and with his mind affected from typhoid fever, Charles Gould, an Englishman, who was admitted to the General Hospital on Friday evening, committed suicide at that institution at 12.30 Sunday morning. Gould climbed out of the fanlight over the window and dropped to the ground, a distance of about 30 feet, sustaining fatal injuries. He had not been in Canada long and in Toronto only a few days. He was a teamster A widow and child are left in the old country.

Why Wampole Suicided.

New York, Oct. 15.—A special to The Times from Philadelphia says:—By a remarkable system of deception Henry K. Wampole, the drug manufacturer, whose body was found recently in East River at New York, dragged his company to the verge of bankruptcy, realized nearly $750,000 on notes, and by other means robbed his business partners of at least $500,000. His partners got an inkling that he had defrauded them only a few days before his death.

London, Oct. 15.—By the death Saturday of Mrs. Sam Lewis, widow of the well-known money lender, about $15,000,000 will be distributed in charitable bequests. King's Hospital comes in for between three and four millions.

President of Ontario Bank Says Manager Was Reckless.

Investments Made In McGill's Name Have Been Handed Over to the Bank—Speculations, Mostly In U.S. Stocks, Had Genesis In Intention to Enlarge the Bank — Formal Transfer to the Bank of Montreal—No "Run."

Toronto, Oct. 15.—The total loss which the Ontario Bank has sustained in a way—criminally or merely unfortunate—yet to be determined, is said to be $1,294,000.

There will be a meeting of the board of directors of the Ontario Bank at 2 o'clock this afternoon, to formally sign, seal and deliver the contract with the Bank of Montreal. E. S. Clouston, president of the Bank of Montreal, and W. S. Clouston, will arrive this morning.

Stock Ventures Reckless.

President Cockburn says: "I honestly believe that General Manager McGill's speculations began in an effort on his part to enlarge the bank. One step led to another, and towards the last he became reckless."

Ex-Manager McGill says: "The losses were made in pursuance of the bank's business. Losses were made on securities. I deny that I have been engaged in speculation with the bank funds on my own account."

Some investments, made in McGill's own name, have been turned over to the bank.

The speculations were mainly in American stocks. Some of the last ventures were very wild.

Get $150,000 Bonus.

At 11.30 Saturday President Cockburn of the Ontario Bank announced that this notice had been sent to the various branch managers:

"Until further instructions regard all the assets and property of your bank as the property of the Bank of Montreal, and regard yourself as acting for that bank."

In an interview, Mr. Cockburn said: "We get a bonus of $150,000 and everything over at the end. The other banks are willing to back the Bank of Montreal to the extent of two and a half millions. Yes, and here's something else. The bankers' fund, you know, guarantees a five per cent. premium on our notes."

Criminal Action In Abeyance.

The Ontario Bank directors are not superseded by the transfer. The question of criminal action has not yet been discussed. Pecuniary, not moral, dividends are sought at present. Discussing the matter of instituting a prosecution, Attorney-General Foy said yesterday that his department had no information of any wrong-doing upon which the Crown could act. If President Cockburn or any shareholder knew that defalcations had been committed, he could lay an information with the magistrate and the law would be set in operation in the ordinary way.

Good News For Shareholders.

President Cockburn intimates that the shareholders, when settlement is made, may not lose much. An expert accountant begins work to-day on the books, and as soon as his report is completed a general meeting of the stockholders of the Ontario Bank will be called.

Practically No "Run."

The "run" on the Ontario Bank locally on Saturday morning will go down in banking history as an affair somewhat lacking in the dramatic interest that usually belongs to an event of the kind. In the head office and in each of the several branches throughout the city placards appeared soon after the opening bearing the simple announcement: "This is the Bank of Montreal." The effect was marked in each case, a number of anxious depositors wavering and then declining to allow their accounts to stand, while remarks freely passed from lip to lip highly complimentary to the soundness of the Bank of Montreal.

In Outside Places.

The branches in various cities and towns where the Ontario Bank has located were opened as usual and all displayed the sign, "This is now the Bank of Montreal." No very serious "run" is reported except at Montreal, where police were called in to maintain order. In some places where the news had not become really known there was no unusual excitement.

Taft's Goodbye to Cuba.

Havana Oct. 15.—Secretary of War Taft and Assistant Secretary of State Bacon completed their labors here Saturday, and this afternoon departed for the United States on board the battleship Louisiana. They were followed to sea and acclaimed by many Liberal and ex-revolutionary leaders, but the former Government officials showed no disposition to join in the farewell.

The principal event of the day preceding the departure of Messrs. Taft and Bacon was the taking over of the Government by Charles Magoon.

Believed To Be Terrorists.

Copenhagen, Oct. 15.—A vessel which arrived here from Russia has on board five stowaways who were detained at the request of the Russian consulate. It is supposed that they are terrorists, who were contemplating the assassination of the Dowager Empress of Russia, who is now here. The police are enquiring into their identity.

$35,000 Fire In Brantford.

Brantford, Oct. 15.—Fire at the Brantford Starch Works Friday was subdued in the north wing. A fire wall between that and the south buildings and a good supply of water stayed further progress of the flames. The loss is estimated at about $35,000, covered by insurance.

Out of Politics.

Amiens, France, Oct. 15.—The Trades Union Congress at its closing session Saturday defeated by 830 to 8 votes, a motion to enter into permanent relations with the Socialists, and adopted a resolution to hold aloof from politics.

Judge Stephen Dying.

St. Stephen, N. B., Oct. 15.—Hon. Judge Stephen, who has been ill for a few days, is sinking fast and his physicians say he cannot live.

Chilean Ministry Beaten.

Santiago, Chile, Oct. 15.—The Chamber of Deputies Saturday night voted against the Government over the nomination of a member of the Council of State. This throws out President Montt's first Ministry.

Don Pedro Montt was inaugurated President of Chile Sept. 18, in succession to Jermain Riesco.

Cowan Not Guilty.

Quebec, Oct. 15.—The jury in the Cowan manslaughter case returned a verdict of not guilty on Saturday. This leaves the tragedy of the Louise Basin of July 13 unsolved.

Mr. Borden's Scathing Indictment.

Speaking on Friday evening, Oct. 5, at Pembroke, the leader of the Opposition thus summed up the record of the Laurier Administration:

"In Opposition the present Liberal leaders declared that Canada's taxation and expenditure were excessive, but since attaining power they have practically doubled both. They rallied against the iniquities of the customs tariff, proclaiming emphatically that the protective principle was absolutely unsound and harmful. In power they have maintained that principle, although, when expedient, they still pose as free traders. They inveighed against corruption and extravagance in the expenditure of public money, but in power they have openly and defiantly encouraged the system of illegitimate profit, commonly called rake-off, which prevails in many public departments. They inveighed against any increase of the public debt, and now with abounding revenues they have largely added to it, spending huge sums without regard to public interest, for the benefit of favored partisans. They pledged themselves to maintain the independence of Parliament, yet whenever necessary they retain the votes of wavering followers by direct and even written promises of office. They declared that all public lands should be for the actual settler and then enrich their grasping partisans by transferring to them huge blocks of the public domain. They pledged themselves to secure uniform and non partisan voting lists and then disfranchised nine thousand Conservative voters in Manitoba by the thin red line outrage. They pledged themselves to prohibition upon a Dominion plebiscite and when confronted with a larger majority in its favor than any Government ever received, they found evasion in a condition until then unheard of. They pledged themselves to abolish or amend the Senate, and now that a Liberal majority in that chamber has been secured they regard it as sufficiently amended. They proclaimed high standards for appointments to public office and they have violated all decency when it was necessary to reward unscrupulous party servants. They promised purity in elections and they have organized, maintained and protected the machine which has continued to perpetrate the grossest and most outrageous election frauds ever known in any country."

During the course of the same speech, Mr. Borden called attention to a grave discrepancy between the immigration figures returned by the Government and the actual proceeds. The figures quoted by the Government, with the natural increase of the population, would give the West a population of 1,061,491, but it had only 805,000, or 200,000 too few. Where had the balance which had been paid for by the Government gone to? Mr. Borden asked. Mr. Preston might shed some light on the matter, but he has gone off to China, Japan and Corea. It would puzzle Sir Richard's most skilful "tracer" to tell where he is at any given time. Hon. Mr. Oliver, of the Interior, might be able to solve the mystery, but to do so might "compromise others." Underneath Mr. Borden's remarks lies the question where the $300,000 that passed through the hands of the chief immigration agent all went to? There was $166,000 paid to a bogus company for printing. So far it was clear enough. What Mr. Roy Somerville did for the money is not explained. It remains a mystery along with the composition of the bogus immigration partnership known as the North Atlantic Trading Company. Preston tries to get out of the bother when at Ottawa by saying the country got the immigrants. It may have got some, but Mr. Borden shows that the number the country was entitled to fell short by 200,000. If the $5 a head was paid on the shortage the country is sadly out of pocket, and some one made a "pot," which he hadn't ought to. Really, Sir Wilfrid is very much to blame for all this immigration muddle and loss. If he had set his foot down good and hard it need not have happened. They say he can do it when he likes. Yet often it is wiser to wink the eye or look another way than to face a thing out, that is to say, from the point of view of a corrupt rule.

Preston seems to have been master of the situation, not Sir Wilfrid.

Stomach Troubles and Constipation

No one can reasonably hope for good digestion when the bowels are constipated. Mr. Chas. Baldwin, of Edwardsville, Ill., says: "I suffered from chronic constipation and stomach troubles for several years, but thanks to Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets am almost cured." Why not get a package of these tablets and get well and stay well? Price 25 cents. Sample free. To be had at R. Templeton & Co., drug store.

TIMELY TOPICS.

Beautiful autumn weather just now.

Old Dame Nature has painted the leaves as brilliantly as ever. As a landscape beautifier Nature can beat anybody.

• • •

Talking of beautifying the landscape, some people wonder when that pile of dirt in front of Bridge Street Church is going to be removed.

The man on the next block had his ear to the ground this morning. He said he was listening eagerly, expecting to hear Mayor Sulman say something about a third term.

Queer world this, isn't it? Some people get pneumonia if they have their hair cut too short, while others wear white vests all the year round!

Bids of 12 7-8 cents a pound for cheese were refused on the Belleville Cheese Board on Saturday. Those poor farmers! It's enough to make one's blood boil to hear of their being offered such a measly figure, especially as (so a well-known cheese-maker told us on Saturday) there is a fair profit in cheese at 8 cents a pound!

However, here's luck to the farmer. When he prospers we all prosper, and that's no joke. There is a lot of truth in the words of the old song, "The Farmer Soaks — beg pardon — Feeds Us All."

The rattling of peas on the windows warns us that Hallowe'en is approaching, and the youngsters are already getting their heads together, planning the pranks they mean to play. They boys deserve a little latitude, for youth must have a vent for its high spirits, but there is no excuse for wilful and destructive mischief, either on Hallowe'en or any other time. The boys should remember this. At the same time, it is to be hoped there are few men in Belleville like a certain grumpy old curmudgeon we have in mind, who, when called on one evening by two little chaps between 8 and 9 years old dressed in fantastic garb, whose only offence was the asking for an apple, threw a bucket of cold water over the lads. That fellow must surely have been a lineal descendant of Gabriel Grubb.

The interior of the Post Office is resplendent these days. New brass railings have been installed, just as though there wasn't enough railing about the service before.

By the way, who is blocking the erection of Belleville's Armory? Don't all speak at once.

The C. P. R. surveyors have reached Port Hope, and are, as the sporting editor would say, "going strong."

Peterboro had quite a sensation over the Ontario bank episode. The Ontario bank, according to the Peterboro papers, did the biggest banking business in that city, and there was almost a panic when it became known that the bank was in difficulties. When the news came that the Bank of Montreal had assumed the Ontario's banking liabilities there was joy in great big bunches. And no wonder. How do you think you would feel if you saw a possibility of losing the savings of a lifetime, and then found "all of a sudden" that everything was all right. Don't you think you'd sing the Doxology?

Brockville Times: In the investigation into the London bye-election rascality, the Brockville bye-election, in which this riding was stolen from the late Hon. Peter White, is recalled by the evidence of J. G. Pritchett, the famous machinist who exposed the ballot switching which disgraced this riding. Pritchett recalled the operations in Brockville. He said he was here twelve days. He attended to the switching, and Lewis to the bribery. O'Gorman was also here and Pritchett again related how the eight or ten local men were instructed in the gentle art of ballot switching. It is nauseating to read of the cold-blooded way in which the immaculate Laurier Government has kept itself in power, but we fancy from present indications that its reign will soon be over.

We are surprised at the Brockville Times! To think that it printed the above and failed to ask its old favorite question, "Who printed those fraudulent ballots?" It was contended at the time that the said fraudulent ballots were printed in Brockville. The man Pritchett also worked in North Hastings, for the redoubtable Byron O. Lott. Who printed the fraudulent ballots used there? It would be very interesting to know.

The man on the next block is getting chesty. He is one of the few men who, so far, have not been "mentioned" in connection with Mr. Mathison's job. An oversight, probably.

AN OLD SAYING.

Showing How Cause and Effect Are Never Far Removed.

It is an old saying "Where there's honey there's bees"—not less true is one which science has coined more recently, "Where there's Dandruff there's germs"—and—to push the inference still further we may truly say "Where there's Dandruff cured Newbro's Herpicide has been at work."

The reason of Herpicide's isolation as a genuine cure for Dandruff lies in the fact that it attacks and destroys the root of the whole trouble — a parasitic germ which feeds upon the material which nourishes the hair follicle.

Other so-called remedies are not directed at this true cause of the disease.

Accept no substitute, there is none. Sold by leading druggists. Send 10c in stamps for sample to The Herpicide Co., Detroit, Mich. J. S. McKeown, special agent.

The hatred with which the average Grit editor hates his late confreres, the Jerry Collinses and Pritchetts, is only equalled by the admiration with which be admired the same persons when they were working for the party.

There is to be a holiday for the public school children next Friday because next Thursday is a holiday. Why not have a holiday on Wednesday because it is the day before a public holiday?

That the Ontario bank situation is a serious one may be judged by the following from a Toronto paper:

"A prominent banker expressed the opinion this morning that the shareholders would be hard hit in the Ontario bank collapse. They may realize about 50 cents on the dollar, but probability is that it will be nearer 25 cents. Experience of the past in the matter of liquidation of banks has shown that while the liabilities never decrease there is always a shrinkage of the assets. From one cause and another there is always a depreciation of the assets, and in this case it may run anywhere from $800,000 to $1,000,000."

THE INNOCENT ORGANS.

(Toronto Telegram.)

Too bad that this enquiry before Col. Denison should acquaint the party organs with the iniquities of the machine, of which they form a part?

The Globe and the Star are a precious pair of babes in the woods, and roll their innocent eyes in amazement at the unheard of iniquities of their humble fellow-soldiers in the evil cause of Coercion.

The workers who went out and bought votes at the bidding of the party bosses do not pose and moralize and add hypocrisy to their other offences, like the organs which print falsehoods for the benefit of the same party bosses.

Miss Bertha Krupp, of Germany, who has a hundred millions in her own right, was married to-day. The occasion is somewhat unique in that Bertha made her own trousseau, all the expenses connected with it not being over $250. The bridegroom was a poor man, and probably will continue to be, for that matter, for it is not likely that a frugal young person like Miss Krupp will "loosen up" much after marriage.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

THE SOUTH HASTINGS TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

SATURDAY MORNING SESSION.

On reassembling on Saturday morning, Mr. Grier, principal of the Tweed Public schools, gave an excellent paper on teaching history to all classes as the entrance to the High School. He showed its educational value as a mental training, and as a disciplinary factor. In all classes as far as the Third, all teaching of history should be by familiar talks with pupils, particularly on events and persons connected with Canadian history. This paper brought out a discussion on the various methods of teaching the subject.

The next subject taken up was grammar, particularly the conjugation of the verb, infinitives, participles, and phrases and idiomatic construction, by Mr. Johnson, I. P. S.

Mr. Morgan followed with an address on Ideals. Teachers should have high ideals and though they may never be able to attain them, yet the very fact that they are endeavoring to attain them will lead them upward towards those ideals. Teachers hold the most responsible position in the world. It is their privilege and duty to build character and train those that come under their care for citizenship here and for the world to come. The teaching of the subjects laid down in the programme of studies is not the most important part of the teachers' work. It is the training of the children morally, and making them truthful, honest, kind, etc., above everything else. The ideal order is not always quickness, but the stir of busy work, each child attending to its own work guided by the teacher, and thrown as much as possible on its own resources. Teachers need two qualifications, enthusiasm and sympathy, and no one should be a teacher who does not love children. The teachers' work is to train the child physically, intellectually, and morally, the last is the most important.

The address was one that should impress those who heard it with a sense of the great responsibility that rests upon the teachers and their work, and it was given as only Mr. Morgan can give it.

On motion of Mr. Luck, seconded by Mr. Barragar, a hearty vote of thanks was given Mr. Morgan, after which the National Anthem was sung and the convention was closed.

Why People Read Dickens' Works.

(From G. K. Chesterton's, "Charles Dickens.")

Dickens was a mythologist rather than a novelist; he was the last of the mythologists, and perhaps the greatest. He did not always manage to make his characters men, but he always managed, at the least, to make them gods. They are creatures like Punch or Father Christmas. They live statically, in a perpetual summer of being themselves. There are no popular authors to-day. . . . The old popularity was positive, the new is negative. There is a great deal of difference between the eager man who wants to read a book and the tired man who wants a book to read. A man reading a Le Queux mystery wants to get to the end of it. A man reading the Dickens novel wishes it might never end. . . . Men read a Dickens story six times because they know it so well. If a man can read a Le Queux story six times it is only because he can forget it six times. In short, the Dickens novel was popular, not because it was an unreal world, but because it was a real world; a world in which the soul could live; The modern "shocker" at its very best is an interlude in life. But in the days when Dickens' work was coming out serially people talked as if real life were itself the interlude between one issue of Pickwick and another.

GRAND TRUNK RAILROAD TO ERECT A BUILDING OF ITS OWN.

Norfolk, Va.—Among the interesting transportation exhibits at the Jamestown Exposition, to be held on the shores of Hampton Roads near Norfolk, in 1907, will be that of the Grand Trunk Railway, the pioneer road of Canada and the only double track system of that country. Not only is this road to participate in the transportation display at the Ter-Centennial, but they will have a special building to house their extensive exhibit.

Although the headquarters of this immense system is located in Canada, the company intend to have a display second to none, and with this in view, they will erect a handsome building in a central location of the Exposition grounds.

Mr. H. R. Charlton, advertising agent, and Mr. R. McC. Smith, southern passenger agent, of the Grand Trunk system, and officials of the Jamestown Ter-Centennial were in conference at the Exposition headquarters in Norfolk, some time ago, and it was then decided by the company to erect a building, the plans for which to be immediately put into execution.

The decision of the company to participate in the Exposition makes them the second Trunk Line to determine upon such a course, the Southern Railway having decided to display a splendid exhibit of the varied resources along its thousands of miles of track. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad are considering an exhibit in engine construction, the plan being to give a graphic illustration of the progress made in this line of industry, by exhibiting the first engine ever used by the B. & O. alongside of one of their present-day monsters.

The exhibit of the Grand Trunk Railroad will be unique in that it will contain enlarged pictures of the summer resorts, along their tracks, beautifully executed by noted artists, which in themselves will be works of art. Specimens of fish, game and other products so abundant in the regions through which the system passes will all be displayed. The feature of the display, however, will be the mineral exhibit. One from the great mines at "Cobalt" and "Ontario," called the "New Silverdale," on account of its great wealth of ore, will be made. This mine was opened last year and is considered one of the richest silver in the world.

At St. Louis the "Grand Trunk" made an exhibit which attracted wide attention and it is stated that the company intend to have an even more extensive display at the Jamestown Ter-Centennial.

The Company has won gold medals at all of the previous Expositions and is at present making a large display at Milan, Italy.

The officials of the road while in Norfolk were taken over the grounds of the Exposition, and expressed themselves of the belief that the Ter-Centennial will be the most popular celebration ever held in America. The location, they declared, could not be surpassed, for a great international military and naval display.

SPOTLESS SERVICE.

Service over the Lake Shore Railway may well be called spotless service. Throughout this entire system there is a noteworthy lack of dust and dirt. Sparkling linen and white-clad waiters greet the traveller in the dining cars, and this "spick and span" appearance extends throughout the train. One steps down at a journey's end over the Lake Shore as clean as when he boarded the train. Cleanliness is but one feature that has made The Lake Shore the most popular road in America. Others are its luxurious coaches, absolute safety, highest speed and punctuality. Tell the agent to have your ticket read "Via Buffalo and The Lake Shore Railway," and write for information concerning rates and routes to J. W. Daly, Chief A.G.P.A., Buffalo, N.Y.; A. J. Smith, G.P.A., Cleveland, Ohio, or W. J. Lynch, Pass'gr Traffic Mgr., Chicago, Ill.

$33.00 TO THE PACIFIC COAST from Chicago via the Chicago and North Western Ry. Tickets on sale daily up to October 31st at above rate to Vancouver, Victoria, New Westminster, B.C., Tacoma and Seattle, Wash., Portland, Ore., San Francisco and Los Angeles, Cal., and other western points. Correspondingly low rates from points in Canada. Special freight rates on household effects. Choice of routes and splendid train service. TIMELY TOPICS.

THE SEASONS.

We have had the smell of ketchup,
And the chili sauce as well;
The odor of the juicy dill,
Likewise the juicy dill.
Now canning time is over,
But a stronger smell occurs;
The camphor ball is now the thing,
She's getting out her furs.

Each season has its odor strong,
That scents the little flat;
And all can tell what's going on,
Before they leave the mat;
A dinner boiled, an onion fried,
Which ever she prefers;
But they are tame compared to that
When she gets out her furs.

For life is such a tell-tale game,
Our tastes we cannot hide;
And what we eat and what we drink
Are published far and wide;
The tale is borne on every breeze,
For smell no wall deters;
And now the world at large must know
She's getting out her furs.

If somehow I should sleep for years
As Rip Van Winkle slept;
And somehow should awake at home,
So well and wisely kept,
I'd need no calendar to know,
(I'd use that one of hers);
The season, I could tell if she
Was getting out her furs.

A CONFESSION.

I held you, laughing, on my knee,
And kisses stole, a score or more.
You were a rosy elf of three,
And I, well, I was twenty-four!
Now you are radiant twenty-three,
While, I, alas, am forty-four!
I'm conscience-stricken! well I see
My peace has flown forevermore,
Unless those kisses I restore;

A MAN TO AVOID.

The One Who Is Generally Disliked by Other Men.

The cynical old maid would probably tell us that all men should be avoided. The happily married young woman will say that is nonsense—all men are good, as undoubtedly they are to a certain extent. Rarely does one come across any man who is thoroughly bad.

Yet the old maid is not entirely wrong, either. There are some men whom it is well to avoid, and the young girl who is just entering social life should take the advice of those who have had more experience than herself—that is to say, in the greater issues. It savors of youth and almost foolishness to refuse to know a man even slightly because of some faults.

In the matter of real friendship, however, and marriage, a girl is unwise if she accept as friend or lover a man whom other men dislike. Such a man is not often worthy of a good woman's consideration and certainly the inexperienced girl is better to keep at arm's length a man of this sort.

Either he is mean or selfish, a blusterer or must plead guilty to other faults. As an acquaintance perhaps he might be possible, but as a friend most inadvisable.

One wants a man who is comparatively strong all over if he is to be admitted to the innermost sanctuary. The man who is impossible in one or more respects must certainly be relegated to the mere outward fringe.—New York American.

OLD SCRAPBOOKS.

They Sometimes Prove a Serious Menace to Health.

Old scrapbooks are a menace, to health. For several reasons they harbor more dust than any other old books. Usually the pages are pasted on both sides, making them thick and uneven. They are broad, and their ornate bindings are seldom behind glass doors, but easily accessible on tables and shelves. After turning over the pages, sneezing, head colds and hay fever have often resulted without the cause being suspected. In our library was a scrapbook of colored fashion plates from 1853 to 1892. Another was filled with newspaper clippings of the war between the states. They were prized and frequently read, but colds almost invariably followed. We sent them to a bindery to be fumigated and rebound. To prevent in great measure this condition, use a carbolized paste, paste only on one side of the page, keep them behind glass and provide them with oil paper covers. Do not let this adverse side prevent any one from making scrapbooks. Use preventives as with all old books whose pages have been turned until they are sufficiently uneven to harbor dust.—Good Housekeeping.

BEAUTY AXIOMS.

A bad tempered woman can never be beautiful.

Harmony in dress pleases more eyes than costly gewgaws.

Cultivate graciousness, for it is nature's greatest beautifier.

Daintiness has come to be the modern woman's chief charm.

If you have no thought for yourself, remember that others admire beauty.

Beauty may be only skin deep, but it has more value than most kinds of plaiting.

Things which beautify an old woman may detract from the appearance of the young girl.

Don't wait until tomorrow to think of the graceful form and comely face, for by that time middle age settles and formidable crow's feet will be with you to stay.

No woman need lack some kind of beauty. If nature has denied her a beautiful face, she can make up for it by acquiring a wonderful grace of form or such beautiful hands that she can be the envy of her set.—Pilgrim.

Table Manners.

Parents, even in a humble cottage home, should pay attention to the conduct and manners of their children at mealtimes. They cannot tell what position they will fill in after life, and a man or woman who is ignorant of the most simple laws of table etiquette is terribly handicapped. Were the parents to reprove the child who conveys its food to its mouth with a knife, who drinks its tea from the saucer or who sticks its elbows out at right angles, the lesson so taught would never be forgotten. There is a certain amount of freedom at the family table, where one scarcely expects to find the ceremonious deportment of a set dinner party. But even in the home there are minor rules and observances which should always be followed. The boy or girl on whose mind they are impressed at an early age will never lose them, and then, after years of struggles, it may be, the "manners that make the man" will be their chief passport into the circle of their new acquaintances.

The Beautiful In Dress.

As to just what constitutes the beautiful, peoples and individuals must always differ. There are, however, certain necessary elements of the beautiful in dress upon which all Frenchwomen, les dames des halles (market women) and duchesses, are agreed. These are principally three—it shall be suitable, simple and pleasing. These three points, which largely determine the art of dressing, fix one half the problem of economy; the other half is in knowing exactly how much one may spend on dress. Every Frenchwoman that I know has a fixed sum upon which to dress, and every member of the family is considered, including herself.—Harper's Bazar.

Crimson Blind

small, it was tucked into a halfpenny open envelope—a magazine office envelope, marked, 'Proof, urgent.' There were the proofs of a short story in the buff envelope."

"Which reached its destination in due course?"

"So I hear this morning. But how on earth——"

"Easily enough. The whole thing gets slipped into a larger open envelope, the kind of big-mouthed affair that enterprising firms send out circulars and patterns with. This falls into the hands of the woman who is at the bottom of this and every other case, and she reads the synopsis from sheer curiosity. The case fits her case, and there you are. Mind you, I don't say that this is how the thing actually happened, but how it might have done so. When did you post the letter?"

"I can't give you the date. Say ten days ago."

"And there would be no hurry for a reply," Bell said, thoughtfully. "And you had no cause for worry on that head. Nor need the woman who found it have kept the envelope beyond the delay of a single post, which is only a matter of an hour or so in London. If you go a little farther we find that money is no object, hence the £1,000 offer and the careful, and doubtless expensive, inquiry into your position. Steel, I am going to enjoy this case."

"You're welcome to all the fun you can get out of it," David said, grimly. "So far as I am concerned, I fail to see the humor. Isn't this the office you are after?"

Bell nodded and disappeared, presently to return with two exceedingly rusty keys tied together with a drab piece of tape. He jingled them on his long, slender forefinger with an air of positive enjoyment.

"Now come along," he said. "I feel like a boy who has marked down something rare in the way of a bird's nest. We will go back to Brunswick Square exactly the same way as you approached it on the night of the great adventure."

CHAPTER IX.

"Any particular object in that course?" David asked.

"There ought to be an object in everything that even an irrational man says or does," Bell replied. "I have achieved some marvellous results by following up a single sentence uttered by a patient. Besides, on the evening in question you were particularly told to approach the house from the sea front."

"Somebody might have been on the look-out near the Western Road entrance," Steel suggested.

"Possibly. I have another theory.

. . . Here we are. The figures over the fanlights from 187 upwards, gradually getting to 219 as you breast the slope. At one o'clock in the morning every house would be in darkness. Did you find that to be so?"

"I didn't notice a light anywhere till I reached 219."

"Good again. And you could only find 219 by the light over the door. Naturally you were not interested in and would not have noticed any other number. Well, here is 218, where I propose to enter, and for which purpose I have the keys. Come along."

David followed wonderingly. The houses in Brunswick Square are somewhat irregular in point of architecture, and Nos. 218 and 219 were the only matched pair thereabouts. Signs were not wanting, as Bell pointed out, that at one time the houses had been occupied as one residence. The two entrance-halls were back to back, so to speak, and what had obviously been a doorway leading from one to the other had been plastered up within comparatively recent memory.

The grim and dusty desolation of an empty house seemed to be supplemented here by a deeper desolation. Not that there was any dust on the ground floor, which seemed a singular thing seeing that elsewhere the boards were powdered with it, and festoons of brown cobwebs hung everywhere. Bell smiled approvingly as David Steel pointed the fact out to him.

"Do you note another singular point?" the former asked.

"No," David said, thoughtfully; "I—stop! The two side-shutters in the bay-windows are closed, and there is the same vivid crimson blind in the centre window. And the self color of the walls is exactly the same. The faint discoloration by the fireplace is a perfect facsimile."

"In fact, this is the room you were in the other night," Bell said, quietly.

"Impossible!" Steel cried. "The blind may be an accident, so might the fading of the distemper. But the furniture, the engravings, the fittings generally——"

"Are all capable of an explanation which we shall arrive at with patience."

"Can we arrive at the number over the door with patience?"

"Exactly what I was coming to. I noticed an old pair of steps in the back sitting-room. Would you mind placing them against the fanlight for me?"

David complied readily enough. He was growing credulous and interested in spite of himself. At Bell's instigation he placed the steps before the fanlight and mounted them. Over his head were the figures 218 in elongated shape and formed in white porcelain.

"Now then," Bell said, slowly. "Take this pocket-knife, apply the blade to the right-hand lower half of the bottom of the 8—to half the small o, in fact—and I shall be extremely surprised if the quarter section doesn't come away from the glass of the fanlight, leaving the rest of the figure intact. Very gently, please. I want you to convince yourself that the piece comes away because it is broken, and not because the pressure has cracked it. Now then."

The point of the knife was hardly under the edge of the porcelain before the segment of the lower circle dropped into Steel's hand. He could feel the edges of the cement sticking to his fingers. As yet the full force of the discovery was not apparent to him.

"Go out into the road and look at the fanlight," Bell directed.

David complied eagerly. A sharp cry of surprise escaped him as he looked up. The change was apparent. Instead of the figures 218 he could read now the change to 219—a fairly indifferent 9, but one that would have passed muster without criticism by ninety-nine people out of a hundred. With a strong light behind the figures the clumsy 9 would never have been noticed at all. The very simplicity and ingeniousness of the scheme was its safeguard.

"I should like to have the address of the man who thought that out," David said, drily.

"Yes, I fancy that you are dealing with quite clever people," Bell replied. "And now I have shown you how utterly you have been deceived over the number we will go a little farther. For the present, the way in which the furniture trick was worked must remain a mystery. But there has been furniture here, or this room and the hall would not have been so carefully swept and garnished while the rest of the house remains in so dirty a condition. If my eyes don't deceive me I can see two fresh nails driven into the archway leading to the back hall. On those nails hung the curtain that prevented you seeing more than was necessary. Are you still incredulous as to the house where you had your remarkable adventure?"

"I confess that my faith has been seriously shaken," David admitted. "But about the furniture? And about my telephone call from Mr. Gates's town house? And about my adventure taking place in the very next house to the one taken by him at Brighton? And about Miss Gates's agitation when she learnt my identity? Do you call them coincidences?"

"No, I don't," Bell said, promptly. "They are merely evidences of clever folks taking advantage of an excellent strategic position. I said just now that it was an important point that Mr. Gates had merely taken the next door furnished. But we shall come to that side of the theory in due course. Have you any other objection to urge?"

"One more, and I have finished for the present. When I came here the other night—provided of course that I did come here—immediately upon my entering the dining-room the place was brilliantly illuminated. Now, directly the place was void the supply of electric current would be cut off at the meter. So far as I can judge, some two or three units must have been consumed during my visit. There could not be many less than ten lights burning for an hour. Now, those units must show on the meter. Can you read an electric meter?"

"My dear fellow, there is nothing easier."

"Then let us go down into the basement and settle the matter. There is pretty sure to be a card on the meter made up to the day when the last tenant went out. See, the supply is cut off now."

As Steel spoke he snapped down the hall switch and no result came. Down in the basement by the area door stood the meter. Both switches were turned off, but on Bell pressing them down Steel was enabled to light the passage.

"There's the card," Bell exclaimed. "Made up to 25th June, 1895, since when the house has been void. Just a minute whilst I read the meter. Yes, that's right. According to this the card in your hand, provided that the light has not been used since the index was taken, should read at 1521. What do you make of the card?"

"1532," David cried. "Which means eleven units since the meter was last taken. Or, if you like to put it from your point of view, eleven units used the night that I came here. You are right, Bell. You have practically convinced me that I have been inside the real 219 for the first time to-day. And yet the more one probes the mystery the more astounding does it become. . . . . What do you propose to do next?"

"Find out the name of the last tenant or owner," Bell suggested. "Discover what the two houses were used for when they were occupied by one person. Also ascertain why on earth the owners are willing to let a house this size and in this situation for a sum like £80 per annum. Let us go and take the keys back to the agents."

Steel was nothing loth to find himself in the fresh air again. Some progress had been made like the opening of a chess-match between masters, and yet the more Steel thought of it the more muddled and bewildered did he become. No complicated tangle in the way of a plot had ever been anything like the skein this was.

"I'm like a child in your hands," he said. "I'm a blind man on the end of a string; a man dazed with wine in a labyrinth. And if ever I help a woman again——"

He paused as he caught sight of Ruth Gates's lovely face through the window of No. 219. Her features were tinged with melancholy; there was a look of deepest sympathy and feeling and compassion in her glorious eyes. She slipped back as Steel bowed, and the rest of his speech was lost in a sigh.

CHAPTER X.

A bell tolled mournfully with a slow, swinging cadence like a passing bell. On winter nights folks, passing the House of the Silent Sorrow, compared the doleful clanging to the boom that carries the criminal from the cell to the scaffold. Every night all the year round the little valley of Longdean echoed to that mournful clang. Perhaps it was for this reason that a wandering poet christened the place as the House of the Silent Sorrow.

For seven years this had been going on now, until nobody but strangers noticed it. From half-past seven till eight o'clock that hideous bell rang its swinging, melancholy note. Why it was nobody could possibly tell. Nobody in the village had ever been beyond the great rusty gates leading to a dark drive of Scotch firs, though one small boy bolder than the rest had once climbed the lichen-strewn stone wall and penetrated the thick undergrowth beyond. Hence he had returned, with white face and staring eyes, with the information that great wild dogs dwelt in the thickets. Subsequently the village poacher confirmed this information. He was not exactly loquacious on the subject, but merely hinted that the grounds of Longdean Grange were not salubrious for naturalists with a predatory disposition.

Indeed, on moonlight nights those apocryphal hounds were heard to bay and whimper. A shepherd up late one spring night averred that he had seen two of them fighting. But nobody could say anything about them for certain; also it was equally certain that nobody knew anything about the people at Longdean Grange. The place had been shut up for thirty years, being understood to be in Chancery, when the announcement went forth that a distant relative of the family had arranged to live there in future.

What the lady of the Grange was like nobody could say. She had arrived late one night accompanied by a niece, and from that moment she had never been beyond the house. None of the large staff of servants ever left the grounds unless it was to quit altogether, and then they were understood to leave at night with a large bonus in money as a recompense for their promise to evacuate Sussex without delay. Everything was ordered by telephone from Brighton, and left at the porter's lodge. The porter was a stranger, also he was deaf and exceedingly ill-tempered, so that long since the village had abandoned the hope of getting anything out of him. One rational human being they saw from the Grange occasionally, a big man with an exceedingly benevolent face and mild, large, blue eyes—a man full of Christian kindness and given to largesse to the village boys. The big gentleman went by the name of "Mr. Charles," and was understood to have a lot of pigeons of which he was exceedingly fond. But who "Mr. Charles" was, or how he got that name, it would have puzzled the wisest head of the village to tell.

And yet, but for the mighty clamour of that hideous bell and that belt of wildness that surrounded it, Longdean Grange was a cheerful-looking house enough. Any visitor emerging from the drive would have been delighted with it. For the lawns were trim and truly kept, the beds were blazing masses of flowers, the creepers over the Grange were not allowed to riot too extravagantly. And yet the strange haunting sense of fear was there. Now and again a huge black head would uplift from the coppice growth, and a long, rumbling growl come from between a double row of white teeth. For the dogs were no fiction, they lived and bred in the fifteen or twenty acres of coppice round the house, where they were fed regularly and regularly thrashed without mercy if they showed in the garden. Perhaps they looked more fierce and truculent than they really were, being Cuban bloodhounds, but they gave a weird color to the place and lent it new terror to the simple folk around.

The bell was swinging dolefully over the stable-turret; it rang out its passing note till the clock struck eight and then mercifully ceased. At the same moment precisely as she had done any time the last seven years the lady of the house descended the broad, black oak staircase to the hall. A butler of the old-fashioned type bowed to her and announced that dinner was ready. He might have been the butler of an archbishop from his mien and deportment, yet his evening dress was seedy and shiny to the last degree, his patent leather boots had long lost their lustre, his linen was terribly frayed and yellow. Two footmen in livery stood in the hall. They might have been supers playing on the boards of a traveling theatre, their once smartly cut and trimmed coats hung raggedly upon them.

As to the lady, who was tall and handsome, with dark eyes and features contrasting strangely with hair as white as the frost on a winter's landscape, there was a far-away, strained look in the dark eyes, as if they were ever night and day looking for something, something that would never be found. In herself the lady was clean and wholesome enough, but her evening dress of black silk and lace was dropping into fragments, the lace was in rags upon her bosom, though there were diamonds of great value in her white hair.

And here, strangely allied, were wealth and direst poverty; the whole place was filled with rare and costly things, pictures, statuary, china; the floors were covered with thick carpets, and yet everything was absolutely smothered in dust. A thick, white, blankety cloud of it lay everywhere. It obscured the china, it dimmed the glasses of the pictures, it piled in little drifts on the heads and arms of the dingy statues there. Many years must have passed since a housemaid's brush or duster had touched anything in Longdean Grange. It was like a palace of the Sleeping Beauty; wherein people walked as in a waking dream.

The lady of the house made her way slowly to the dining-room. Here dinner was laid out daintily and artistically enough—a gourmet would have drawn up to the table with a feeling of satisfaction. Flowers were there, and silver and cut-glass, china with a history of its own, and the whole set out on a tablecloth that was literally dropping to pieces.

was a beautiful room in itself, lofty, oak panelled from floor to roof, with a few pictures of price on the walls. There was plenty of gleaming silver glowing like an argent moon against a purple sky, and yet the same sense of dust and desolation was everywhere. Only the dinner looked bright and modern.

There were two other people standing by the table, one a girl with a handsome, intellectual face full of passion but ill repressed; the other the big fair man known to the village as "Mr. Charles." As a matter of fact, his name was Reginald Henson, and he was distantly related to Mrs. Henson, the strange chatelaine of the House of the Silent Sorrow. He was smiling blandly now at Enid Henson, the wonderfully beautiful girl with the defiant, shining eyes.

"We may be seated now that madam is arrived," Henson said, gravely.

He spoke with a certain mocking humility and a queer wry smile on his broad, loose mouth that filled Enid with a speechless fury. The girl was hot-blooded—a good hater and a good friend. And the master passion of her life was hatred of Reginald Henson.

"Madam has had a refreshing rest?" Henson suggested. "Pardon our anxious curiosity."

Again Enid raged, but Margaret Henson might have been of stone for all the notice she took. The far-away look was still in her eyes as she felt her way to the table like one in a dream. Then she dropped suddenly into a chair and began grace in a high, clear voice.

". . . . And the Lord make us truly thankful. And may He, when it seemeth good to Him, remove the curse from this house and in due season free the innocent and punish the guilty. For the burden is sore upon us, and there are times when it seems hard to bear."

The big man played with his knife and fork, smilingly. An acute observer might have imagined that the passionate plaint was directed at him. If so it passed harmlessly over his broad shoulders. In his immaculate evening dress he looked strangely out of place there. Enid had escaped the prevailing dilapidation, but her gown of grey homespun was severe as the garb of a charity girl.

"Madam is so poetical," Henson murmured. "And charmingly sanguine."

"Williams," Mrs. Henson said, quite stoically, "my visitor will have some champagne."

She seemed to have dropped once again into the commonplace, painfully exact as a hostess of breeding must be to an unwelcome guest. And yet she never seemed to see him; those dark eyes were looking, ever looking, into the dark future. The meal proceeded in silence save for an oily sarcasm from Henson. In the dense stillness the occasional howl of a dog could be heard. A slight flush of annoyance crossed Henson's broad face.

"Some day I shall poison all those hounds," he said.

Enid looked up at him swiftly.

"If all the hounds round Longdean were poisoned or shot it would be a good place to live in," she said.

Henson smiled caressingly, like Petruchio might have done in his milder moments.

"My dear Enid, you misjudge me," he said. "But I shall get justice some day."

Enid replied that she fervently hoped so, and thus the strange meal proceeded with smiles and gentle words from Henson, and a wild outburst of bitterness from the girl. So far as she was concerned the servants might have been mere automatons. The dust rose in clouds as the latter moved silently. It was hot in there, and gradually the brown powder grimed like a film over Henson's oily skin. At the head of the table Margaret Henson sat like a woman in a dream. Ever, ever her dark eyes seemed to be looking eagerly around. Thirsty men seeking precious water in a desert might have looked like her. Ever and anon her lips moved, but no sound came from them. Occasionally she spoke to one or the other of her guests, but she never followed her words with her eyes. Such a sad, pathetic, pitiable figure, such a grey sorrow in her rags and snowy hair.

The meal came to an end at length, and Mrs. Henson rose suddenly. There was a grotesque suggestion of the marionette in the movement. She bowed as if to some imaginary personage and moved with dignity towards the door. Reginald Henson stood aside and opened it for her. She passed into the dim hall as if absolutely unconscious of his presence. Enid flashed a look of defiance at him as she disappeared into the gloom and floating dust.

Henson's face changed instantly, as if a mask had fallen from his smug features. He became alert and vigorous. He was no longer patron of the arts, a wide-minded philanthropist, the man who devotes himself to the good of humanity. The blue eyes were cold and cruel, there was a hungry look about the loose mouth.

"Take a bottle of claret and the cigars into the small library, Williams," he said. "And open the window, the dust stifles me."

The dignified butler bowed respectfully. He resembled the typical bad butler of fiction in no respect, but his thoughts were by no means pleasant as he hastened to obey. Enid was loitering in the hall as Williams passed with the tray.

"Small study and the window open, miss," he whispered. "There's some game on—oh, yes, there is some blessed game on again to-night. And him so anxious to know how Miss Christiana is. Says she ought to call him in professionally. Personally I'd rather call in an undertaker who was desperately hard up for a job."

"All right, Williams," Enid replied. "My sister is worse to-night. And unless she gets better I shall insist upon her seeing a doctor. And I am obliged for the hint about Mr. Henson. The little study commands the staircase leading to my sister's bedroom."

"And the open window commands the garden," Williams said, drily.

"Yes, yes. Now go. You are a real friend, Williams, and I will never forget your goodness. Run along—I can actually feel that man coming."

As a matter of fact, Henson was approaching noiselessly. Despite his great bulk he had the clean, dainty step of a cat; his big, rolling ears were those of a hare. Henson was always listening. He would have listened outside a kitchen door to a pair of chattering scullery-maids. He liked to find other people out, though as yet he had not been found out himself. He stood before the world as a social missioner; he made speeches at religious gatherings and affected the women to tears. He was known to devote a considerable fortune to doing good; he had been asked to stand for Parliament, where his real ambition lay. Gilead Gates had alluded to Reginald Henson as his right-hand man.

He crept along to the study, where the lamps were lighted and the silver claret-jug set out. He carefully dusted a big arm-chair and began to smoke, having first carefully extinguished the lamps and seen that the window leading to the garden was wide open. Henson was watching for something. In his feline nature he had the full gift of feline patience. To serve his own ends he would have sat there watching all night if necessary. He heard an occasional whimper, a howl from one of the dogs; he heard Enid's voice singing in the drawing-room. The rest of the house was quite funeral enough for him.

In the midst of the drawing-room Margaret Henson sat still as a statue. The distant, weary expression never left her eyes for a moment. As the stable clock, the only one going on the premises, struck ten, Enid crossed over from the piano to her aunt's side. There was an eager look on her face, her eyes were gleaming like frosty stars.

"Aunt," she whispered; "dear, I have had a message!"

"Message of woe and desolation," Margaret Henson cried. "Tribulation and sorrow on this wretched house. For seven long years the hand of the Lord has lain heavily upon us."

She spoke like one who was far away from her surroundings. And yet no one could look in her eyes and say that she was mad. It was a proud, passionate spirit, crushed down by some bitter humiliation. Enid's eyes flashed.

"That scoundrel has been robbing you again," she said.

"Two thousand pounds," came the mechanical reply, "to endow a bed in some hospital. And there is no escape, no hope unless we drag the shameful secret from him. Bit by bit and drop by drop, and then I shall die and you and Christiana will be penniless."

"I daresay Chris and myself will survive that," Enid said, cheerfully. "But we have a plan, dear aunt; we have thought it out carefully. Reginald Henson has hidden the secret somewhere and we are going to find it. The secret is hidden not far off, because our cousin has occasion to require it frequently. It is like the purloined letter in Edgar Poe's wonderful story."

Margaret Henson nodded and mumbled. It seemed almost impossible to make her understand. She babbled of strange things, with her dark eyes fixed on the future. Enid turned away almost despairingly. At the same time the stable clock struck the half-hour after ten. Williams slipped in with a tray of glasses, noiselessly. On the tray lay a small pile of tradesmen's books. The top one was of dull red with no lettering upon it at all.

"The housekeeper's respectful compliments, miss, and would you go through them to-morrow?" Williams said. He tapped the top book significantly. "To-morrow is the last day of the month."

Enid picked up the top book with strange eagerness. There were pages of figures and cabalistic entries that no ordinary person could make anything of. Pages here and there were signed and decorated with pink receipt stamps. Enid glanced down the last column, and her face grew a little paler.

"Aunt," she whispered, "I've got to go out. At once; do you understand? There is a message here; and I am afraid that something dreadful has happened. Can you sing?"

"Ah, yes; a song of lamentation—a dirge for the dead."

"No, no; seven years ago you had a lovely voice. I recollect what a pleasure it was to me as a child; and they used to say that my voice was very like yours, only not so sweet or so powerful. Aunt, I must go out; and that man must know nothing of it. He is by the window in the small library now, watching—watching. Help me, for the love of Heaven, help me."

The girl spoke with a fervency and passion that seemed to waken a responsive chord in Margaret Henson's breast. A brighter gleam crept into her eyes.

"You are a dear girl," she said, dreamily; "yes, a dear girl. And I loved singing; it was a great grief to me that they would not let me go upon the stage. But I haven't sung since—since that——"

She pointed to the huddled heap of china and glass and dried, dusty flowers in one corner. Enid shuddered slightly as she followed the direction of the extended forefinger.

"But you must try," she whispered. "It is for the good of the family, for the recovery of the secret. Reginald Henson is sly and cruel and clever. But we have one on our side now who is far more clever. And, unless I can get away to-night without that man knowing, the chance may be lost for ever. Come!"

Margaret commenced to sing in a soft minor. At first the chords were thin and dry, but gradually they increased in sweetness and power. The hopeless, distant look died from the singer's eyes; there was a flush on her cheeks that rendered her years younger.

"Another one," she said, when the song was finished, "and yet another. How wicked I have been to neglect this balm that God sent me all these years. If you only knew what the sound of my own voice means to me! Another one, Enid."

"Yes, yes," Enid whispered. "You are to sing till I return. You are to leave Henson to imagine that I am singing. He will never guess. Now then."

Enid crept away into the hall, closing the door softly behind her. She made her way noiselessly from the house and across the lawn. As Henson slipped through the open window into the garden Enid darted behind a bush. Evidently Henson suspected nothing so far as she was concerned, for she could see the red glow of the cigar between his lips. The faint sweetness of distant music filled the air. So long as the song continued Henson would relax his vigilance.

He was pacing down the garden in the direction of the drive. Did the man know anything? Enid wondered. He had so diabolically cunning a brain. He seemed to find out everything, and to read others before they had made up their minds for themselves.

The cigar seemed to dance like a mocking sprite into the bushes Usually the man avoided those bushes. If Reginald Henson was afraid of one thing it was of the dogs. And in return they hated him as he hated them.

Enid's mind was made up. If the sound of that distant voice should only cease for a moment she was quite sure Henson would turn back. But he could hear it, and she knew that she was safe. Enid slipped past him into the bushes and gave a faint click of her lips. Something moved and whined, and two dark object bounded towards her. She caught them together by their collars and cuffed them soundly. Then she led the way back so as to get on Henson's tracks.

He was walking on ahead of her now, beating time softly to the music of the faintly distant song with his cigar. Enid could distinctly see the sweep of the red circle.

"Hold him, Dan," she whispered. "Watch, Prance; watch, boy."

There was a low growl as the hounds found the scent and dashed forward. Henson came up all standing and sweating in every pore. It was not the first time he had been held up by the dogs, and he knew by hard experience what to expect if he made a bolt for it.

Two grim muzzles were pressed against his trembling knees; he saw four rows of ivory flashing in the dim light. Then the dogs crouched at his feet, watching him with eyes as red and lurid as the point of his own cigar. Had he attempted to move, had he tried coercion, they would have fallen upon him and torn him in pieces.

"Confusion to the creatures!" he cried, passionately. "I'll get a revolver; I'll buy some prussic acid and poison the lot. And here I'll have to stay till Williams locks up the stables. Wouldn't that little Jezebel laugh at me if she could see me now? She would enjoy it better than singing songs in the drawing-room to our sainted Margaret. Steady, you brutes! I didn't move."

He stood there rigidly, almost afraid to take the cigar from his lips, whilst Enid sped without further need for caution down the drive. The lodge-gates were closed and the deaf porter's house in darkness, so that Enid could unlock the wicket without fear of detection. She rattled the key on the bars and a figure slipped out of the darkness.

"Good heavens, Ruth, is it really you?" Enid cried.

"Really me, Enid. I came over on my bicycle. I am supposed to be round at some friend's house in Brunswick Square, and one of the servants is sitting up for me. Is Reginald safe? He hasn't yet discovered the secret of the tradesman's book?"

"That's all right, dear. But why are you here? Has something dreadful happened?"

"Well, I will try to tell you so in as few words as possible. I never felt so ashamed of anything in my life."

"Don't tell me that our scheme has failed!"

"Perhaps I need not go so far as that. The first part of it came off all right, and then a very dreadful thing happened. We have got Mr. David Steel into frightful trouble. He is going to be charged with attempted murder and robbery."

"Ruth! But tell me. I am quite in the dark."

"It was the night when—well, you know the night. It was after Mr. Steel returned home from his visit to 219, Brunswick Square——"

"You mean 218, Ruth."

"It doesn't matter, because he knows pretty well all about it by this time. It would have been far better for us if we hadn't been quite so clever. It would have been far wiser to have taken Mr. Steel entirely into our confidence. Oh, oh Enid, if we had only left out that little sentiment over the cigar-case! Then we should have been all right."

"Dearest girl, my time is limited. I've got Reginald held up for the time, but at any moment he may escape from his bondage. What about the cigar-case?"

"Well, Mr. Steel took it home with him. And when he got home he found a man nearly murdered lying in his conservatory. That man was conveyed to the Sussex County Hospital, where he still lies in an unconscious state. On the body was found a receipt for a gun-metal cigar-case set with diamonds."

"Good gracious, Ruth, you don't mean to say——"

"Oh, I do. I can't quite make out how it happened, but that same case that we—that Mr. Steel has—has been positively identified as one purchased from Walen by the injured man. There is no question about it. And they have found out about Mr. Steel being short of money, and the £1,000, and everything."

"But we know that that cigar-case from Lockhart's in North Street was positively——"

"Yes, yes. But what has become of that? And in what strange way was the change made? I tell you that the whole thing frightens me. We thought that we had hit upon a scheme to solve the problem, and keep our friends out of danger. There was the American at Genoa who volunteered to assist us. A week later he was found dead in his bed. Then there was Christiana's friend, who disappeared entirely. And now we try further assistance in the case of Mr. Steel, and he stands face to face with a terrible charge. And he has found us out."

"He has found us out? What do you mean?"

"Well, he called to see me. He called at 219, of course. And directly I heard his name I was so startled that I am afraid I betrayed myself. Such a nice, kind handsome man, Enid; so manly and good over it all. Of course he declared that he had been at 219 before, and I could only declare that he had done nothing of the kind. Never, never have I felt so ashamed of myself in my life before."

"It seems a pity," Enid said, thoughtfully. "You said nothing about 218?"

"My dear, he found it out. At least, Hatherly Bell did it for him. Hatherly Bell happened to be staying down with us, and Hatherly Bell, who knows Mr. Steel, promptly solved, or half solved, that side of the problem. And Hatherly Bell is coming here to-night to see Aunt Margaret. He——"

THE FIRST RADIUM.

Its Production Almost Made Paupers of Curie and His Wife.

When Professor Curie was run over and killed on a street of Paris not long ago the entire world recognized that it had lost one of its foremost experimenters. Yet it was only six years ago that the wonderful element, radium, which he and his wife discovered, passed almost unnoticed among the exhibits in a Paris exhibition, and a stranger, seeking the physicist, found him only through the lucky help of a street gamin.

In the 1900 exhibition in Paris, says London Truth, the compilers of the catalogue and the jurors entirely overlooked the tiny vial containing its speck of radium, which the Curies had sent. An exhibitor of diamonds, annoyed because its presence spoiled the color of his jewels, had put it out of sight. An English visitor, however, who had read a reference to the discovery in an obscure journal, hunted it up and later set out to find the discoverers.

He went to many places, the Mines School, the Sorbonne and elsewhere, but no one in any of them could tell him anything of the Curies. At last, by a strange chance, he ran across a gamin who had heard of radium from a chum who worked as an attendant at the City of Paris industrial laboratory, where Curie then worked. By this roundabout information the Englishman was brought to Professor Curie, who was a little amazed, but pleasantly so, to find that some one was at last interested in what they were doing.

Mme. Curie, he said, had herself pounded in a mortar with her own hands all the pitchblende from which the speck of radium had been obtained. Pitchblende was costly, and she had not wasted a grain. She had ruined her hands in the work.

They were then spending every penny for pitchblende. Mme. Curie had given up gloves entirely and was wearing very old and badly patched cheap shoes and old fashioned clothes. The professor had on old shoes and a threadbare coat—his only coat. Their little girl was dressed as cheaply. But by their economy and their diligence they had enriched humanity incalculably by their discoveries in radio activity and their isolation of radium itself.

An Improved Postal Card.

Our postal card is in need of improvement. The writing on it is in plain view, to be read at leisure by any postal employee from the time it leaves the sender until it arrives at its destination. It is safe to assume that this has been the cause of no little trouble and embarrassment.

During my first stay in Brazil I found that the postal card there in use was supplied with a flap or covering of dark paper which when gummed down completely hid the writing. This flap was attached to the back of the card, the edge gummed and perforated, the insertion of a finger tip being all that was required to open it. It served the purpose of a letter at half the expense. I fail to see why our government did not adopt this style of postal card long ago, the additional expense being so slight as still to leave a handsome profit.—Chicago News.

Some pessimists are inclined to think that Shakespeare is quite dead. Good news, however, comes from Hungary. A correspondent has recently seen a theatrical poster there which runs as follows:

Richard Lion Heart.

Englishmen are now talking about "repatriating" the dust of Richard Lion Heart, which has been lying these many centuries in the abbey of Fontevrault, near Saumur, in the valley of the Loire, France. Negotiations to this effect are now pending between Sir Francis Bertie, British ambassador at Paris, and the French government, and it is expected that Britain's wishes will be complied with. As long ago as 1860 Lord Derby begged Napoleon III. to permit the removal of the remains to England, but the negotiations were interrupted by the Franco-German war.

Appraising a Gilded Joss.

An insurance man who has been busy for some months with the problems of adjustment arising from the San Francisco fire says that one of the queerest questions was the loss on a Chinaman's joss, a big gilded god. "The adjuster found that some sixty or seventy minor josses were also insured. When he reported this we certainly had a merry time trying to figure how much a god was worth who couldn't care for himself. But we finally arranged a scale of values that satisfied everybody."

Ink For Fountain Pens.

Do not use ordinary writing ink in your fountain pen, as it will corrode and render your pen useless unless cleaned very often. Take an old typewriter ribbon, turn over it a pint of hot water and let it stand a day or so, stirring frequently. Turn the ink thus made into a bottle, cork securely, and you have an ink which will flow freely and not corrode your pen. If the typewriter ribbon has considerable ink on it you can thin your ink by adding more water after the first pint is made.

THE GOOD TIME COMING

STORM STRESS AND ELEMENTAL CONFUSION PRECEDE GROWTH.

TALMAGE'S WORD OF HOPE

Social Disturbances, Upheavals, Labor Strikes, and the Conflict of the "Classes and the Masses" Inevitable Precursors of Orderly National Development—This Also Is Nature's Method of Attaining to Perfection.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Diver, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 14.—In this sermon the preacher shows that as storms, stress and elemental confusion are the forerunners of growth and orderly development in nature, so social disturbances, upheavals, labor strikes and the conflict of "the classes and the masses" are the inevitable precursors of orderly national development. The text is Proverbs xiv., 4, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean, but much increase is by the strength of the ox."

All true lovers of the beautiful should read the messages of its great high priest, John Ruskin. There never lived a man who wielded a poetic-prose pen like his. His "Seven Lamps of Architecture" and "Ethics of the Dust" and "Stones of Venice," his "Sesame and Lilies" and "Crown of Wild Olive," his "Studies of Wayside Flowers" and of "The Cloud Form and the "Relation of Natural Science to Art" offer to the aesthetic enthusiast visions of this world which cannot be found among the writings of any other writer, living or dead.

If you have read John Ruskin carefully you may remember how in one chapter he makes a mighty plea for the aesthetics of life as against the ruthless invasion of commercialism. He denounces in vehement language the heartless vandalism of the business world which would paint a horrible advertisement of some patent medicine upon the rocks of a majestic palisade or frowning Gibraltar. He bewails the fact that England's artistic sensibilities are so chilled and dulled that she would allow the manufacturer's wheel to turn into a muddy stream the clear, beautiful water that leap out of the mountains, and he excoriates the iconoclastic brutality of the lumberman which would bury the axe in the heart of the grand old oaks that for centuries have been lifting up their leafy hands to God in an attitude of prayer. But, though John Ruskin, our teacher, our Gamaliel, our aesthetic high priest, who leads us in worship at the altar of the beautiful, makes this plea for the preservation of the woods and the valleys, though he would strike down the hands of the iconoclast who would desecrate the high cliff, yet the whole world knows that if commercialism did not shut its eyes at times to the aesthetic our railroads would be unable to tunnel under the mountains and the farmers could never cover their fields with grain. In order that the increasing human race may live we must cut and tear down and slash. In many senses we must have a chaotic cosmos in order to have progression.

If you will turn to my text and read it carefully, as the inspired penman meant it to be read, you will find that the thought which I am enunciating King Solomon taught in his book of Proverbs thousands of years ago. He goes out one morning, when the complaining farmer enters his barn. Everything there is filthy and dirty. The straw beds upon which the oxen slept are all mussed up and must be raked out into the barnyard and the stalls cleaned. The chickens have flown into the haymow and scattered the hay. The grain bags have been broken open by the mice. The manger itself is in a fearful state. The oxen in nosing for their food have scattered it everywhere. "Oh, dear," exclaims the farmer. "Just look at that barn. Did you ever see such a mess? It is work, work, work; clean, clean, clean. I never finish fixing up the barn one day, but I have to go to work and fix it all up again the next." "'Tis true that what you say is hard," answers the wisest of all men. "But farmer, remember that you cannot have tidiness and cleanliness if you have oxen, and if you did not have any oxen you could not plough your fields and could not sow your grain and could not receive any financial return from your lands." Thus King Solomon says to us to-day: "Friend, sometimes it is best to have disorder. Sometimes it is best to have an upheaval. Where no oxen are, the crib is clean; but the disorder you deplore and the increase of property you rejoice in are inseparable from the presence of the ox, and you cannot have one without the other."

A valuable practical lesson is this thought for almost every department of life. In the first place, it will apply to the disorders of the natural world. Some people, if they could have their way, would never have a rainstorm. They would never have a blizzard. They would never have the trees robbed of their leaves. They would never have them stand in a uniform of spotless white, like grim soldiers with their bayonets of ice as sharp pointed as Roman spears. They would never have the wagon wheels sink hub deep in mud or the robins and the thrushes fly away from the New England hills to the land of the flowers. They would always have their orchards heavy laden with fruits, and their lawns covered with grass, and their gardens crowded with incense waving flowers, and their wheatfields with their ripened grain, making the valleys look like a banquet hall of gold, and the blue heavens unblackened by one dark cloud. The sun for them would send forth a never ceasing radiance. "Oh, why should we have the rain?" they cry. "Why do the December winds come to make our teeth chatter and our blood to freeze? Why do we have the spring freshets wash out our roads and sweep away our country bridges? Why all this disorder and confusion in the natural world? No man can worship God in drizzling fog or be truly happy when he has to hug a fire in a house which has to be hermetically sealed to keep out the winter's biting blasts."

But in the light of my text, are not atmospheric disorders a blessing? Are not the frosts and the raindrops and the soft white quilts of snow flung over our lawns and the spring freshets benefactors instead of curses? I enter the silent American forests in January. There I find everything lifeless and still. Here and there I may see the track of a doe or a wild rabbit. There I may hear once in awhile a squirrel chattering and scolding at me. But for the most part the paths of the woods are deserted and everything is still. I go up to one of the grand old trees and pat its sides and sympathetically say: "Poor fellow! How cold you must be. How you must long again to be dressed in your beautiful robes of green. How bitter you must feel at these blizzards which chill you and stop your sap from flowing, as they are now trying to congeal my blood by freezing it in my veins." But, much to my surprise, the old oak is not satisfied with my sympathy. "No, no man!" it answers sharply: "The frost is not my enemy, but my friend. It comes to me as a lover and puts its white arms about me and says: 'Tree, I want thee to live a hundred years. I want thee to grow thousands upon thousands of leaves. But in order to do this I must husband thy strength. I must give thee an annual rest. I must enrich the soil where thy roots are buried. Trust me. Believe me. I am thy friend, for the deeper I pile the snowbanks about thy trunk the richer the food thou shalt have to live upon when the warm summer sun comes back from its journey on the other side of the equator and kisses thy cheeks.' The frost is my friend and not my enemy."

I turn from the forests and enter the valleys. There I find the corn and the wheat and the vegetables growing everywhere. It is now July instead of January. I have foolishly gone out without my heavy boots and mackintosh. My wife warned me that it might rain when I started out, but I heeded not her advice. The dark clouds were even then gathering. Suddenly there sounds a muttering of thunder. Then the lightnings flash and a tree is shattered by my side. Then comes the rain falling in a perfect deluge. The rain does not matter much to me, because I know that if I walk briskly and keep my blood in circulation I shall not catch cold! The poor corn! They seem to be almost human. They seem to hang their heads as though they do not want the water to spatter into their faces. "Poor things, poor things!" I says. But almost instantly a mighty chorus of protest sounds from the fields. "We are not poor things," they answer. "We are parched, and God has sent us this rain to quench our thirst. We are filthy, and God has sent us this shower bath to cleanse us. We would die of hunger, but God, by this rain, has swelled the brooks until they come leaping down the mountain sides to irrigate the valleys that our food may be moistened so that our roots can suck it up. God has sent us this atmospheric disorder that we may grow strong and feed a hungry world. The rain is just as essential to our lives as the sunbeam." Wonderful and true answer that. When I tramped home I did not find fault with my wet garments. I knew that the rain, as truly as the sunshine, was sent as a messenger of divine love. "Where no oxen are the crib is clean, but much increase is by the strength of the ox." Do you not grasp the sublime proverb as applied to the physical or natural life?

But we can have "a stagnating cosmos" in our mental life as well as in our physical or lower entities. The man who physically basks under the summer sun, who never wishes to do any manual labor, who always sits down in preference to standing up and rides instead of walks; the man who never takes any more active exercise than walking upstairs to his bed and who never feels the exhilaration of a pedestrian expanding his chest against the beating winds, either becomes a physical degenerate or is foolishly signing his own death warrant. On the other hand, the man who simply allows his brain to lie fallow, who never develops his mind, who never studies, who never struggles up the mountain heights of thought, as the Alpine climber pants and pushes and pulls himself up the crags of the Matterhorn, is a man who becomes a mental degenerate. It is only by work, only by discouragements, only by shutting the teeth and bracing the will and pushing ahead, that the chaotic conditions of the mental realm can be evolved into the harmonies of a mental cosmos.

John Ruskin once beautifully described the development of the mind. "Your minds," he wrote, "are endowed with a vast number of gifts for totally different uses — limbs of mind which if you don't exercise you cripple. One is curiosity—that is a gift, a capacity of pleasure in knowing, which if you neglect you make yourself cold and dull. Another is sympathy—the power of showing the feelings of living creatures, which if you destroy you make yourself hard and cruel. Another of your gifts is admiration—the power of enjoying beauty or ingenuity, which if you destroy you make yourself base and irreverent. Another is wit—the power of playing with the lights of the many sides of truth, which if you destroy you make yourself gloomy and dull to others. In choosing your way of work it should bring out all these faculties—not one merely, but all of them. The way to bring them out is to concern yourselves attentively with each faculty. To cultivate sympathy you must be with living creatures and thinking about them. To cultivate admiration you must be among beautiful things and looking at them." But some people have "a stagnating mental cosmos." They are never willing to read. They are never willing to study. They care nothing about the great wide world and its doings. They literally would not go across the street to see the most beautiful picture ever painted or hear the most exquisite harmonies ever sung, while on the other hand some men are never satisfied with their present mental condition. They are always reaching up and reaching out. They will go to any trouble to learn. No work for them is too difficult if they can only improve themselves and learn something new.

It is only the ignorant, the stupid, the slothful, the stagnating mind, that is satisfied with its present conditions. Progress is not like a swamp, with fetid air and surface of slime. There everything is still and quiet. True mental progress is like the commotion and disorderer waters of a brook. There the waters are pure and sweet, because one moment they are tumbling over a cascade, the next they are being dashed into foam against some bowlder, and the next they are as a waterfall leaping over some cliff. They are never still. They are always moving, always readjusting themselves to new conditions.

As I note the restless commotions of the individual mind, so I note also the restless conditions of the social world and the conflict of the classes against the masses. The socialistic upheavals of the present time are not a sign that our present governmental life is to be destroyed. They are a sign, and a sure sign, that out of these upheavals there shall come forth a better truth, a better honesty, a purer social life. How many wrongs there are to be righted on both sides! Capital, with its vast resources, and machinery, frequently has more mercy upon its iron and steel bars and its leather bands and its huge pile drivers than upon the bone and sinew and muscle of its workmen. Capital does not say to itself, "How much can I make these goods for and sell them at a fair rate of profit, that the people may buy them the cheapest and yet I get a fair return for my money?" No, Capital does not say that. Capital says, "How can I make these goods the cheapest and sell them the dearest? How can I decrease my expenses at home and yet sell at the maximum price the needy people will pay?" Ah, there is something commercially wrong about such a condition as that. Capital, by her own actions, stands as a confessed usurer and extortioner. Her motto often is, "Squeeze the last drop of blood out of the people. Do not run a business for a fair competence, but run it to get every cent of profit out of the human race that we can."

On the other hand, Labor is just as cruel and selfish an extortioner as Capital when she gets the chance. In a famous bookstore of Chicago there was one corner which went by the name of "Saints and Sinners." Books of all creeds were placed there side by side. There infidel and atheist and minister would sometimes meet for a quiet chat in a Monday symposium. But in the social world, taken as a whole, there are no "saints." Too often we find both Capital and Labor robed in the black garments of selfishness instead of the white robes of altruism. Their motto becomes, not "Live and let live," but "Live ourselves and get all we can at the other man's expense." Of course I am not now talking of the capitalist and the laborer as individuals.

Yes, Capital to-day cannot be proud of her past record. She has a heart of stone. Neither has Labor to-day anything to be proud of in her past actions. She has an adamantine heart of selfishness and greed. But when I look upon the struggles of these two mighty social factors I am not a pessimist, for in the social storms, in the strikes and recriminations, in the blows, which are now falling thick and fast, in the wars and rumors of wars, in the universal social disorder, I see a bright day coming. Peace and prosperity and universal brotherhood shall yet be evolved out of the present social chaos. No "stagnating social cosmos" is here. All these social upheavals are only rainbow signs in the heavens that the social wars shall soon cease. "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean, but much increase is by the strength of the ox."

What is true of the mental, physical and social realms is emphatically true of the spiritual life. It is not by a life of spiritual ease that we are going to receive God's true messages. It is only by struggle, only by prayer, only by agony, only by wrestling, as Jacob wrestled with the angelic messenger through the long, dark night, that Christ reveals his face to us in the "beauty of holiness." We must do as Jesus did. We must spend forty long days in the wilderness before we can come to our true spiritual cosmos and walk hand in hand with God.

I was never more impressed with this thought than some time ago when I was reading "The History of a Preacher's Life," by Dr. Rainsford, late rector of St. George's Episcopal church of New York City. Dr. Rainsford had been preaching the gospel for many years. He was at that time one of the most prominent preachers of Canada. Suddenly there came a time when his old theology was passing away. He could not see things as he once saw them. Try as he would, he could not see them with the old eyes. Like Samson, he seemed to be shorn of his strength. His audience left him. His power seemed to be gone. But he kept bravely on in his spiritual struggle. He prayed. Oh, how earnestly he prayed! Then one day the new light came. He was praying in his study and reading the parable of the prodigal son when the new gospel truth dawned upon his. He said: "That prodigal son went away from God, but he never ceased to be a son of his Divine Father. Some of us may wander far, far away, but we are all God's children. He never ceases to love us. He is ready to receive and forgive all of us if we only come back to the Divine Father's love?" At once Dr. Rainsford's old faith was revived; the theological mysteries passed away; from the chaos, the disorder of his religious hopes, there came the cosmos of the faith of a simple child.

Friend, I would look into your eyes to-day. You are worried. You are like Martha, troubled about many things. But you are not like Mary's sister, worried about a heavenly feast. You are worried about your relationship to God. Oh, I thank Jesus to-day that you are worried. I thank God that your theological crib is disordered. You are miserable; you are distressed; you are anxious, but this is well. It is out of such distress that you come to eternal rest and peace. The danger is when a man is content with himself, when he is indifferent and untroubled. That is when the crib is clean. The way to happiness is through the turmoil that is hard to bear while it lasts, but afterward brings the peaceable fruit of righteousness. No "stagnating spiritual cosmos" is yours. Reach up. Reach on. In thy darkness keep on stumbling. Pray. Diligently search the Scriptures. Keep on. Keep on. After awhile thy hand will touch a spiritual signboard. It will be the signboard of the cross. Then Jesus shall be yours. Keep on, brother. Struggle on, sister. "Were no oxen are the crib is clean, but much increase is by the strength of the ox."

HEROIC TRAINING.

Fierce Ordeal the Chinese Military Code Prescribes.

Chinese military training of today shows a queer mixture of ancient and modern methods. A correspondent writes from Hunan: "I, however, saw a performance which I doubt whether many foreigners have seen. Its object was to make the body strong and also insensible to pain. It was a most growsome sight. The men came forward in threes, stripped to the waist, having tied their turbans tightly round their waists. Each picked up a sort of iron truncheon about twenty inches long, weighing at least fifteen pounds, there being three sizes. This truncheon was made of two bars of flat iron tied together. The operator, having made his bow to the commanding officer, seized the truncheon in one hand, swung it round, gave a snort and brought it down whack on his chest. The double irons gave a resounding clank. The beads of perspiration oozed out.

"Three blows were delivered on the right breast, then three on the left with the other hand. Then the muscles of the arms were treated in the same way. Then both hands were used, and the club was swung over the head down the back. Then the forehead was subjected to three stunning blows. This was followed by subjecting to a similar thumping the extended thighs, where the full weight of the instrument came down, whatever it did in the other parts.

"Some added variations and extras, but all finished by taking the truncheon in both hands and driving the big end deep into their abdomens. This also was done thrice. It was explained to me that if they could stand this infliction of pain, for it was self evidently a tremendous ordeal, they would be unmoved by any ordinary knocking about. This I am willing to grant, but I seriously question whether the human body can go on standing what I then saw."—Chicago News.

Russia Moves Slowly.

Observers of the west were somewhat surprised that the dissolution of the douma was not immediately followed by a popular uprising or an immediate panic in Russian securities. They forgot that Russia is an agricultural continent rather than a kingdom, that its capital is fettered in bonds of steel, that its swiftest means of internal communication are in the hands of the government alone, and that, with its douma suppressed, its people, the peasantry especially, have no organ through which their united will can be expressed. From the moment of the convocation of the states general the people of France were never without a mouth, and until the "bronze artillery officer" shot down the "sections" they were never without an "army of revolution." The Russian people move heavily and may take years before their general will is effective, their movement being that of the glacier rather than the avalanche. Still they are moving.—London Spectator.

Washing In France.

Only one American washing machine has ever been introduced into Bordeaux, France, according to Consul Murphy. "There was," he says, "one such machine introduced here some years ago, but as it was not properly advertised or presented to the public in an intelligent manner it seemed to make but little impression. Washerwomen from the country monopolize the washing business, gathering the soiled linen one week and returning it the next. They boil the clothes, use chemicals to whiten them, rinse them in the nearest stream and spread the articles over grass, hedges and barbed wire fences to dry, which does not conduce to long wear of linen. The cleansed goods are then returned to the families, who send them to an ironer, where they are generally kept another week."

Camille Saint-Saens Coming.

Of the musical events of next season will be the first visit to America of the eminent French musician, Camille Saint-Saens, who is now seventy-one years old and for a number of years has suffered from an affection of the throat or lungs, which has made him spend much of his time in warm climates. He is one of the half dozen or so greatest living composers and a brilliant pianist as well. He will appear at only twenty concerts in this country, so that only the largest cities will be distinguished by a visit.

New Life Saving Apparatus.

M. Pierre Samois, who has invented a new life saving apparatus, went to the Louvre swimming baths a day or two ago to test it. The apparatus consists of two small circular metal buoys, through which the arms are passed. A belt connects the buoys, which are constructed in such a way as to be practically unsinkable. M. Samois' invention was put to many severe tests by expert swimmers, none of whom was able to remain under water a moment while wearing the apparatus.—London Globe.

Cheapness of Swiss Telephones.

"I was in Switzerland in June, before the rush set in," said a globe trotter, "and what most struck me there was the height of the mountains and the lowness of the telephone rates. The government owns the Swiss telephone system, and a phone costs only $12 a year. This small fee gives you 800 calls, and for excess calls all you pay is 1 cent each."

INDIAN MYTHS.

One Accounts For the Custom of Scalping an Enemy.

Among the many myths of the North American Indian the disposition of the soul after its separation from the body and its close connection with the scalp varies according to the religion of the tribe. With some the journey to the "happy hunting grounds" begins immediately; with others the spirit remains near the grave. Again, if an Indian dies away from the lodges of his people the spirit returns at once to them, where it hovers as if reluctant to leave. Among the upper Missouri river tribes it is believed that before the spirit finally departs from those who have died from wounds received in battle it floats toward a great cliff overhanging the Missouri and carves upon the wall of rock a picture showing the manner of death.

It is believed by most of the plains tribes that the soul attaches itself to the scalp; that the soul of a person scalped does not suffer from the wounds inflicted on the body, but that the opposite is the case where the scalp is not torn off.

An Indian who kills himself in battle, accidentally or purposely, has positively no hereafter. He is irrevocably lost. Those who are struck by lightning or die by any other apparently direct operation of the Great Spirit are hurriedly buried where they fell without ceremony, and no mound or mark is erected over them. If after a battle there are found corpses not scalped or mutilated it is positive evidence that such persons came to their death by their own hand, for it is a tenet of the Indian religion not to scalp or mutilate the body of an enemy who commits suicide.

LEPROSY.

Peculiarities of This Loathsome and Deadly Disease.

The fact that many persons come into intimate contact with lepers for years without becoming affected is not strange when one reflects that the same applies to the closely allied disease—tuberculosis. Men have voluntarily submitted themselves to direct inoculation with material from the sores, discharges, etc., of lepers, yet in only one case (that of a Hawaiian convict who, when condemned to death, submitted to the alternative of inoculation) was the actual disease produced in this artificial manner.

There is no cure for leprosy. All the remedies proposed after the disease becomes well seated have been of little use. The utmost attained is a prolongation of life and a mitigation of suffering.

There is a tradition which has of late obtained some scientific support that fish diet is one of the necessary causes of leprosy, either through tainted fish containing some substance which stirs the bacilli into activity or through the bacilli growing in the fish and thus being taken into the stomach. This lunacy may have originated in the belief that the scales of the leper and the scales of the fish are analogous. Leprosy exists among inland peoples who never eat fish and does not seem specially prevalent among those of the coasts who eat most fish. A curious thing about leprosy is that only one woman is affected to every four men.

African Blood Brotherhood.

The method of making blood brotherhood among the Galla and Somali has its peculiarities. It is described by William Astor Chanler in "Through Jungle and Desert." Lokomagul on behalf of his people and I on behalf of my own each seized in our right hands a round stone. Upon the stones we liberally expectorated. Each then passed his stone to his following, who did likewise. We then exchanged stones, and each, holding the stone in his right hand, with his left dug a hole in the soil, meanwhile uttering words of supposed magic import. In these holes we finally placed the stones and covered them with sand. We then grasped hands and assured each other that we were the best friends possible.

The Editor and the Tramp.

Bret Harte's first stories appeared in the San Francisco Overland Monthly. Then he was appointed editor of this magazine. That was in 1869. About this same period two or three weekly newspapers were struggling for existence.

One day the office boy went to the editor of the Soaring Eagle and said:

"There is a tramp at the door, and he says he has had nothing to eat for six days."

"Fetch him in," said the editor. "If we can find out how he does it we can run this blamed paper for another week!"

The Prisoner.

An inspector arrived unexpectedly at a Scottish jail. He asked the solitary warder for the governor. "He's away fushin'," was the answer.

"Well, I'll see the prisoners," said the inspector.

"Him! He's out, sir."

"Out? The prisoner out? Why, has he escaped?"

"Ach, no, sir; he's just awa' wi' the governor at the fushin', carryin' the bag."

Her Proudest Moment.

Suffragette—The proudest moment of my life was when I was a passenger on an American liner and fell over the side. Friend—The proudest moment! But how do you mean? Suffragette—A sailor called out, "Man overboard!"

He travels safe and not unpleasantly who is guarded by poverty and guided by love.—Sir Philip Sidney.

LONG WALK IN OFFICE.

Average Business Man Covers Vast Territory In a Year.

"If I had a cent for every mile I walk during office hours every day I'd soon be able to retire," is a remark frequently heard from men and women who are kept on their feet while at business. The general impression is that the distance traveled daily is very great. And so it may be. But the simple experiment of carrying a pedometer for a few weeks will probably show that one's income at a cent a mile would not be worth collecting until the end of a year.

A downtown office man has just finished an experiment of this nature. He carried a pedometer six weeks, registering its total each night. At the end of that time it was found that the distance traveled, though varying greatly from day to day, came to a fairly even average at the end of each week.

How many miles do you suppose he walked on the day of his highest record? Twenty? Thirty? Fifty? No, only nine miles. The lowest record came the very next day and was a mile and a half. But the average for each week was thirty-three and one-third miles, or an average of six and a half miles for each working day. The six weeks showed totals as follows: 39½, 27½, 37, 34, 33⅓, 30, or an aggregate of 200 miles and a half mile over. At the end of six weeks, therefore, he would have collected $2 at a cent a mile.

In the course of a year this office traveling represents an impressive walking tour, with its total of 1,733 miles. If made as a continuous trip across country it would take him from New York to Bismarck, N. D., or to Galveston, Tex.

PERIL IN PAINLESS FACES.

Victims of Dread Malady May Be Hurt Without Knowing It.

"The redhot wire," said the electrician, "burned the man's cheek till it sizzled and smoked. Yet he never moved out of the way. He continued to laugh and joke and pull on his clay pipe, and a smell of burning rose into the air.

"I pulled him to one side.

"'Would you stand there,' I said, 'and be burned to death?'

"'Was I burning?' he said, with a scared look. And he put his hand to the side of his face—the wrong side. Was it possible that he couldn't feel that horrible hurt?

"Gentlemen, that man had no feeling in his face whatever. He told me that he had been operated on for tic douloureux, and the operation, while it had cured the tic, had left his face dead to all sensation.

"I had often read of tic douloureux in English novels, but I thought it was a trifling disease. This chap said it was a facial neuralgia so painful that in the past 90 per cent of its victims either went crazy or killed themselves, but now there is an operation that gives relief.

"Every victim of tic undergoes the operation; hence there are a lot of people walking the earth with no feeling in their faces. The condition is a dangerous one, because you are likely to get hurt without knowing it."

The Speed of Light.

Just think of it! Eleven times around this globe of ours in the space of sixty seconds! Can you imagine anything that moves with such remarkable speed? Sound travels only twelve and a half miles per minute and a rifle ball (if its speed were not diminished by resistance) sixteen and a half miles. Light passes through a distance equal to seven and a half revolutions of the earth in one minute, but electricity travels so astonishingly fast that it is able to complete the circuit of the earth eleven and a half times in sixty seconds.

Oratory In the Commons.

One of the London weeklies laments the decay of oratory in the house of commons. An observer has classified the styles of parliamentary speaking thus: "Haw haw" style, the "hum and haw" style and the "he haw" style. The first, he says, is used by the haughty gentlemen who loll in triumph on the treasury bench, the second distinguishes the utterances of the keen and watchful gentlemen on the front opposition bench, while the third sort fairly describes the effort of the private member.

A Loud Call.

William H. Crane, the actor, was once asked how it was that he never attempted serious Shakespearean roles.

"But I did once," replied the comedian. "Years ago in the west I played 'Hamlet.'"

"Did you, indeed?" said an admirer and friend. "Didn't you have a great success? Didn't the audience call you before the curtain?"

"Call me!" roared Crane. "Why, man, they dared me!"—Argonaut.

That Was Different.

Landlady—I will let this excellent room at reduced rates because there is a woman next door who plays the piano continually. Applicant—Oh, that won't make any difference! The room is for my nephew here, and he is deaf. Landlady—Ah, in that case I must charge the full price!

Dangerous.

"Would you like to see my aquaria?" asked the naturalist.

"Well, if he's securely chained I might, but I'm so afraid of wild beasts," replied the visitor.

What Class of Diseases

are due to Eye-Strain and can be relieved by removing the cause? All diseases are made worse by anything that irritates and depletes the nervous system; and, naturally, any disease may be more or less relieved by correcting the nerve strain. There is a remedy for those whose occupations are such that they cannot take advantage of open-air life, but are forced to continue at a close range of vision, which is to aid the vision with the proper glasses, so that when it is being used at a near point the eyes will have about the same adjustment they would have in looking over the open country, and consequently the brain would be as free from strain.

CHURCH CHIMES OF YESTERDAY.

NOTES OF SERVICES IN BELLEVILLE'S DIFFRENT PLACES OF WORSHIP.

Bridge Street.

The Pastor, Rev. Mr. Wilson, preached at both services yesterday. The musical features were excellent. In the morning Mr. Charles Spalding, of Madison, Wis., sang "The Palms," in an admirable way, and also sang a duet, "O Love Divine," with Mrs. P. Allen, which charmed those who heard it. In the evening Mrs. Allen, Miss G. Price and Messrs Burns and Vermilyea sang a quartette, "The Old, Old Story is True," and the choir rendered an anthem, "The King of Love My Shepherd is." Miss Price and Mrs. Allen took solos, singing splendidly.

St. Andrew's.

Large congregations were present at both services yesterday. The Pastor, Rev. R. S. Laidlaw, preached. In the evening his subject was "A Supreme Test of Faith." The text was from Genesis, 22nd chapter, 2nd verse;

> "And he said, take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering, upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of."

During the service Miss N. Lazier, sang "The Evening Prayer," very acceptably.

John Street.

"Moral Defaulters," was the subject discussed last evening by the pastor, Rev. A. H. Drumm. His text was from Romans, 12th chapter and a portion of the 9th verse;

> "Let love be without dissimulation."

In the course of his remarks the Rev. gentleman spoke at some length of religious hypocrites, and stated that there were in Canada to-day fewer of this class than ever before. The part of a hypocrite was a dangerous role to play, dangerous not only to the person who played it but to others, having the effect of poisoning the moral atmosphere. What was wanted, even in Belleville, was men and women who will uphold the moral standard, as we cannot afford to have it lowered. All should act the true part in life. If you are against God and the church then come out and say so. If, on the other hand, you are a believer in God, the church and its influences for good, come out and say so. In this way your influence for good will be felt.

Emmanuel R. E. Church.

Good congregations were present at the above church yesterday. The Rector, Rev. A. M. Hubly, at the morning service, referred to the death of the late Archbishop Bond, of Montreal. The deceased prelate was a Low churchman and evangelical in his views, and Reformed Episcopalians honored and respected him, even though he had not, like them, seen fit to take such drastic steps as they did. At the morning service the topic of the sermon was "The Pulpit's Pride," and at the evening service "The Pulpit's Shame." The pulpit's pride, the preacher said, was that it was privileged to expound the doctrines and present the message brought by Jesus Christ while on this earth, and the pulpit's shame was that, in these degenerate days, preachers were found who denied the authenticity of the Bible as God's word, and even went so far as to throw doubts on the divinity of Christ himself. At the evening service Miss Lillian Hubly sang, very sweetly, "A Stainless Crown."

Christ Church.

At the morning service the Rector, Rev. R. C. Blagrave, preached a sermon relative to the death of Archbishop Bond, Primate of all Canada, who died a few days ago. The Rev. gentleman spoke feelingly and eloquently about the late prelate. His text was from the 84th Psalm, 10th verse.

> "For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

Holloway Street.

The pulpit was ably filled by Rev. W. P. Rogers, B.A., of Wooler, to which place Rev. Mr. Leitch was invited to conduct anniversary services. Mr. Rogers took for his text in the morning, John 4; 35

> "Lift up your eyes and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest."

The bountiful harvest, said the speaker, has caused gratitude, and the thanksgiving should be general, to the giver of all good. The same God is interested in blessing the means used to ensure an abundant harvest in the great missionary fields, where the consecrated means are being employed by devoted men and women. The selections by the choir were enjoyed. Mr. Rogers addressed the Sunday School and preached in the evening.

Tabernacle.

The Pastor, Rev. G. Brown, officiated at both services. In the evening his subject was "Quenching the Spirit." His text was from 1st Thessalonians, 5th chapter and 19th verse;

> "Quench not the spirit."

FORMER BELLEVILLIAN IS REPORTED KILLED

BUT THE RUMOR SO FAR HAS NOT BEEN VERIFIED — HAS POPULAR "BILLY" POWER JOINED THE MAJORITY?

A rumor was current in this city to-day that Mr. W. W. Power, formerly of this city, and for some time past an animal trainer in New York City, had been killed in that place. It seems that the story arose out of the fact that a theatrical journal, published in the U. S., had an item which stated that a man named W. Power, said to be connected with Walter Main's circus, had been a week ago, killed in a street car accident on Broadway, N. Y. Mr. "Billy" Power, so well known in Belleville, was connected with Main's circus, and, naturally, perhaps, it was thought that he was the party killed.

Enquiry, however, does not bear out this belief. Mr. Power's relatives here have not heard of any accident to him, and Mr. John Mackie, a relative, says he doubts the story very much, because, on the day the man was killed, Mr. "Billy" Power, the former Bellevillian, was in Geneva, Ohio.

It seems altogether likely that our smiling and popular fellow-citizen can prove an alibi. Everyone who knows him will hope so.

Fatal Accident At Fredericksburg

MAN NAMED SWEET RUN DOWN BY THE INTERNATIONAL LIMITED ON SUNDAY AFTERNOON—A COLLECTION MADE.

A sad and fatal accident occurred on the line of the G.T.R. on Sunday afternoon, at Fredericksburg, whereby a section man named Sweet lost his life. It is alleged that the unfortunate man was walking along the track, carrying a pail of water when the International express came along behind him. The engineer whistled, but Sweet paid no attention. Just as the engine was upon him he turned partly round, and was run down, his body being terribly mutilated. Deceased was a middle-aged man and, we are informed, had been an employee of the road for some time. A wife and five children survive. Mr. Machin, a member of the Marks Bros. company, and a commercial traveller, who did not wish his name mentioned, went through the train and took up a collection for the family of the victim. The sum of $20.80 was raised, and when the parties reached this city the money was turned over to Mr. Coppin, G.T.R. station agent, who will forward it to the widow.

SPORTING NOTES.

In Toronto on Saturday, the Capitals beat Tecumsehs 4—1. This was the first of the home and home games between the teams. The next game will be played in Ottawa next Saturday, and it surely looks as though the Minto cup will winter in the shadow of the Citizen office.

Popular Farmer Dies Near Shannonville

Mr. J. S. Sutton, a farmer who resided near Shannonville, died on Sunday morning, after a few days' illness, from an attack of pneumonia. Deceased, who was 45 years of age, was well and favorably known in the locality where he resided. He was a member of the A.O.U.W., and took a prominent part in the Society's work. He was married some years ago to a Miss McDonald, of Point Ann, who, with an adopted daughter, survives. His demise has cast a gloom over the community.

A Severe Loss.

Mr. W. H. Badgley, of this city, had the misfortune to lose a fine horse on Saturday. Mr. Badgley was teaming near Roblin's Mills, across the bay, when one of his teams, a fine six-year-old horse, gave a couple of staggers and dropped dead. Mr. Badgley had recently refused $150 for the animal.

The Situation re The Ontario Bank

Briefly stated, the position of the Ontario Bank's affairs is this;

The Bank of Montreal has assumed all liabilities of the Ontario Bank, giving the latter's creditors the security of the Bank of Montreal.

To protect the Bank of Montreal in this assumption of liabilities, other Canadian banks have guaranteed $2,500,000 should the Ontario Bank's assets fall short of liabilities.

This guarantee will be only a final resource, after the Ontario Bank's assets and the second liability of its shareholders have been exhausted.

From their present knowledge of the Ontario Bank's affairs leading bankers do not contemplate that either the second liability or the guarantors will be called on.

As between the other banks, the Bank of Montreal is also a guarantor of the Ontario Bank, and in the event of any final deficiency, all banks on the guarantee, including the Bank of Montreal, will contribute in proportion to their subscribed capital up to the amount of $2,500,000. Any loss beyond that amount would fall on the Bank of Montreal alone.

The banks which have so far signed the guarantee are Bank of Montreal, Commerce, Imperial, Toronto, Dominion, Traders and Royal, and communications are now being carried on with other leading banks, which are expected to join, including the Bank of Nova Scotia, Merchants, Molsons and British North America.

In accordance with the change of control of the Ontario bank, Mr. C. McGill has resigned the general management, and the board has appointed Mr. A. D. Braithwaite, who is local Manager of the Bank of Montreal, to be General Manager of the Ontario Bank. This is the usual course, and is expected to be followed by the appointment of a curator and a committee of three Toronto bankers to assist him.—Globe.

Big Fish Caught.

A party of United States gentlemen, who have been in Belleville for some days, on Saturday had excellent sport fishing at Mosquito Bay. They succeeded in landing three fine specimens of maskinonge, the largest of which weighed 43 pounds. The other two weighed respectively 25 and 23 pounds. Those who were successful in landing the monsters were nearly as proud as though they had made a clean-up on Wall street.

Reckless Shooting.

Complaint has been made to the police that parties are discharging firearms in a rather reckless manner somewhere in the vicinity of the Court house. This morning, when a resident who lives near the Court house went to the barn to take out some storm windows which had been stored away, a number of lights of glass were found to be broken. Upon investigation it was found that a bullet had penetrated the barn sheeting and broken the glass. This is not by any means the first complaint from that locality of this same thing occurring.

A VERITABLE FURNACE

Hundreds Burn to Death on Str. Hankow at Hong Kong.

Water Could Not Be Turned On to Quench Flames, Nor Could the Officers Scuttle the Ship—Many of the 2,000 Chinese Passengers Huddled Together and Were Only Singed, While Others Were Incinerated.

Hong Kong, Oct. 15.—Hundreds of passengers of the steamer Hankow of the China Navigation Co.'s fleet of London were burned to death yesterday in a fire which completely destroyed the vessel while she was moored at her wharf. Many others jumped into the harbor and were drowned.

The Hankow carried 2,000 Chinese passengers, men, women and children, and seven Europeans and a cargo including 200 bales of matting, 560 bales of raw silk and 400 bales of waste silk. The vessel arrived from Canton at 2 o'clock yesterday morning and was shortly afterwards moored at the wharf.

Couldn't Turn on Water.

The chief officer reported to Capt. Branch that the ship was afire. The captain then directed the chief engineer to turn on the water through the fire hose. This was impossible, for the reason that within five minutes after the alarm was given the Hankow was ablaze fore and aft.

Capt. Branch then awakened the European passengers, who were rushed down the gangway, the ladies in their nightclothes.

A Veritable Furnace.

The crew was compelled to leave the ship, which, by this time, was a veritable furnace. The Chinese steerage passengers were thrown into a frightful panic. Horrifying shrieks and cries to save their lives were heard, but it was impossible, owing to the inflammable nature of the cargo.

Responding to signals from the British cruiser Flora, the naval dockyard dispatched contingents of engines and assistance. The land and floating brigades of firemen made herculean efforts to extinguish the flames, which leaped to a height of over 60 feet.

Couldn't Scuttle the Ship.

The British steamer Pow An, which was berthed at the same wharf, was towed out to save her from destruction. A neighboring pier 100 yards distant was burned to the water's edge. Governor Nathan, accompanied by his aide de camp, arrived at the scene at 4.15 a. m. Governor Nathan suggested scuttling the ship, but the suggestion was found to be impracticable.

The fire was brought under control at 6 a. m., at which time only the shell and hull of the Hankow remained. The gruesome work of recovering the dead was then begun.

Seventy-Five Corpses Recovered.

The fire-fighters have already recovered seventy-five corpses.

Many of them were huddled together and only singed, while others were incinerated beyond recognition. Of the cargo 200 bales of raw silk were saved, but badly damaged by water. The remainder was totally destroyed.

There are many theories as to the cause of the fire. The first is that the fire was caused by the overturning of the lantern of a Chinese boarding-house runner, who came aboard seeking customers. The second was that an opium smoker accidentally set fire to the matting; the third is that it was caused by the crossing of electric wires. A fourth theory, and one that is considered the most probable, is that the fire was incendiary, and was an outgrowth of a boycott against British river boats.

WOMAN FATALLY BURNED.

Was Boiling Turpentine and Beeswax When Clothing Ignited.

Owen Sound, Oct. 15.—A sad fatality occurred Friday at Shallow Lake, the victim being Mrs. W. A. Henderson, wife of the bookkeeper at the Owen Sound Portland Cement Co.'s works at that place.

Mrs. Henderson was boiling a mixture of turpentine and beeswax on the stove when it caught fire and in attempting to throw the dish out of a window the flames ignited her clothing.

She was badly burned and died after several hours of intense suffering.

Probably Fatally Burned.

Guelph, Oct. 15.—An Italian named Simenetl is at the hospital, seriously, if not fatally burned. He was employed on the night shift at the Page, Hersey Co., and while carrying some coal oil it caught fire, burning him badly about the upper part of the body.

One Killed In Collision.

Quebec, Oct. 15.—Through a collision between two locomotives at Hadlow Saturday morning Octave Veilleux, aged 35 years, an I. C. R. fireman, was badly crushed and died shortly afterwards at the Hotel Dieu Hospital, Levis. One of the locomotives was the property of the I. C. R. and the other the G. T. R., and both were badly wrecked.

Fort William, Oct. 15.—Wilbur Williamson, 18 years of age, residing near Murillo, was holding the belt on a wood saw in place with a short stick when the stick caught in a wheel and was thrown against the boy's head with such force that it pierced his brain. He died six hours later.

Kingston, N. Y., Oct. 15.—The night passenger steamers Adirondack of the People's Line of Albany, and Saratoga of the Citizens' Line of Troy, collided near Glasco, 12 miles north of the city at 1.15 o'clock Saturday morning. Clarence Sherman of Melrose, N. Y., an oiler of the Saratoga, was killed and George Horton of New York City, clerk on the Adirondack, is missing. The collision occurred in a dense fog.

GALT MINISTERS ANGRY.

Over Likely Sunday Football Game With Galt Players In Chicago.

Galt, Oct. 15.—Rev. Mr. Knowles of Knox Church and Rev. Dr. Dixon of Central Presbyterian Church made the proposed visit of the Galt football team to Chicago the subject of comment in the pulpit last night. The team came in for severe denunciation because of the story that they will play a Sunday game during their visit to the Windy City.

John Brady, new secretary of the club, says no Sunday game had been scheduled, but it was possible such a proposition would be made when the team reached Chicago. If so it would be for the individual members to say if they would play.

The information that a Sunday game is possible is said to have reached the ministers' ears from an ex-secretary of the club.

Quite a furore has been raised and it may result in the trip being called off.

Tense Situation In Spain.

Madrid, Oct. 15.—The conflict between church and state is constantly growing more tense. Minister of Justice Romonoes proposes that the bishops, who by virtue of their position are Senators, interpellate the Government on the question of civil marriages at the reassembling of Parliament on Oct. 20.

The Government has declined to acknowledge the receipt of the communication from five bishops, who recently met at Burgos and sent a message to the Government, violently protesting against the "anti-Christian movement" and announcing that they will not obey laws which violate the rights of the church.

Wanted to Shoot His Wife.

Detroit, Oct. 15.—Harry Adler, a cigarmaker from Toronto, caused all kinds of excitement in a house on Champlain street and finally landed in the police station in company with his wife, whom he alleges he found in the place living under an assumed name. The enraged husband drew a revolver and threatened to kill the woman unless she returned to her family. The police found no charge upon which they could hold the two. Under protest the wife signed an order giving the custody of a five-year-old daughter, who was living in another part of the city, over to the husband.

Algiers, Algeria, Oct. 15.—Despatches received here from the interior show that the local situation is growing in seriousness. A large band under Muley Abbout, a cousin of the Governor of Tafilalet, and Muley Rachid is traveling through Tafilalet Province and preaching a holy war.

54,600 Meals Did Him No Good.

HOW ONE MAN WASTED 50 YEARS OF HIS LIFE — THOUSANDS LIKE HIM.

"What's the use of eatin', anyhow?" said the scrawny dyspeptic to his rotund, prosperous-looking friend. "Here I've been eatin' three times a day, and sometimes twice a day, for 50 years, and look at me. I'm rawboned and skinny, still at the bottom of the ladder, sour on the world, and a pessimist. I know it, and I can't help it. If I had it to do over again, though, I would take care of my stomach, for I don't believe I ever really relished a meal in my life, not even mother's Christmas dinners, and I firmly believe that my way of eating, or whatever it was, brought along with it darkness and impossibility of success."

"You're right," nodded his companion. "Of course, that isn't always the case. But in this age we must not only 'Trust in the Lord and keep our powder dry,' but we must swallow sunshine with our food. Cheerfulness, especially while eating, which is the most essential act of man, is as necessary to him as sunshine is to the flowers. Nothing normal can be produced in darkness.

"But this is what you haven't been doing, Mr. Dyspeptic. Your brain and your stomach, remember, are twins, and you have to treat them accordingly. Why not start now and repair the damage you've done. It is never too late, you know."

"You mean at my age? And suppose you can't always have the sunshine?"

"Absolutely, yes. Science has made it possible to get the sunshine, the health and the strength that your stomach needs, all put up together in little tablets. They call them Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, the most effective tablets in the world for this very thing. One ingredient in these tablets digests 3,000 grains of food without the help of the stomach. Two tablets after each meal can do more work, quicker work and better work, in digesting a heavy meal, than the stomach can itself. The stomach need not work at all. Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets does all the work, and gives your jaded stomach a rest, the rest it needs. Meanwhile you cure yourself of brash, irritation, burning sensation, heartburn, sour stomach, acidity, fermentation, bloat, and the worst cases of dyspepsia and indigestion. You get rid of these for all time. And then, besides, you can eat all you want and whenever you want, and you will also relish mother's Christmas dinners if you will take Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after eating. That's the sunshine I was talking about. Then your face will reflect the internal change going on, you'll be more energetic, your mind will be clearer, you will have more confidence in yourself, you'll be happier, and you'll be yourself again.

"Your heart will change and you'll feel rosy. You'll enjoy your meals—and live. Let's walk down to the drug store and let me introduce you to one little package of these Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. You can get them at any drug store in the world for only 50c a package. It is worth it, Mr. Dyspeptic."

If he succeeded in reaching Moscow, he will confer with Count Tolstoi, who has watched the progress of the Doukhobors in Western Canada with great interest, and then he intends returning in the spring with a large party of immigrants. He reports that the Doukhobors have done well in Canada.

The balloons were carried off by a southwest wind and probably will land in Silesia or beyond.

The cost of stamping is said to be 15 cents each.

REJECTS 10-YEAR DOLE

Premier McBride Withdraws From Premiers' Conference.

British Columbia Is Therefore Free to Renew Demands Upon the Federal Government — Ottawa Conference Adopted the Quebec Resolutions Asking for Increased Subsidy and Adjourns With Cheers.

Ottawa, Oct. 15.—The interprovincial conference is over. It ended at 6 o'clock Saturday with cheers.

Premier McBride of British Columbia withdrew from the conference because the other Premiers wouldn't agree to an extra subsidy for the Pacific province. In addition to the regular grant he wanted a sliding scale, owing to the peculiar situation of the province. He wanted this to start at $1 a head and decrease as the population increased. Mathematically this means $1.05 for British Columbia as against 80 cents for the other provinces.

Mr. Whitney moved that British Columbia be given an extra $600,000 for ten years, but Mr. McBride would not consent.

May Make Renewed Demands.

By withdrawing Mr. McBride leaves himself and the province free to make renewed demands, not being bound to the terms of the conference.

The proceedings of the conference were handed out by Mr. Lanctot in the form of a series of resolutions, the subsidy demand being based on the Quebec resolutions with provision made for Alberta and Saskatchewan.

It was agreed to meet annually to discuss questions of common interest, the conferences to be convened by the Premiers of Ontario and Quebec.

In receiving the resolutions Sir Wilfrid Laurier made a cautious reply, promising to place the matter before his colleagues.

HON. J. J. FOY REVIEWS.

Premier Whitney Presented Memorandum Giving Reasons for Demand.

Toronto, Oct. 15.—Hon. J. J. Foy was the only Minister who left Ottawa for Toronto on Saturday. Hon. Mr. Whitney went to Morrisburg and Hon. Mr. Matheson to Perth. Both are expected in the city this afternoon.

Mr. Foy said that the provincial subsidy question was the only one taken up by the Premiers. The power question was not taken up, and the boundary question will be discussed at a conference in the middle of November by the provinces interested.

Premier Whitney had presented a memorandum of additional reasons why a larger sum than was demanded in the memorial of 1902 should be given Ontario. This memorandum may be published as soon as the Premier returns. He did not get the assent of the other provinces to this proposal, and was not inclined to a hasty disposal of the matter in view of his comparatively recent knowledge of the whole situation.

Why McBride Withdrew.

Premier McBride withdrew from the conference on account of the refusal of the others to consent to his demand for more than $100,000 in addition to what the other provinces got, and in addition to the extra allowances for British Columbia in 1902. Nor was he satisfied with the grant for ten years, but claimed the $100,000 in perpetuity. The peculiar conditions of the Pacific province, its 7,000 miles of highways, the immense cost of administering justice, one trial costing as much as $10,000 on account of the great distances, were conceded by all the others as affording grounds for special treatment, but they were not sufficiently special for Premier McBride.

A committee of the Dominion House met the conference and seemed favorably disposed to the claims made by the provinces, and it was gathered that their opinion would weigh with the Government. The committee intimated that nothing would be done till the B. N. A. Act was amended, which can only be obtained by petition of the Governor-General and the two Houses of Parliament. The Government were urged to introduce the necessary resolutions at the earliest possible moment.

Fisheries Question.

On the fisheries question all admitted that the present arrangement was very inconvenient by which the Dominion makes the regulations while the proprietary rights are with the provinces. The Dominion authorities thought it would be better if they took charge altogether, not because they wish to make any money, but to avoid further friction and the double jurisdiction. Some of the provinces conceded this and will recommend legislation to that effect. Mr. Whitney wished to consult his colleagues first, as the question was new to him, and it had not been suggested that it would come up, while the Ontario Minister in charge of fisheries was not present.

Quebec, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia have a tax on commercial travelers, and they were willing to abolish the tax and would recommend legislation to that effect, except in the case of agents for the sale of liquor, who should pay the same tax as the local sellers.

200 Miners Entombed.

Twenty-Five Are Dead In Big Mine Explosion in England.

Eighty Men Are Brought Up Alive—Signals Exchanged With the Bottom Seam Where Majority of Miners are Indicate That They Are Still Alive and May Be Saved—Firedamp Was the Cause of the Disaster.

Durham, England, Oct. 16.—As a result of an explosion in the Wingate colliery, near here, at about midnight Sunday night, 25 miners have been killed and 200 are entombed temporarily. It is fortunate that only a small portion of the thousand men employed in the mine were down when the explosion occurred.

The cause is supposed to have been fire damp. The explosion was one of terrific force, and in Wingate Town many windows were broken.

Heartrending Scenes.

Immediately the news of the disaster became known crowds of half-clad persons were rushing towards the mine, and there was heartrending scenes at the mouth of the pit among those whose loved ones were below.

At daylight signals had been exchanged with the bottom seam, where a majority of the men were entombed, to the effect that they were safe, and with this message a sense of relief passed over the crowd of anxious relatives waiting at the mouth. As the morning advanced the bodies of dead men slowly were brought up. The first dead to appear were mostly old men who had been employed as shifters and stonemen. The work of rescue was continued throughout the day.

80 Brought Out Alive.

Eighty men were brought out alive. Many of these, however, were in a critical condition and unconscious.

Later, supplies of coffee and sandwiches were passed into those still entombed.

At a late hour last night, to the joy of their relatives, four men were brought up from the lower seam, where the deaths had occurred. These men had been reckoned among the dead. Although they were exhausted they probably will recover

The shaft is still blocked with wreckage, but the ventilation is good, and it is hoped that all the entombed men are stil alive and will be saved.

Killed In Mine.

Glace Bay, N. S., Oct. 16.—Meda Sloan, white, a driver in the Hub colliery, was killed yesterday in the mine. He whipped up his horse when a box of coal got off the track and, striking a prop, dislodged a boom, letting down a mass of stone upon him from the roof.

Falls to His Death.

Toronto, Oct. 16.—Death came suddenly yesterday afternoon to Robert Bell, a painter in the employ of Barrett & Sons of 424 College street. Bell was working at the Palmerston avenue school and it was while engaged in painting the sash of a window, 30 feet from the ground, that the accident occurred. The sash gave way under his weight, and in trying to save the sash he lost his life. The neck was broken by the fall.

Nearly Over the Falls.

Niagara Falls, N. Y., Oct. 16.—A disabled launch containing a party of six men and women was swept into the rapids and within half a mile of the brink of the falls late last night. They were saved from a plunge over the cataract by Albert Greenwood of Chippewa, Ont., who brought them ashore in his launch. The party consisted of Capt. Charles B. REV. SAM JONES DIES.

Heart Failure Took Noted Evangelist In a Sleeping Car.

Little Rock, Ark., Oct. 16.—Rev. Sam Jones, the well-known evangelist of Cartersville, Ga., died early yesterday of heart failure in a sleeping car on a Rock Island train near Perry, Ark.

Mr. Jones had been conducting a most successful revival at Oklahoma City, and left there Sunday night for his home in Georgia. He desired to attend a family reunion to-day, it being the fifty-ninth anniversary of his birth.

Samuel Porter Jones was born in Chambers County, Alabama, on Oct. 16, 1847. In 1859 he removed to Cartersville, Ga., and studied under private tutors and at boarding schools, and in 1869 was admitted to the Georgia bar. He began his professional career with bright prospects of success, but after a short time broke down in health from nervous dyspepsia. He began drinking, and soon quit his legal career. In 1872 he was converted and began to take an active interest in church work, becoming a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in the same year. He undertook religious efforts with great zest, and during the eight years following was pastor of various charges under the North Georgia conference. Subsequent to this he became an agent of the North Georgia Orphanage, which position he filled for twelve years.

During his pastoral work he devoted a great deal of time to evangelistic endeavors and to the lecture platform, particularly in the last eight years. He was a partner with Sam Small in these religious tours. He had held revival meetings in almost all the cities of the United States and Canada.

No 'Honor Among Thieves'

Several of the witnesses in the London bribery case swore that they were paid the sum promised, minus 50 cents or one dollar retained by the paymaster, Mr. J. Collins, as commission.

Mr. John Pritchett on Thursday last testified before Judge Denison that he had been promised $100 a month to "leave the country" after the doings in London, but was paid only $50 a month, although he understood from a prominent politician not a member of the Machine that the full amount was put up for him.

Did the paymaster of this man deduct fifty per cent. as "commission" The conspirators who were given the bribery money taxed each outlay for their own pockets in addition to the pay they got direct, and which "made them rich."

No wonder the men whose votes were tampered with in the fashion related before Mr. Denison feel disgusted at the roguery practiced upon them.

To give an elector a present unconditionally, but in the hope to sway his vote, is a venial offence compared with the dirty traffic in votes carried on by the conspirators who shaved 50 cents off every payment made in the back room of Lewis' hotel.

But after all is said, was the commission system as practiced by the Liberal bribers different, except in degree, from the rake-off system as applied generally to public contracts at Ottawa? It would take a good microscope to detect a difference of principle.

No doubt the bribers felt good warrant for shaving a commission for themselves, in the presumed source of the money supplied to them to buy votes with and which is shaved in large slices from the contracts made by Government agents.

Election funds are created and augmented by this means, as the bribers well know. They accordingly feel no compunction in letting every penny possible stick to their own fingers.

What do the voters who were given a mere sop of the great boodle fund think of the Fagins who shaved a "commission" off it?

The Greater Crime.

The Toronto Globe in a leading article denouncing the corruptions disclosed in the investigation now in progress, says;

> "The worst form of the corruption as disclosed in the evidence was not the buying of votes, but the deliberate interfering with the election machinery; and the party in power must bear the responsibility for that most heinous political crime."

Does the organ, asks the London Free Press, refer to the switching of ballots? Even that most heinous offence against the laws was a trifle compared with the systematic interference by the ruling powers with the course of justice, when these villanies were detected.

The Crown prosecutor, Mr. DuVernet, was not beside the fact when he declared on Thursday that "the whole machinery of the criminal law of the country has been stopped against these men and this conspiracy for years, while they went up and down the country with their operations."

It is every word true. Men were caught at the tricks redhanded and let off when arrested. Some were allowed to escape on "straw bail" and no hand ever again stirred to find and punish them. Others were discharged with as little attention as a "common drunk" would receive in a police court. The hands of Crown officers seemed struck with a palsy when the crime took on a political complexion.

If The Toronto Globe has at last aroused itself to this state of affairs which continued through ten or twelve of the last years of the rotten rule at Toronto, its denunciation is most just and its conclusions, if belated, unanswerable.

Taste WINDSOR TABLE SALT. Does not "bite"—is not bitter. It is pure salt and all salt. Will not cake.

What is going to be done about it? What part will the admistration at Ottawa play in correction of the evils disclosed now, not for the first time, but more prominently than ever before? It is possible that Sir Wilfrid Laurier can remain deaf, dumb and blind to his duty with regard to the share of the villanies which had reference to Dominion elections?

"A Citizen" writes; "I believe in system as much as anybody, but it seems to me it is carried to extremes at the local post office. Yesterday I went to the wicket for my mail, going to the left hand wicket, as my cognomen is classed among the letters between M and Z. After being served I asked for the mail of a friend, whose name is classed among the letter A to L. The clerk politely told me I would have to apply at the other wicket for my friend's mail. Now, had there been two clerks doing the distributing I would not have been surprised, and would not have had a word to say, but there was only one. After I had passed down the middle and approached the A to L wicket I gave the countersign and was served by the same clerk who had waited on me on the other side. Does not this look like making two bites at a cherry. No doubt the clerk had his orders, but I would ask, does not the matter smack of childishness?"

There seems to be considerable force in the remarks of the London Morning Post, which, discussing the Newfoundland case, asks:

> "Are Canada and Newfoundland ready to fight the United States rather than give way? If not, it certainly is not for the colonies to abuse us for 'surrendering.'

There's the point. Some Canadian papers wasted much wind in abusing Lord Alverstone not long ago, but were they prepared to bear the "grim and grisly brunt" of a war which might follow if the boundary dispute were not settled? Of course, considering that Canada contributes 000,000 towards the support of the British navy she has the right to pick the quarrels and let J. Bull, Esq., do the fighting.

ELOQUENT HISSES.

(Toronto Telegram.)

The orchestra at the O'Connor reception in the Massey Hall on Saturday night inadvertently played "God Save the King" as the audience was dispersing.

The musicians fiddled in good faith. They had heard protestations of respect for the Union Jack and affection for the British Empire mingled with tributes to the greatness of Ireland's past and hope for the brightness of Ireland's future.

Accordingly the orchestra played "God Save the King."

Whereupon hisses came from the lips of indignant patriots and voices were heard in condemnation of the leader of the orchestra for daring to insult a true Home Rule assemblage with strains of Saxon melody.

These hisses were more expressive of the real sentiment that underlies the Home Rule movement than all the fine speeches that preceded the hisses.

There seems to be rather a knotty question involved in the following, from the Brockville Times. It is, perhaps, needless to remark that the principle involved has, probably, a local application in most places. The Times says:

> "We observe that Mr. Robinette, the prominent criminal lawyer of Toronto, has recently been made a leading pillar of a Y.M.C.A. organization. We also observe that Mr. Robinette is strenuously defending the men implicated in the London election corruption case. As a lawyer Mr. Robinette is, of course, quite within his rights in defending men charged with the rankest kind of election corruption and pocketing his fees for the same. But it seems to us that a man who professes a high standard of Christianity would be justified in refusing to defend any such charges of rascality. He would certainly be better employed in rooting it out than in trying to effect the escape from justice of election crooks."

It was probably some such incident as the above which caused an ancient and original worthy to coin the phrase; "One step forward and two backward — like lawyers go to heaven."

The lesson in the Ontario bank case seems to be that there are no dead sure things in the game of speculation. The "big guns" are just as liable to be mistaken as are the "pikers."

The Sweet Accident

Napanee, Oct. 15.—An accident with fatal results occurred, yesterday. at Fredericksburg Station. about five miles east of Napanee, resulting in the death of John Sweet, son of Mr. Robt G. Sweet, of Fredericksburg Station. The facts gleaned are that an accident to a freight train, early in the morning, had blocked the west track, and the sectionmen were working about this place. Sweet was one of the crew, and was sent to the station for a pail of water, and was returning on the east track. Owing to the accident to the freight blocking the west track, No. 1 International Limited was on the east track, but this was known to the sectionmen Sweet was walking on the track, and, apparently, did not hear the approaching train. When the engineer noticed him he whistled a prolonged whistle, which caused Sweet to turn about, when he was struck on the head by the engine and thrown some distance and instantly killed. His legs and arms were broken and a deep gash made on his forehead Deceased was about 20 years of age.

Coroner Cowan went out to the scene of the accident, but deemed an inquest not necessary, and from the particulars gleaned saw no reason to attach any blame to the G.T.R.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

The Krupp Wedding

Essen, Prussia, Oct. 15.—In the presence of Emperor William and 140 guests, Fraulein Bertha Krupp and Lieutenant Gustav Von Bohlen and Halbach were married to-day in a little improvised chapel adjoining the bride's birthplace, the Villa Hungel, by the pastor of the neighboring village church, where the Krupp family has long worshipped. The Emperor sat with the family during the simple Lutheran marriage service and then stepped forward and congratulated the bride and bridegroom.

Bertha Krupp and Lieut. Von Bohlen before the wedding announced their joint gift of $250,000 to the workmen's invalid fund, and Mrs. Krupp donated another $250,000 to the same fund and 125 acres of land on which to build economical model dwellings for the workmen.

SIR CHAS. CLIFTON BROWN

CURED OF BILIOUS HEADACHE BY BILEANS.

Sir Chas. Clifton Browne, who has toured considerably in Canada, interviewed at his Deal (Kent) residence, admitted that he had reaped very great benefits from Bileans.

He said: "I have no objection to you stating that I found Bileans a very fine medicine for biliousness, headache and digestive troubles generally. I suffered frequently from bilious headache, and nothing that I have ever yet tried did me so much good as Bileans. I believe they are a good thing and worthy of success."

In those last few words Sir Charles aptly summarizes Bileans: "A good thing." They are compounded from purely vegetable essences, and are the best possible remedy obtainable for headache, debility, dizziness, indigestion, etc. They also operate gently on the bowels, curing constipation, piles, etc. They correct female irregularities and ailments, pains in the loins and bearing down pains. They tone up the whole system and enable it to throw off colds, chills, rheumatism, etc. Anaemic and pale-faced women and girls will find them a veritable boon. Of all druggists at 50 a box, or post free upon receipt of price from the Bilean Co., Toronto: 6 boxes for $2.50. Send one cent stamp for sample box.

MR. C. C. NORRIS WILL ASSOCIATE HIMSELF WITH J. H. WOODS ADVERTISING AGENCY.

Toronto, Oct. 15.—Mr. C. C. Norris, who has been for eighteen years connected with the Mail and Empire, and for the last five years has been its advertising manager, has resigned his position with this paper. Mr. Norris has acquired an interest in the J. H. Woods Advertising Agency, Limited, of this city, and will hereafter be associated with Mr. Woods in the management of that business.

Mr. Norris is one of the best known and most successful advertising men in Canada, and his name is familiar in that connection to practically every large advertiser in this country and the United States. He has a very wide circle of business and personal friends, who esteem him both for his high standing in the advertising field and for his personal qualities. He will bring to his new sphere of activity an extensive knowledge of advertising values and conditions which cannot fail to ensure his future success.

Mr. Norris will remain in his present position until his successor is appointed, and will leave The Mail and Empire with the heartiest good wishes of its management and staff.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

ON OCEAN'S BED.

What Becomes of Ships Which Sink to the Bottom of the Sea.

What becomes of the ship that sinks in midocean? If it is of wood it takes, in the first place, considerable time for it to reach the bottom. In a hundred or more fathoms of water a quarter of an hour will elapse before the ship reaches bottom. It sinks slowly, and when the bottom is reached it falls gently into the soft, oozy bed, with no crash or breaking.

Of course if it is laden with pig iron or corresponding substances or if it is an iron ship it sinks rapidly and sometimes strikes the bottom with such force as to smash in pieces. Once sunken a ship becomes the prey of the countless inhabitants of the ocean.

They swarm over and through the great boat and make it their home. Besides this they cover every inch of the boat with a thick layer of lime. This takes time, of course, and when one generation dies another continues the work until finally the ship is so laden with heavy incrustations, corals, sponges and barnacles that if wood the creaking timbers fall apart and slowly but surely are absorbed in the waste at the sea bottom.

Iron vessels are demolished more quickly than those of wood, which may last for centuries. The only metals that withstand the chemical action of the waves are gold and platinum, and glass also seems unaffected. No matter how long gold may be hidden in the ocean, it will always be gold when recovered, and this fact explains the many romantic and adventurous searches after hidden submarine treasures lost in shipwrecks.

Maple Leaf Rubbers

The MAPLE LEAF Brand
TRADE REG MARK

"If I were to return to earth again I would provide my entire family with 'Maple Leaf' Rubbers."—Wireless from "the old woman who lived in a shoe."

You see the "old woman" is somewhat of a philosopher. She knows it would take a pile of money to keep her big family supplied with ordinary, go-to-pieces rubbers.

But "Maple Leaf" Rubbers are different. They're long wearers—money savers.

Only the finest Para gum, which makes the toughest, longest-wearing, most waterproof rubbers, is used in the manufacture of "Maple Leaf" Rubbers.

They are not loaded with any cheap, stiff, tarry substance which makes ordinary rubbers split, crack, wrinkle and become prematurely old and worn-out before "Maple Leaf" Rubbers show a sign of wear.

Styles and sizes to fit all shapes and sizes of men's, women's, children's shoes.

OCTOBER'S BRIGHT BLUE WEATHER.

(Helen Hunt Jackson.)

O suns and skies and clouds of June,
And flowers of June together,
Ye cannot rival for one hour
October's bright blue weather.

When loud the bumblebee makes haste,
Belated, thriftless vagrant;
And goldenrod is dying fast,
And the lanes with grapes are fragrant.

When gentians roll their fringes tight
To save them from the morning,
And chestnuts fall from satin burrs
Without a sound of warning.

When on the ground red apples lie
In piles like jewels shining,
And redder still, on old stone walls,
Are leaves of woodbine twining.

When all the lovely wayside things
Their white-winged seeds are sowing,
And in the fields, still green and fair,
Late aftermaths are growing.

When springs run low, and on the brooks
In idle golden freighting,
Bright leaves sink noiseless in the mesh
Of woods, for winter waiting.

When comrades seek sweet country haunts
By twos and twos together,
And count, like misers, hour by hour
October's bright blue weather.

O suns and skies and flowers of June,
Count all your boasts together—
Love loveth best of all the year
October's bright blue weather.

The latest thing in the way of appointments by telephone is at the barber's. For generations there has been a strict law which all men have bowed to, that a man was entitled to the services of the barber when his turn came, and that a man leaving a barber shop lost his turn. Now, however, in some of the more fashionable barber shops in New York, a customer may make an appointment by telephone. This places at a disadvantage a man not equipped with one.

"It is an ill wind that blows nobody good," and according to a speaker at a meeting of the Dublin Trades Council last night, the Chicago meat scandals are likely to work good for Ireland. There is plenty of money in Ireland, though some would never suspect it, and all that is wanting is to give the enterprise a fair start.

The fakirs and peddlers have, says an exchange, been doing the country. Good crops always bring them. It used to be a peddler was poorly clad, but nowadays the peddler is a well-dressed prayerful, smooth proposition, male or female.

Dr. A. T. Schofield, a leader in the medical profession and distinguished scientific authority, lecturing before a London audience the evening before last, told his hearers, according to yesterday's cable despatches, that it is estimated there are 200,000 premature deaths in the United Kingdom yearly and 6,000,000 preventable cases of sickness largely due to worry and anxiety about health. This seems rather a startling statement, but when one reflects upon the number of persons within one's own knowledge who are always anxious—always worrying either about their health, their lives or their work, one can easily believe that the estimate is no exaggeration.

HON. J. P. WHITNEY EXPLAINS

Provinces Hold Right to Submit Claims For Larger Sums Than Set Forth In Subsidy Resolutions.

Toronto, Oct. 16.—Premier Whitney returned to Toronto yesterday afternoon and received press representatives at the Parliament Buildings.

The conference of Premiers, he said, was very interesting, and especially to him on account of the novelty of the occasion.

Plunging at once into the subject of the provincial subsidy claims, he said it would be observed that the latter part of the first resolution adopted contained a reservation:

"Of the right of any province now to submit to such Government (of the Dominion) memoranda in writing concerning any claims it may have to larger sums than those set out in the said resolutions, or to additional consideration or recognition."

"This reservation," said the Premier, "was added to the resolution on the request of Ontario and British Columbia, after considerable discussion.

"In pursuance of this a memoranda was filed on behalf of Ontario, and was considered along with the resolutions by the Dominion Government. This memoranda (which is quite lengthy) gives the exact position assumed by Ontario.

Boundary Situation.

"As to the boundary question, so-called," continued Premier Whitney, "I understand Manitoba has had a claim before the Dominion Government for an extension of boundary. In pursuance of Sir Wilfrid's intention, expressed a year ago, he desires that Ontario, Saskatchewan and, I think, Quebec, should be present when the matter is argued before him. All the parties interested are agreed upon Nov. 12 as the day on which they will appear.

"With reference to the fisheries, Sir Wilfrid drew our attention to the inconvenience resulting from dual jurisdiction—the province owning the fish and the Dominion controlling the methods of fishing. He suggested that some agreement should be come to with reference to this question, but I took the position that it would be necessary to consult my colleagues and hazarded the view that the people of Ontario would not look with friendly eye at the handing over of anything looked on as their property.

"As to granting Dominion [illegible] to railways and other corporations doing business within the provinces we had some discussion. The Dominion took the ground that in some cases the provinces had been granting charters to companies doing business outside their jurisdiction. It was agreed that in future more care should be taken on both sides."

Mr. Whitney said the power question was not broached. He found Sir Wilfrid Laurier in very good health and looking well.

Mr. Whitney desired to say that the facilities and accommodation extended at Ottawa to those attending the conference were in every way admirable and excellent.

--The-- Crimson Blind

BY FRED M. WHITE

Author of "Tregarthen's Wife," "The Robe of Lucifer," Etc.

Copyright, 1905, by R. F. Fenno & Company.

"Here!" Enid cried. "To see Aunt Margaret? Then he found out about you. At all hazards Mr. Bell must not come here—he must not. I would rather let everything go than that. I would rather see auntie dead and Reginald Henson master here. You must——"

In the distance came the rattle of harness bells and the trot of a horse.

"I'm afraid it's too late," Ruth Gates said, sadly. "I am afraid that they are here already. Oh, if we had only left out that wretched cigar-case!"

CHAPTER XI.

"Before we go any farther," Bell said, after a long pause, "I should like to search the house from top to bottom. I've got a pretty sound theory in my head, but I don't like to leave anything to chance. We shall be pretty certain to find something."

"I am entirely in your hands," David said, wearily. "So far as I am capable of thinking out anything, it seems to me that we have to find the woman."

"Cherchez la femme is a fairly sound premise in a case like this, but when we have found the woman we shall have to find the man who is at the bottom of the plot. I mean the man who is not only thwarting the woman, but giving you a pretty severe lesson as to the advisability of minding your own business for the future."

"Then you don't think I am being made the victim of a vile conspiracy?"

"Not by the woman, certainly. You are the victim of some fiendish counterplot by the man, who has not quite mastered what the woman is driving at. By placing you in dire peril he compels the woman to speak to save you, and thus to expose her hand."

"Then in that case I propose to sit tight," David said, grimly. "I am bound to be prosecuted for robbery and attempted murder in due course. If my man dies I am in a tight place."

"And if he recovers your antagonist may be in a tighter," Bell chuckled. "And if the man gets well and that brain injury proves permanent—I mean if the man is rendered imbecile—why, we are only at the very threshold of the mystery. It seems a callous thing to say, but this is the prettiest problem I have had under my hands."

"Make the most of it," David said, sardonically. "I daresay I should see the matter in a more rational light if I were not so directly concerned. But, if we are going to make a search of the premises, the sooner we start the better."

Upstairs there was nothing beyond certain lumber. There were dust and dirt everywhere, save in the hall and front dining-room, which, as Bell sapiently pointed out, had obviously been cleared to make ready for Steel's strange reception. Down in the housekeeper's room was a large collection of dusty furniture, and a number of pictures and engravings piled with their faces to the wall. Bell began idly to turn the latter over.

"I am a maniac on the subject of old prints," he explained. "I never see a pile without a wild longing to examine them. And, by Jove, there are some good things here. Unless I am greatly mistaken—here, Steel, pull up the blinds! Good heavens, is it possible?"

"Found a Sistine Madonna or a stray Angelo?" David asked. "Or a ghost? What is the matter? Is it another phase of the mystery?"

"The Rembrandt," Bell gasped. "Look at it, man!"

Steel bent eagerly over the engraving. An old print, an old piece of china, an antique jewel, always exercised a charm over the novelist. He had an unerring eye for that kind of thing.

"Exquisite," he cried. "A Rembrandt, of course, but I don't recollect the picture."

"The picture was destroyed by accident after Rembrandt had engraved it with his own hand," Bell proceeded to explain. He was quite coherent now, but he breathed fast and loud. "I shall proceed to give you the history of the picture presently, and more especially a history of the engraving."

"Has it any particular name?" David asked.

"Yes, we found that out. It was called 'The Crimson Blind!'"

"No getting away from the crimson blind," David murmured. "Still, I can quite imagine that to have been the name of the picture. That shutter or blind might have had a setting sun behind it, which would account for the tender warmth of the kitchen foreground and the deep gloom where the lovers are seated. By Jove, Bell, it is a magnificent piece of work. I've a special fancy for Rembrandt engravings, but I never saw one equal to that."

"And you never will," Bell replied, "save in one instance. The picture itself was painted in Rembrandt's modest lodging in the Keizerskroon Tavern after the forced sale of his paintings at that hostel in the year 1658. At that time Rembrandt was painfully poor, as his recorded tavern bills show. The same bills also disclose the fact that 'The Crimson Blind' was painted for a private customer with a condition that the subject should be engraved as well. After one impression had been taken off the plate the picture was destroyed by a careless servant. In a sudden fit of rage Rembrandt destroyed the plate, having, they say, only taken one impression from it."

"Then there is only one of these engravings in the world? What a find!"

"There is one other, as I know to my cost," Bell said, significantly. "Until a few days ago I never entertained the idea that there were two. Steel, you are the victim of a vile conspiracy, but it is nothing to the conspiracy which has darkened my life.

"Sooner or later I always felt that I should get to the bottom of the mystery, and now I am certain of it. And, strange as it may seem, I verily believe that you and I are hunting the same man down—that the one man is at the bottom of the two evils. But you shall hear my story presently. What we have to find out now is who was the last tenant and who is the present owner of the house, and incidentally learn who this lumber belongs to. Ah, this has been a great day for me!"

Bell spoke exultingly, a great light shining in his eyes. And David sapiently asked no further questions for the present. All that he wanted to know would come in time. The next move, of course, was to visit the agent of the property.

A smart, dapper little man, looking absurdly out of place in an exceedingly spacious office, was quite ready to give every information. It was certainly true that 218, Brunswick Square, was to be let at an exceedingly low rent on a repairing lease, and that the owner had a lot more property in Brighton to be let on the same terms. The lady was exceedingly rich and eccentric; indeed, by asking such low rents she was doing her best to seriously diminish her income.

"Do you know the lady at all?" Bell asked.

"Not personally," the agent admitted. "So far as I can tell, the property came into the present owner's hands some years ago by inheritance. The property also included a very old house, called Longdean Grange, not far from Rottingdean, where the lady, Mrs. Henson, lives at present. Nobody ever goes there, nobody ever visits there, and to keep the place free from prying visitors a large number of savage dogs are allowed to prowl about the grounds."

Bell listened eagerly. Watching him, David could see that his eyes glinted like points of steel. There was something subtle behind all this commonplace that touched the imagination of the novelist.

"Has 218 been let during the occupation of the present owner?" Bell asked.

"No," the agent replied. "But the present owner—as heir to the property—I am told, was interested in both 218 and 219, which used to be a kind of high-class convalescent home for poor clergy and the widows and daughters of poor clergy in want of a holiday. The one house was for the men and the other for the women, and both were furnished exactly alike; in fact, Mr. Gates's landlord, the tenant of 219, bought the furniture exactly as it stands when the scheme fell through."

Steel looked up swiftly. A sudden inspiration came to him.

"In that case what became of the precisely similar furniture in 218?" he asked.

"That I cannot tell you," the agent said. "That house was let as it stood to some sham philanthropist whose name I forget. The whole thing was a fraud, and the swindler only avoided arrest by leaving the country. Probably the goods were stored somewhere or perhaps seized by some creditor. But I really can't say definitely without looking the matter up. There are some books and prints now left in the house out of the wreck. We shall probably put them in a sale, only they have been overlooked. The whole lot will not fetch £5."

"Would you take £5 for them?" Bell asked.

"Gladly. Even if only to get them carted away."

Bell gravely produced a £5 note, for which he asked and received a receipt. Then he and Steel repaired to 218 once more, whence they recovered the Rembrandt, and subsequently returned the keys of the house to the agent. There was an air of repressed excitement about Bell which was not without its effect upon his companion. The cold, hard lines seemed to have faded from Bell's face; there was a brightness about him that added to his already fine physical beauty.

"And now, perhaps, you will be good enough to explain," David suggested.

Suffered for 23 Years With Kidney Trouble.

CURED AT LAST BY GIN PILLS.

Whether you are just beginning to feel the first twinges of kidney pains—or whether you have tried for years to find relief—Gin Pills will cure you. Surely you can't doubt their virtues after such a letter as this:

"I sent for a free sample of your Gin Pills some time ago, and found them to give me great relief, so I put myself under the treatment, and am now using the third box, and feel myself entirely cured. I have suffered with my kidneys for 23 years. At the time I began taking Gin Pills I could not turn in bed without pain. If I moved at night, the pain would be so great that it would wake me up. Now I am free of pain, and feel as well as I did 23 years ago. I feel it my duty to let you know about Gin Pills, so that it might be the means of relieving some other sufferer.

"HENRY WAKEFORD, Toronto."

Gin Pills hold out a guarantee of certain, quick relief. They will stop the pain—heal the sick kidneys—and build up the whole system—or your druggist will refund your money. That shows our confidence in Gin Pills. We will do more. We will send you a trial box of Gin Pills absolutely free if you will write asking for it and state the name of the paper in which you see this. You can thus test them at our expense and see for yourself whether or not Gin Pills are all that we claim them to be. Gin Pills are for sale at all druggists. 50c a box—6 boxes for $2.50. The Bole Drug Co., Winnipeg, Man.

"My dear fellow, it would take too long," Bell cried. "Presently I am going to tell you the story of the tragedy of my life. You have doubtless wondered, as others have wondered, why I dropped out of the road when the goal was in sight. Well, your curiosity is about to be gratified. I am going to help you, and in return you are going to help me to come back into the race again. By way of a start, you are going to ask me to come and dine with you to-night."

"At half-past seven, then. Nothing will give me greater pleasure."

"Spoken like a man and a brother. We will dine, and I will tell you my story after the house is quiet. And if I ask you to accompany me on a midnight adventure you will not say me nay?"

"Not in my present mood, at any rate. Adventure, with a dash of danger in it, suits my present mood exactly. And if there is to be physical violence, so much the better. My diplomacy may be weak, but physically I am not to be despised in a row."

"Well, we'll try and avoid the latter, if possible," Bell laughed. "Still, for your satisfaction, I may say there is just the chance of a scrimmage. And now I really must go, because I have any amount of work to do for Gates. Till half-past seven, au revoir."

Steel lighted a cigarette and strolled thoughtfully homewards along the front. The more he thought over the mystery the more tangled it became. And yet he felt perfectly sure that he was on the right track. The discovery that both those houses had been furnished exactly alike at one time was a most important one. And David no longer believed that he had been to No. 219 on the night of the great adventure. Then he found himself thinking about Ruth Gates's gentle face and lovely eyes, until he looked up and saw the girl before him.

"You—you wanted to speak to me?" he stammered.

"I followed you on purpose," the girl said, quietly. "I can't tell you everything, because it is not my secret to tell. But believe me everything will come out right in the end. Don't think badly of me, don't be hard and bitter because——"

"Because I am nothing of the kind," David smiled. "It is impossible to look into a face like yours and doubt you. And I am certain that you are acting loyally and faithfully for the sake of others who——"

"Yes, yes, and for your sake, too. Pray try and remember that. For your sake, too. Oh, if you only knew how I admire and esteem you! If only——"

She paused with the deep blush crimsoning her face. David caught her hand, and it seemed to him for a moment that she returned the pressure.

"Let me help you," he whispered. "Only be my friend and I will forgive everything."

She gave him a long look of her deep, velvety eyes, she flashed him a little smile, and was gone.

CHAPTER XII.

Hatherly Bell turned up at Downend Terrace gay and debonair as if he had not a single trouble in the world. His evening dress was of the smartest and he had a rose in his buttonhole. From his cab he took a square brown paper parcel, which he deposited in David's study with particular care.

He made no allusion whatever to the sterner business of the evening; he was gay and light-hearted as a child, so that Mrs. Steel sat up quite an hour later than her usual time, absolutely unconscious of the fact that she had broken a rigid rule of ten years' standing.

"Now let us go into the study and smoke a cigar," David suggested.

Bell dragged a long deck-chair into the conservatory and lighted a Massa. Steel's offer of whisky and soda was declined.

"An ideal place for a novelist who has a keen eye for the beautiful," he said. "There you have your books and pictures, your stained glass and china, and when you turn your eyes this way they are gladdened by green foliage and lovely flowers. It's hard to connect such a room with a tragedy."

"And yet the tragedy was worked out close by where you are sitting. But never mind that. Come to your story, and let me see if we can fit it into mine."

Bell took a fresh pull at his cigar and plunged into his subject.

"About seven years ago professional business took me to Amsterdam; a brilliant young medical genius who was drinking himself prematurely into his grave had made some wonderful discoveries relating to the brain and psychology generally, so I decided to learn what I could before it was too late. I found the young doctor to be an exceedingly good fellow, only too ready to speak of his discoveries, and there I stayed for a year. My word! what do I owe to that misguided mind! And what a revolution he would have made in medicine and surgery had he only lived!

"Well, in Amsterdam I got to know everybody who was worth knowing—medical, artistic, social. And amongst the rest was an Englishman called Lord Littimer, his son, and an exceedingly clever nephew of his, Henson by name, who was the son's tutor. Littimer was a savant, a scholar, and a fine connoisseur as regarded pictures. He was popularly supposed to have the finest collection of old prints in England. He would travel anywhere in search of something fresh, and the rumor of some apocryphal treasure in Amsterdam had brought him thither. He and I were friends from the first, as, indeed, were the son and myself. Henson, the nephew, was more quiet and reserved, but fond, as I discovered, of a little secret dissipation.

"In those days I was not averse to a little life myself. I was passionately fond of all games of cards, and I am afraid that I was in the habit of gambling to a greater extent than I could afford. I don't gamble now and I don't play cards; in fact, I shall never touch a card again as long as I live. Why, you shall hear all in good time.

"We were all getting on very well together at that time when Lord Littimer's sister paid us a visit. She came accompanied by a daughter called Enid. I will not describe her, because no words of mine could do her justice. In a word, I fell over head and ears in love with Enid, and in that state I have remained ever since. Of all the crosses that I have to bear the knowledge that I love Enid and that she loves—and despises—me, is by far the heaviest. But I don't want to dwell upon that.

"We were a very happy party there until Van Sneck and Von Gulden turned up. Enid and I had come to an understanding, and, though we kept our secret, we were not going to do so for long. From the very first Von Gulden admired her. He was a handsome, swaggering soldier, a good-looking, wealthy man, who had a great reputation for gallantry, and something worse. Perhaps the fellow guessed how things lay, for he never troubled to conceal his dislike and contempt for me. It is no fault of mine that I am extremely sensitive as to my personal appearance, but Von Gulden played upon it until he drove me nearly mad. He challenged me sneeringly to certain sports wherein he knew I could not shine; he challenged me to ecarte, where I fancied I was his master.

"Was I? Well, we had been dining that night, and perhaps too freely, for I entirely lost my head before I began the game in earnest. Those covert sneers had nearly driven me mad. To make a long story short, when I got up from the table that night, I owed my opponent nearly £800, without the faintest prospect of paying a tenth part of it. I was only a poor, ambitious young man then, with my way to make in the world. And if that money were not forthcoming in the next few days I was utterly ruined.

"The following morning the great discovery was made. The Van Sneck I have alluded to was an artist, a dealer, a man of the shadiest reputation, whom my patron, Lord Littimer, had picked up. It was Van Sneck who produced the copy of 'The Crimson Blind.' Not only did he produce the copy, but he produced the history from some recently discovered papers relating to the Keizerskroon Tavern of the year 1656, which would have satisfied a more exacting man than Littimer. In the end the Viscount purchased the engraving for £800 English.

"You can imagine how delighted he was with his prize—he had secured an engraving by Rembrandt that was absolutely unique. Under more favorable circumstances I should have shared that pleasure. But I was face to face with ruin, and therefore I had but small heart for rejoicing.

"I came down the next morning after a sleepless night, and with a wild endeavor to scheme some way of getting the money to pay my creditor. To my absolute amazement I found a polite note from the lieutenant coldly thanking me for the notes I had sent him by messenger, and handing me a formal receipt for £800. At first I regarded it as a hoax. But, with all his queer ways, Von Gulden was a gentleman. Somebody had paid the debt for me. And somebody had, though I have never found out to this day."

"All the same, you have your suspicions?" Steel suggested.

"I have a very strong suspicion, but I have never been able to verify it. All the same, you can imagine what an enormous weight it was off my mind, and how comparatively cheerful I was as I crossed over to the hotel of Lord Littimer after breakfast. I found him literally beside himself with passion. Some thief had got into his room in the night and stolen his Rembrandt. The frame was intact, but the engraving had been rolled up and taken away."

"Very like the story of the stolen Gainsborough."

"No doubt the one theft inspired the other. I was sent off on foot to look for Van Sneck, only to find that he had suddenly left the city. He had got into trouble with the police, and had fled to avoid being sent to gaol. And from that day to this nothing has been seen of that picture."

"But I read to-day that it is still in Littimer Castle," said David.

"Another one," Bell observed. "Oblige me by opening yonder parcel. There you see is the print that I purchased to-day for £5. This, this, my friend, is the print that was stolen from Littimer's lodgings in Amsterdam. If you look closely at it you will see four dull red spots in the left-hand corner. They are supposed to be blood-spots from a cut finger of the artist. I am prepared to swear that this is the very print, frame and all, that was purchased in Amsterdam from that shady scoundrel Van Sneck."

"But Littimer is credited with having one in his collection," David urged.

"He has one in his collection," Bell said, coolly. "And, moreover, he is firmly under the impression that he is at present happy in the possession of his own lost treasure. And up to this very day I was under exactly the same delusion. Now I know that there must have been two copies of the plate, and that this knowledge was used to ruin me."

"But," Steel murmured, "I don't exactly see——"

"I am just coming to that. We hunted high and low for the picture, but nowhere could it be found. The affair created a profound impression in Amsterdam. A day or two later Von Gulden went back to his duty on the Belgian frontier and business called me home. I packed my solitary portmanteau and departed. When I arrived at the frontier I opened my luggage for the Custom officer and the whole contents were turned out without ceremony. On the bottom was a roll of paper on a stick that I quite failed to recognize. An inquisitive Customs House officer opened it and immediately called the lieutenant in charge. Strange to say, he proved to be Von Gulden. He came up to me, very gravely, with a paper in his hand.

"'May I inquire how this came amongst your luggage?' he asked.

"I could say nothing; I was dumb. For there lay the Rembrandt. The red spots had been smudged out of the corner, but there the picture was.

"Well, I lost my head then. I accused Von Gulden of all kinds of disgraceful things. And he behaved like a gentleman—he made me ashamed of myself. But he kept the picture and returned it to Littimer, and I was ruined. Lord Littimer declined to prosecute, but he would not see me and he would hear of no explanation. Indeed, I had none to offer. Enid refused to see me also or reply to my letters. The story of my big gambling debt, and its liquidation, got about. Steel, I was ruined. Some enemy had done this thing, and from that day to this I have been a marked man."

"But how on earth was it done?" Steel cried.

"For the present I can only make surmises," Bell replied. "Van Sneck

FARM AND FIRESIDE

Useful Hints Which Will be Appreciated by the Progressive Farmer and His Housekeeper.

APPLES EVERY DAY.

The wholesome apple is the one fruit of which we never tire. It is a satisfying staple, like bread, and good for every day. Either raw or cooked, it is safe and valuable for old and young, for the robust and the delicate. And it may appear in so great a variety of modes that it gives an inexhaustible field for the skill of the cook. While the usual ways of preparing and the constantly filled fruit dish may be the most useful, the less usual ways of serving give additional satisfaction. Here are some of the little novelties worth trying as an addition to the usual bill-of-fare.

Apples Baked with Nuts.

Pare and core tart apples; arrange in a baking pan, and fill the cavities with chopped hickory nut or English walnuts meats. Add a tablespoonful of the jelly and one of butter to half a cupful of hot water in the pan, and baste frequently. For sweet apples, fill the cavity, after removing the core, with orange marmalade. Eat with rich cream.

Apples Iced.

Pare, core, and arrange in a baking dish fine tart apples; fill the cavities with grated pineapple. Add half a cupful of the pineapple juice to a cupful of sugar and half a cupful of water, and baste the apples often with this syrup. Lift carefully without breaking when tender; cover with a meringue of beaten white of egg made fairly stiff with powdered sugar. Return to the oven to set the meringue. To the syrup in the pan whip in a cupful of whipped cream, and serve with the apples.

Flummery.

Fall Pippins, now in season, are very good for this and similar uses, but peaches or stewed rhubarb may be substituted for the apple. Cook quickly and sift, after a sufficient sweetening, a pint of fine apple sauce. Separate yolks thoroughly, and stir into the apple while very hot. Fold in the whites of eggs, stiffly beaten, when cool. Flavor slightly with bitter almond.

Apple Porcupine.

Pare and core half a dozen fine tart apples, and cook gently in a syrup made by boiling a cupful of sugar with half a cupful of water. Lift the fruit carefully when tender, and stick the apples over with blanched almonds cut in half lengthwise. Fill the cavities with marmalade or candied fruit, and serve with whipped cream beaten into the syrup.

Apple Cottage Pudding.

Butter a baking dish and place in it a layer of thinly-sliced, pared and cored tart apples. Make a batter with one egg, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, a cupful of flour, with one teaspoonful of baking powder and half a cupful of milk. Bake, and serve with a liquid sauce.

Apple Snow With Sponge Cake.

Bake fine tart apples, and scoop out the pulp carefully. Arrange in a dish for the table half a dozen slices or small sponge cakes, and moisten them with a thin boiled custard or with flavored cream. Mix the pulp of the apples with powdered sugar to sweeten, the juice of a lemon, and the stiffly-beaten whites of the eggs. Beat until thick and white; then heap upon the cake, and decorate with maraschino cherries and strips of angelica.

Clove Apples.

Boil some rather small, firm red apples in a thin syrup of sugar and water, taking care that they do not go to pieces. If whole, they should be cored, but not pared; or, if preferred, cut in quarters. Add to the syrup a dozen whole cloves, and boil down, after removing the fruit until it jellies. Pour over the apples, and serve as a relish with game or ducks.

Stuffed Apples.

Cut a slice from the top of tart apples, and scoop out the core and part of the inside, leaving a firm shell. Mix the scrapings of this pulp with equal parts of chopped raisins and almonds. Refill and replace the top, and bake, basting often with a thin syrup of sugar dissolved in a little hot water. Serve cold, heaped with whipped cream, flavored with orange or almond.

Apple Beauties.

Pare and core half a dozen fine tart apples. Make a syrup with a cupful of sugar, half a cupful of water, one lemon, the peel finely shaved off and the pulp cut in slices, rejecting the bitter white skin. Drop the apples into the hot syrup and cook until tender; pour over them the syrup, which should be clear jelly. Beat the white of an egg to a stiff froth; add powdered sugar, and beat again quite stiff. Drop in spoonfuls over the apples, and serve very cold.

Fruit Salad.

Six mellow, tart apples cut in dice; six oranges in neat bits, with all skin removed; half a pound of blanched almonds, sliced with a knife; a cupful of diced pineapple. Serve on crisp lettuce leaves with mayonnaise. Garnish with nut meats in halves.

AGRICULTURAL.

Mutton From Pasture.

Purchasing lambs of Western growers as early as marketable and shipping into the lamb-feeding districts to be fattened upon pasture specially prepared is becoming a repeated practice among farmers in several localities, and one that for a few years past has resulted in converting cheap feed into considerable profit. Where farmers in the past have judiciously conserved soil fertility and by the application of manure derived from winter feeding increased the productiveness of their farms, so that they are able, after removing a heavy hay crop, to produce a second growth of very palatable pasture, this practice of buying up early feeders of Western production is a highly commendable one. Farmers who have foreseen the advantages of making every acre of tillable soil return as large a profit annually as possible, and at the same time till their soils to increased productivity, are finding a ready market for fattened lambs at good profit earlier in the season than the winter feeder is able to market his later purchases. The people are constantly demanding fresh mutton and are willing to pay a discriminating price in favor of the freshly produced meat if it can be prepared and put upon the market as many months of the year as possible.

Advantages of Pasture.

Pasture in all enterprises of live-stock operations furnishes a most economical means of production. Farmers are fast coming to recognize this fact, and are evidently taking advantage of every afforded opportunity to fatten their stock upon green food. The fattening of the lambs upon late summer and fall pasture furnishes a means through which the farmer can meet the demand of early winter market long before winter-fed stock could be prepared for shipment. The lambs in reality are put upon feed nearly 60 days earlier that would be advisable to put into the fattening pen. The warm weather during later summer and early fall has a too overt influence upon the fattening progress of lambs to make early barn feeding profitable, while in pasture fattening this hindrance is entirely eliminated. It lessens the cost of production. When fattening operations can be conducted without the additional expense of labor, a great problem in live stock production has been solved in favor of the producer. By fattening upon pasture the farmer is able himself to handle several hundred lambs at a very depreciable cost, thus materially increasing the profitable side of the enterprise. Were it not possible to purchase the necessary material early in the fall the farmer would be compelled to either lose the second growth of hay or involve the expense of harvesting the crop, as the feeding operation generally supplies plenty of manure to go back upon the land to maintain fertility. The fattening of lambs upon pasture also has the advantage of restoring soil fertility in a very economical manner. The lambs in the course of a few days after arriving at the farm are turned into the field to graze. They roam the pasture from morn to eve, not only cropping the green forage, but leaving behind excrement that more than replaces what they have taken. At night they lay down upon the knolls, thus enriching the most needed of the soil. Fields that have been pastured for a few years in this manner during the fattening process have noticeably increased in fertility.

Time to Purchase.

Purchasing time with most farmers who have followed the business for several years depends upon the season to a large extent, as the pasture on the farm and supply of lambs ready for shipment in the West are governed by this prevailing condition. During the latter part of the month of August and early September are most favorable, as it gives the lambs the best pasture and longest to graze. The purchasing is done through two courses. Either the lambs are purchased upon the larger markets, where they are shipped direct from the producer, or in case a large number are needed to supply several farmers, a buyer is sent on to the range and makes his purchases directly from the owner of the lambs. The latter practice in the last two or three years has been most prevalent, as it gives the purchaser a better opportunity to select his stock and also to make direct shipment to the farm. Farmers who have received stock in this way are pleased with their bargains. It not infrequently happens, in order to supply the demand, many lambs have to be purchased upon the trade market as the supply in many instances is limited.

BETTER UNDERWEAR

Kind of Lambs Desired.

The kind of lambs that has given the best results on pasture fattening weigh anywhere from forty to sixty pounds per head at the time they arrive at the farm. The lambs most desired are those that possess stamina to a marked degree. When the lambs are brought eastward a marked change in climate and grazing conditions is forced upon them. If they cannot endure the change they are of no value to the feeder as they either die or fail to fatten. In the selection of lambs for pasture fattening too much stress cannot be laid upon the endurance qualities. The feeder wants lambs that as soon as put upon good feed will begin immediately to take on flesh, as it is desirable to place them upon the market again as soon as possible. We have found that the lighter and less thrifty class of lambs are very undesirable material and practically worthless. Lambs possessing strong marked indication of Merino type produce the most satisfactory lambs for pasture fattening.

Nature of Pasture.

The nature of the pasture for conducting the operation of fattening lambs is of much importance in relation to making the enterprise a success. Land upon which the work is conducted must produce a large amount of palatable pasture, as the greater portion of profitable gain must come from this source. Meadow lands possessing good producing soils, with sufficient moisture to stimulate grass growth during the late summer months, will supply acceptable pasture for lamb fattening. The forage must in no sense be tough or undesirable food, as the lambs fail to relish it and make profitable gain. In case the second crop has made a vigorous growth a second clipping will stimulate the underground roots to throw out a new growth that makes very palatable sheep feed. Where there are two or three meadow fields to be pastured an alternation frequently will stimulate materially the forage growth, and at the same time keep the lambs supplied with acceptable pasture.

Some Grain Necessary.

In order to make the lambs flesh up rapidly it is necessary to add a grain ration to the pasture. At this season of the year pasture growth has lost its greatest flesh-forming material and must be supplemented with grain. A grain ration consisting of oats, corn and either oil or cottonseed meal constitutes the prevailing additional grain. We have found that a ration possessing about a third oats, two-thirds corn, with a light additional amount of either oil or cottonseed meal, stimulates the appetite and causes the taking on rapidly of flesh. The grain is supplied twice daily in troughs about the field at convenient feeding places. When the operation of fattening lambs upon pasture is properly conducted it has proven quite profitable, taking one year and another.—Chicago Drovers' Journal.

POULTRY DEPARTMENT.

Turkeys in Fall and Winter.

As soon as the weather begins to turn cold, and insect food becomes scarce, an increased grain diet must be provided for the growing turkeys. A ration of wheat and corn is best. Do not feed them too much at first, but gradually increase the supply until they are having all they can eat.

Those Who Succeed Best in having the turkeys ready and in fine condition for the early market are those who allow them freedom, and feed them all they will eat of wholesome, fattening grain. Even when finishing them it is not well to confine them. If they are fed each day at regular hours, and at the same place, it will be an easy matter to have them come three times a day to this place to be fed. Their longing for food being fully supplied, less violent exercise will be taken, and the energy that would be expended in their wanderings in search of food will be directed in the more profitable channel of growing and developing for market. Turkeys that are poorly fed during the fall expend in seeking for food that is no longer attainable considerable of the flesh they may have gained.

When Feeding Turkeys for Market it must be remembered that they will sell for considerably more per pound than can be obtained for hogs or cattle, while the actual food cost per pound of turkey meat is but little, if any, more than for hogs or cattle. It will always pay well to give to growing turkeys all the grain they can eat.

Keep them growing from start to finish, and have them ready for the Thanksgiving market, when prices are usually the best. This may be accomplished quite easily with all the early broods, provided they are properly and liberally fed as the fall weather begins to remove their natural food supply of worms, bugs, seeds and herbs of all kinds. In feeding for market the end most desired is complete growth and the greatest possible weight by Thanksgiving time. The records of years show the highest value for market turkeys to have been reached during the last week of November. While the demand is not quite so brisk at Christmas time, the prices are almost as high.

Old Corn is Better Than New for heavy feeding, as the latter is apt to cause looseness of the bowels. If necessary to use new corn, it should be introduced into the ration gradually. If the poults have gained a strong, well-developed physique by early fall, they will be in fine condition for heavy feeding. As soon as they have become accustomed to grain feeding, they may be fed once or even twice a day on ground oats and corn meal mixed with milk. This should be given in addition to an abundance of wheat and corn. They should be fed each time just what they will eat up clean with a relish. Feed the grain mornings and evenings, and the mixture at noon or twice between morning and evening, as best suits your convenience. See that plenty of sharp grit is always at hand for their use, and provide a constant supply of fresh water where they may help themselves.

Special Foods.

Some who grow turkeys for a fancy market feed them chestnuts and celery seed during the last few weeks of fattening. These are rather expensive articles of food and can only be used by those who sell their product for almost double the average market price. Such feeding imparts a pleasant flavor that adds value to the turkeys which are finished in this way, and these find ready sale at the highest prices for the tables of those with whom cost is a minor consideration. Where the scale of prices is regulated solely by quality, the finest grades will sell from nine to twelve cents per pound higher than will the lower grades. To grow the best is quite as easy and but little more expensive than to grow the poorer grades, and the profit gained is almost double.

Makes the Hens Work.

Physical culture has been extended to include chickens, hens and other fowls by a recent invention of a Pennsylvania man. As man undoubtedly benefits by exercise, it follows that fowls should do likewise. This device is so constructed that the fowl, in order to secure food, is compelled to undergo increased exercises, as compared with the ordinary manner of feeding.

To carry the plan into effect, a circular plate about two feet in diameter is made to revolve on a wooden support, the circular plate being at an angle from the ground. Adjacent to the edge of the plate is a feeding box, open only at the side next to the plate. Fowls desiring food step upon the platform, causing it to revolve under their weight. The result is that they are compelled to move rapidly forward to maintain a position on the platform which will enable them to reach the food in the box. The framework supporting the circular plate can be adjusted to accommodate fowls of different weight.

Coarse Fodder for Poultry.

Make a practice of sorting your vegetables, storing by themselves for the winter use of your flock all those which are not readily salable or needed by the family. Indeed, it is an excellent plan, if your garden space will warrant it, to plant with this in mind.

Cabbage is easily grown and affords a bulky and easily digested food which they will greatly relish and which will do much to keep them in health. A supply of turnips, carrots, beets, potatoes, winter squashes, pumpkins, rutabagas, mangels, winter radishes, etc., will also be found desirable for use in the long, cold weeks of winter. Some of these vegetables may not have great feeding value nor merit as egg producers, but they are liked by the fowls, supply bulk to the ration, aid in giving variety to the food, and in a measure supply some of the summer conditions which are supposed to be indispensable to winter egg production.

If you have any clover growing upon your grounds, whether pure or mixed with other grasses, cut, cure and store it; for your feathered friends will welcome an occasional armful during the winter. They will pick it through and through, and the portion they discard will add to the litter necessary for the floor of their scratching shed.

The expense of litter, for you may not be farming on so large a scale as to produce your own straw, may be materially lessened in many ways. If a grove or bit of woods is near you enough fallen leaves can be gathered in one autumn day to last all winter, and they serve the purpose excellently. The grass and weeds of the roadside, fence rows and other waste pieces of ground may be cut, cured and made to do good service in this capacity. Madame Biddy will pick it over repeatedly and will find many a seed, leaf and blade exactly to her liking. Save the straw from the bean field for the same purpose. Should you chance to raise your own corn do not husk it in the field, but snap the ears and husk them in the scratching shed as you feed it in the winter. The husks make an ideal litter, as they are light and springy and do not readily gather dampness. The thick covering of them that gradually accumulates on the floor of the scratching shed will be warm for the feet of the hens, while it is readily thrown from side to side when they are busily scratching for the grain beneath. The husks wear well and will remain fairly dry and clean until literally "worn to frazzle." Break the ears of corn in pieces and strew them around in the litter. The hens will shell their own corn and will get good exercise out of it, instead of filling up and satisfying their hunger in a few minutes and then moping in idleness the balance of the day.

Buckwheat straw, while of little use or value for other purposes, can be made of some account in the scratching shed, though we would prefer to make use of corn husks or leaves if they are equally available.

Make the garden and the poultry yard work for each other. If there is an unoccupied spot of ground in the former that is big enough for a cabbage to grow in, make it pay for its keep. Feed your poultry whatever is edible that cannot be consumed by the family or sold, and see that all waste and litter from the garden and poultry house, scratching sheds and yards ultimately finds its way to the compost pile, thence, when well rotted, back to the garden to be turned into fertility and profit.

These are small and homely economies; but it is such as these when practised by the gardener and poultryman that helps to keep the balance on the right side of the book at the end of the year.—H.M.F., in American Cultivator.

FOUR MAGAZINES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

CO-OPERATION IN ADVERTISING MAKES IT POSSIBLE.

Half price offers are but combinations of advertising. In a word, four magazines band together, use the same publicity and share the expenses. Four magazines working together reduce the cost of publicity about one-fourth of what it would be if taken up alone. The receipts are approximately the same as if the publicity were carried on independently. And who receives the benefits from this publicity club? The patron of the magazines, inasmuch as he secures a reduction in the subscription price made possible by economy. And thus the home can now secure three, four and five periodicals, which present-day needs require, for little more than the old-time price of a single magazine, that once was the solitary visitor to the family circle.

For instance, Combination No. 2, advertised by the Central Magazine Agency in our columns, offers The Cosmopolitan Magazine, $1.00; The Harper's Bazar, $1.00; The Home Magazine, $1.00, and The Reader Magazine, $3.00—total value, $6.00—all four for $3.00, one-half price, a saving of fifty per cent.

Another good offer is The Delineator, McClure's Magazine, The World's Work and The Home Magazine. These four may be had for just $3.50.

One of the best bargains ever offered is The Cosmopolitan Magazine, The World To-day and The Home Magazine, all three for one year for just $2.00.

For $2.00 you can secure a year's subscription to The Cosmopolitan, The World To-day and The Home Magazine.

For $2.50 you can have The Cosmopolitan, $1.00; Home Magazine, $1.00; The Reader Magazine, $3.00, at one-half price, $2.50. All three for less than the price of one.

The best bargain of the year, however, is The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, Harper's Bazar and The Reader Magazine, total value, $6.00—all for half price, $3.00. This is positively the best bargain of the year.

Before subscribing to any magazines our readers should write the Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind., for prices. Further than this if you have spare time and want to earn Christmas money, the Central Magazine Agency will pay you a liberal commission on these great magazine combinations. You will be surprised to find how easy it is to make from $10.00 to $100.00 a week in securing orders from your neighbors. You can save them from 40 to 50 per cent. on their year's magazines and make a handsome commission for yourself.

To any newsdealer, druggist or agent who will act as our agent we will run their name and address at the bottom of our large display advertising. Our commission to agents or newsdealers is 35 cents an order.

Write to-day for our special offer or send your order for any of the combinations mentioned above. Remember, The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, The Reader Magazine and Harper's Bazar—all four for $3.00—total value, $6.00. You save 50 per cent. ST. HELENA.

The Transformation of This Once Barren Volcanic Waste.

St. Helena was a barren volcanic waste at the time Napoleon was sent there. The Englishmen were there, however, to stay and for duty, and, though they had a hard scramble for every drop of water they used, they set about a beginning of making something grow toward sustaining life, or at least modifying its conditions. Gradually, by slow degrees, but surely, their efforts were successful. Kindly nature requires but little encouragement, and the dews fell and crystallized, and the herbage and shrubbery spread, and little trees took root and shed their seed, and the mountain in the long course of years became largely covered, until at last this one time waterless heap of waste products of a lifeless volcano became able to provide millions upon millions of gallons of water, which is stored in its caverns, for the ships that pass to and from the Cape of Good Hope and to Australia, and beneath the shades of umbrageous terraces, high up in the cool air, the invalided soldier from tropical Africa and India and the orient finds a restoring sanitarium which has brought back to health and life many a weary soul and stricken body. Truly there is magic in the rain and healing in the forests!

Hadrian's Wall.

Hadrian in A. D. 120 built a stone wall from Bowness, near Carlisle, on Solway frith, to the river Tyne, near Newcastle. It was eighty miles long and garrisoned by 10,000 troops. It was twelve to twenty feet high at various points, eight feet thick at the top and provided with a gallery in the rear which enabled its defenders to take their stand with only head and shoulders visible to the enemy. At every quarter of a mile there was a castle with a garrison of troops. Beacon lights and signals were used, and on an attack, whether by day or by night, the news was at once flashed up and down the wall from sea to sea.—London Sphere.

Picked lots of prime sold for $4.50 to $4.75; loads of good, $4.35 to $4.60; medium, $3.75 to $4.25; common, mixed loads, $3.40 to $3.80; cows, $2.50 to $4 cwt.

MONTREAL LIVE STOCK.

Montreal, Oct. 15.—Cables from Liverpool on Canadian cattle were weaker and ½d lower, at 9½d to 10½d, and ranchers ¼d to ½d, at 8½d to 8⅞d. Sales of Canadian cattle at Manchester were made at 10d; the demand for ocean freight space is slow and steamship agents are having some difficulty in filling vessels, most of them sailing short of their regular number. London space has been let for nearby shipment at 25s, but for future 30s is the rate to all ports, except Glasgow, which is 35s. Exports last week were 6070 cattle, 580 sheep. Receipts to-day were 2000 cattle, 50 milch cows, 1000 sheep and lambs, 800 hogs and 400 calves. The butchers were out in large numbers and there was an active demand for the best cattle, but the common stock were slow of sale at pretty low figures and a large number were not sold. Mr. J. Richard paid $4.60 per cwt. for three choice steers; a number of prime beeves were bought by shippers at 4½c per lb.; pretty good cattle sold at from 3c to 4c, and the common stock at 2c to 3c, while the canners sold at 1½c to 1¾c; six milch cows sold at $30 to $50 each. Most of the calves were grassers, which sold at 2c to 3½c per lb.; good veals sold at 4½c to 5c. Shippers paid 4¼c per lb. for good large sheep; the others were bought by the butchers at 3½c to 4¼c per lb. Good lots of lambs sold at 5¾c per lb.; a few choice ones at 6c.

Supplies of hogs were smaller, for which the demand was good and prices ruled firm; sales of selected lots were made at $6.75 to $6.90 per cwt. weighed off the cars. Cables on Saturday on Canadian bacon were easier, with inside prices one to two shillings lower than a week ago, but they are 6s to 8s higher than the corresponding week last year.

are due to Eye-Strain and can be relieved by removing the cause? All diseases are made worse by anything that irritates and depletes the nervous system; and, naturally, any disease may be more or less relieved by correcting the nerve strain. There is a remedy for those whose occupations are such that they cannot take advantage of open-air life, but are forced to continue at a close range of vision, which is to aid the vision with the proper glasses, so that when it is being used at a near point the eyes will have about the same adjustment they would have in looking over the open country, and consequently the brain would be as free from strain.

Sir Mackenzie Bowell Is Now the President

OF THE NORTHUMBERLAND-DURHAM POWER COMPANY, LIMITED — MEETING OF DIRECTORS HELD IN THIS CITY YESTERDAY AFTERNOON.

A deputation of representative business men from several lake front towns, who are directors of the Northumberland-Durham Power Company, were in this city yesterday, and a conference was held at the Hotel Quinte yesterday afternoon. Those present at the conference were: J. A. Culverwell, managing director and pro tem. president of the Northumberland-Durham Power Company, Limited; E. C. S. Huyck, K. C., and Councillor Charles Munson, of Cobourg; Ald. Sinclair and Mr. H. C. Hunt Sec.-treas. of the Belleville Hardware Company, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and several prominent business men of this city. Urgent letters were sent by Robt. A. Mulholland and Col. H. A. Ward, M. P., of Port Hope, who were unable to be present.

This conference came as the climax to several other conferences which had been held recently, the object of which was to obtain the consent of Sir Mackenzie Bowell to become president of the Northumberland-Durham Power Company.

The upshot of yesterday's meeting was that Sir Mackenzie subscribed for stock and accepted the presidency of the company, though, in accepting, he pointed out that he had recently been retiring from some of his active business interests, but, owing to the urgent request of the deputation, and the absolute necessity of getting cheap electric power for Belleville, and this district, he felt that his duty, under the circumstances, was to do all he could to help the scheme along.

In conversation with a gentleman connected with the company we learn that the Northumberland-Durham Company at present holds a lease of the whole of Healey Falls and the lower rapids, and also owns, by deed in fee simple, two portions of the upper rapids.

The rates of the company are subject to regulation by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of the Ontario Government, which, only a few days ago, wrote the company in a way which would lead to the belief that Belleville's power would be supplied from Healey Falls.

The main transmission line of the company, with which they expect also to unite water powers on the Trent river, will run south through Campbellford to Brighton, where it will diverge, running west to Colborne, Cobourg and Port Hope, and east to Trenton and Belleville.

The head office of the Northumberland-Durham Power Company, Limited, is in Cobourg.

Mr J. M. Hurley, ex-M. P., of this city, has subscribed for stock in the Northumberland - Durham Power Company, Limited, and has been appointed one of the directors of the company.

Sends a Courteous Acknowledgement.

A very courteous acknowledgment of Belleville's hospitality has been received from Mr. Girdlestone. Our readers will welcome his letter:

King Edward Hotel,
Toronto, 12th Oct., 1906.

Dear Colonel Ponton, — I cannot too thankfully express my feelings in respect to the kindness of yourself and friends in giving me such a reception as that of last evening at Belleville. It has warmed my heart more than ever towards Canada and her people. It was a great honor done to myself, and to the ancient city which has deputed me to visit again your beautiful and thriving land. I can only thank all those who assisted in preparing, presiding, and entertaining me yesterday most cordially and sincerely. I shall never forget Belleville or its rulers. I take home with me to my well loved city a deep feeling in regard to the love and esteem which you and your people evidently hold for the Old Country, and the courtesy and kindness which you so invariably show to the visitors she sends out from time to time to your shores.

With kind regards and many thanks. Believe me,

Yours very truly.
(Sgd.). F. B. GIRDLESTONE.

Banks Will Keep Open On Saturday Afternoon

The Intelligencer had a conversation with a local Bank of Montreal man to-day and learned that, at a meeting held last Saturday afternoon in the Bank of Montreal, at which all of the local bank managers were present, it was unanimously decided that all the banks would hereafter keep open on Saturdays from 10 until 3 o'clock instead of from 10 until 1 as formerly.

Mr. Tannahill had been approached by some of the bank's customers and informed them that he was always willing to meet their wishes and views.

"Billy" Power is O. K.

Yesterday afternoon Miss Power, of this city, received a telegram from her brother, Mr. W. W. Power, announcing that he was well and was about to leave Geneva, O., for New York. This disproves the story, which became quite freely circulated yesterday, that he had been killed at New York city.

A Painful Accident

Miss Zella Gill, daughter of Mr. W. R Gill, yesterday afternoon met with a painful accident. She was about her father's place of business, near the upper bridge, when she accidentally fell over a box, with the result that the right elbow was dislocated. Two physicians were called in to attend the young sufferer.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE MARKS BROTHERS.

The Marks Bros. Company last night opened a week's engagement at the opera house here and if the attendance last night is a criterion of what it will be nightly, they are certainly assured of bumper houses. Every seat in the building was filled and many were compelled to stand. The play presented was "Lost and Won," which proved pleasing to all the patrons. The various roles were well taken by the members of the company, who have an excellent conception of their parts. The company is worthy of patronage. The specialties were good, including popular songs by Baby Rosie Machan, Kitty Marks, and other members of the company. The acrobatic work of Mr. and Mrs. Bedard was good.

RETURN OF THE FAVORITES.

The big posters read: Frank W. Nason invites you to see George F. Hall in the musical absurdity entitled, "Hello Bill," at the opera house on Monday evening next. Mr. Hall has a large following here in Belleville, who have seen him both in comedy and melodrama, and now that he is to be with us once more with a musical production his appearance will be watched with more than usual interest. "Hello Bill" is a musical vehicle that has been written especially for Mr. Hall by Matt Ott, the well-known Boston author, one of whose biggest hits was "The Star Gazer," written for his brother, the late Joe Ott. He has also written such musical successes as "All Aboard," "What Wright Left" and "The Belle of Boston." Mr. Hall is under the personal direction of Mr. Frank W. Nason, whose attractions are well known.

An attractive feature of the gathering will be the presence of returned missionaries from the foreign field who are on furlough at present.

SAYS DIRECTORS LACKED NERVE.

TORONTO FINANCIAL AUTHORITY IS SEVERE ON THE MANAGEMENT OF THE DEFUNCT ONTARIO BANK.

Toronto, October 15.—In discussing the affairs of the now practically defunct Ontario Bank, one of the most prominent financial authorities in the city expressed himself as being of the opinion that the whole thing from the standpoint of the shareholders had been about as badly managed as it could possibly have been.

"Why, if instead of losing their heads just at the critical moment, and throwing themselves body and soul into the hands of the Bank of Montreal, the directors had only kept cool and given some of the other banks or financial institutions a few days' notice of their necessities, I feel perfectly sure an arrangement could have been arrived at by which the bank could have kept its doors open and saved for the shareholders their interest in a magnificent running concern, which had been gradually worked up during nearly fifty years, and which is now gone from them at one swoop.

"It is true they might have made a heavy loss, but they will lose heavily in any event, and they might as well have had left to them all that splendid machinery for profit-earning in the future, which a bank as a live institution affords. It is, in my opinion, one of the most pitiful instances of lack of nerve and even of ordinary business acumen that any board of directors were ever guilty of, and I should certainly think that they will hear from some of the shareholders, among whom are some shrewd financiers. The sum of $150,000—which it is stated is being paid for the good will of such a business as that of the Ontario Bank, with its $13,000,000 deposits is less than one-quarter of what it is probably worth as an asset. Supposing the entire existing capital and rest had been wiped out, any amount of fresh capital could have been found for a running concern with an established business. Beyond a doubt large dividends could have been paid from the start, and in the present sound financial condition of the Dominion it would only have been a few years before it would have been well on its feet again. There is absolutely no excuse for a bank to go out of business at present. Why, new charters are being applied for at every session of Parliament. And to think that the exercise of ordinary common sense, and the giving of 24 hours' more notice to its friends, would have saved to its shareholders what was in reality (once its troubles were straightened out) one of the soundest and most profitable banking businesses in the country. Pshaw! it is enough to fairly madden them," he concluded, with a gesture of impatience.

Sunday School Workers.

The 41st annual convention of the Sunday School Association of Ontario meets in Kingston next week from the 23rd to the 25th. Three of the International Sunday School secretaries are to be present, viz., Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner, Peoria, Ill. Rev. W. C. Merritt, Tacoma, Wash., and Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D. D. of New York. Amongst Ontario experts who are announced to speak is Miss Mary Yeomans, Primary Superintendent of Bridge St. Methodist Sunday School, of this city. Miss Yeomans' subject is "The Modern Primary Department."

Died at Plainfield

On Wednesday morning, Oct. 10, the death occurred at Plainfield of George Henderson, one of the old residents of the village. Mr. Henderson, who was a native of Ireland, had lived nearly all his life in Hastings County and for many years in Plainfield. He was 73 years of age. Death was not unexpected, as he had been ill for some weeks. Surviving are his widow, one daughter, Mrs. J. Johnston, of Melrose, and two sons, G. W., of Shannonville, and J. D., of Melrose. The funeral services, held in the West Methodist Church at Plainfield on Friday afternoon, were conducted by Rev. W. H. Buckler and were largely attended. A large circle of friends will join in extending their sympathy to the bereaved family.

No range can bake so well as the Imperial Oxford, because no other range has the Diffusive Oven Flue that draws in pure air constantly, heats it just as hot as you want it heated, and sends it through every part of the whole oven every second. That flue, found only in this perfect range, keeps that heated pure air—DRY air—constantly moving DOWNWARD through the oven, over the baking food, and out up the chimney. When it enters the oven it's hot and dry; when it leaves it, it's wet air,—carries with it all the moisture, all the odors, but NONE of the juices of the food that's being baked.

Please visit any of our stores and see why this is the right range for your kitchen.

OF SUN LIFE'S PROFITS

Ninety-Five Per Cent. Goes to the Policyholders.

The Other Five Per Cent. Is the Compensation to the Shareholder—Commissioner Kent Suggests the Mutualization of the Company—Insurance Commission Resumes at Montreal With Macaulay on the Stand.

Montreal, Oct. 16.—The Insurance Commission began its investigation in Montreal at noon yesterday, sitting in the Court of Appeals.

The first person to be examined yesterday was Mr. R. Macauley, president of the Sun Life. Mr. Shepley endeavored to ascertain the view of the directors of this company respecting division of profits, particularly as the statute of incorporation gives them discretionary powers. Mr. Macauley was non-committal in making distinction between policyholders and shareholders, but finally, speaking of his own past course, said that he had always stood for the best interests of the policyholders whenever a question involving their interests arose. The Sun's profit-distributing period is quinquennial, but 68 per cent. of its policies are on the deferred dividend plan.

Power of Investment.

At the opening of the afternoon session the question discussed was the powers given the Sun Life of investment under their charter and under the general insurance act. The disputed clause in the Sun Life charter reads: "Any of the public securities of the province or the stocks of any of the banks or other chartered companies."

The stand taken by the Sun Life is that the phrase, "of the province," is not understood.

Mr. Shepley pointed out that the question had been raised some time ago by the Department of Justice and an opinion rendered thereupon.

Its Charter Power.

"There is a clause in the general insurance act which says that nothing in that act will revoke the charter power of the company," said the witness.

"What are the points on which you have had differences of opinion with the Department as regards investments?" asked Mr. Shepley.

The witness said that the act excluded investment in electric power, but not electric light companies. Again a company could invest in the securities of companies incorporated in Canada. This the Sun Life applied to companies incorporated but not operating here.

Thirdly, the Government tried to include in the whole amount to be invested in foreign securities the Canadian securities deposited in foreign countries to allow of doing business there.

The company followed its own interpretation in these matters.

"You do not feel called upon to submit to the departmental ruling?"

"Not unless we agree with it."

Capital of the Company.

The subscribed capital stock of the company was $500,000 at first, on which 10 per cent. was paid. In 1876 12 1-2 per cent. was paid up, and in 1897 another call brought the paid-up capital to 15 per cent. In 1897 the company was thinking of entering the State of New York and required $100,000 additional capital to meet the law there. Two thousand shares of new stock were issued at 15 per cent. paid up, being sold at $95. The paid-up capital has thus remained at $105, or 15 per cent. paid up.

Holdings of Directors.

The holdings in Sun Life stock of the directors of that company were read as follows: Charles Cushing, 50; J. R. Dougall, 35; A. Kingman, 55; A. McKergow, 35; R. Macaulay, 517; T. B. Macaulay, 141; R. Macaulay (in trust, comprising some held as security for loans, and some in trust for his wife), 209; Mrs. T. B. Macaulay, 53; Mrs. A. J. Macaulay, 20; Dr. H. R. Macaulay 173.

"What others belong to the Macaulays?"

"I think you have exhausted the list."

"That makes 1,740 shares."

"Yes, out of 7,000."

Mr. Shepley asked what was the attitude of the Sun Life with regard to proxies. There hasn't been a proxy issued for 15 years, said the witness. He afterwards qualified this by saying that certain proxies remained unrevoked, but were not used at meetings. There has been no change in the directorate of the Sun Life since 1891, save those made by death.

The witness said that the board was active and attended meetings regularly.

Policyholders Profits.

The division of profits showed that the present proportion used by the Sun Life was 5 per cent. of actual realized profits to the shareholder, and 95 per cent. to the policyholder. The proportion formerly had been 6 2-3 and 93 1-3 per cent.

"What was the reason of this increase — Montreal generosity?" asked Mr. Shepley.

"No, it was a liberal disposition on the part of the board of directors. You will find no company in the country more generous."

T. B. Macaulay was sworn to explain the change of rate and other matters in the shareholders' account. He said the Sun Life had tried to be generous to its policyholders, although they did not need to, and it was only fair the shareholders should get a fair compensation for risking their money.

No Risk In Sun Life.

"Pardon me," broke in Commissioner Kent, "a man runs no risk in putting his money in the Sun Life."

There was a prolonged debate between Counsel Shepley and two witnesses on the division of profits, the three studying an account of the affair from year to year, prepared by the Sun Life. At the conclusion of it Commissioner Kent had an inspiration.

"In view of hard usage, which the shareholders have received, according to your account, and the risk in which their money stands, do you think it would be a good thing to return them their capital and get rid of them at once and for all, and give all the profits to the policyholders, and have everybody satisfied?"

T. B. Macauley replied to this: "I would like to say emphatically that we have not done anything but give the shareholders the interest on what they paid in without taking a dollar from the policyholders. We have led all the companies in reducing the amount paid to shareholders."

ONTARIO BANK AFFAIRS.

Ex-Manager McGill Says It Was Virtually Insolvent When He Took Hold—Formal Transfer Made.

Toronto, Oct. 16.—The formal agreement transferring the assets of the Ontario Bank to the Bank of Montreal was engrossed and signed at the head office of the bank, Scott and Wellington streets, at 9 o'clock last night.

The board of directors of the Ontario Bank were in session yesterday afternoon with representatives of the Bank of Montreal, and it was decided that in the best interests of the shareholders, and as supplementing the agreement with the Bank of Montreal, a curator and an advisory board should be appointed by the Canadian Bankers' Association under the Bank Act of 1900 to co-operate with the directors of the Ontario Bank. W. E. Stavert of the Bank of Montreal, it is said, is to be curator, and Byron E. Walker, general manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce; D. R. Wilkie, general manager of the Imperial Bank of Canada, and Duncan Coulson, general manager of the Bank of Toronto, the advisory board.

Insolvent When He Took Charge.

These, with ex-Manager McGill's statement, claiming that the Ontario Bank was virtually insolvent when he took charge, and that his speculations were permitted by the directors in an effort to pull it out; and President Cockburn's reply, claiming that McGill's statement lacks foundation, were the main events in yesterday's history of the bank.

E. S. Coulson, president of the Bank of Montreal, declined to make any statement, and returned to Montreal at 10.30 p.m.

President Cockburn, who was returning home after signing the formal transfer, said:

"I do not think that we are called upon to spend $1,000 or $2,000 of the shareholders' money in any criminal prosecution. Is not that the business of the authorities? That is what they are paid for."

He further stated that every effort would be made to save money for the shareholders.

THIRD VICTIM OF STRIKE WAR.

Detective Warner, Shot at Buckingham Dies From Injuries.

Buckingham, Que., Oct. 16.—Detective Warner of Montreal died here yesterday morning. This is the third death from the fight which recently occurred at MacLaren's mills. Warner belonged to Thiel's Detective Agency.

Despite the superficial quiet, the resentment among the strikers is burning deeper and trouble is anticipated when the Dragoons leave.

At 1.30 o'clock yesterday a number of strikers, about a hundred in all, appealed to Mr. Alexander Cunningham for work. Many of the strikers are starving, and though Mr. Cunningham has now as many men as he wants, he engaged 75 of them. He is a lumber merchant of Buckingham. He said this afternoon he would rather take these men on their own terms than see them go hungry. This reduces the number of strikers who are out of work to 175.

The juries for the inquest of the two dead strikers met yesterday morning, but were dismissed by Coroner Rodrigue. Dr. Fontaine will empanel others.

The mills, though short-handed, are working.

OTTAWA CONTRACTOR

Did He Answer Query: Where Did Money Come From?

Results as Ascertained by Bribery Counsel DuVernet—Went to London With Several Hundred Dollars, But Returned to Ottawa With Depleted Pocket—More Voters Tells of Being Bribed.

Toronto, Oct. 16.—The lengthy examination to which James White, contractor, of Ottawa, and prominent in party organization there as president of the Liberal Association, was subjected by Mr. DuVernet in the London bribery case yesterday, was an apparent effort to get an answer to the pertinent query of "Where did the money come from?"

The results may be briefly summed up as the establishing of the fact that whereas Mr. White went to London with several hundred dollars in his possession, he returned with his finances in a depleted condition; that he personally paid the railway fares to London of four election workers and tendered also payment for their hotel bills in London with a sum of money; that, so far as the recollection of the witness went might have been anywhere from $200 to $400 What was more, he handed the bulk sum to one of the quartette, and had no personal knowledge as to whether or not the money was actually applied to the defraying of the bills referred to. One of the four was stated to be a customs broker named Higgerty, another, Stewart, is a member of the Railway Commission staff, and a third, McGraw, is an alderman of Ottawa. Mr. DuVernet intimated that one of the four, presumably Higgerty, to whom witness believed he advanced the expense money, will be subpoenaed to give evidence.

Magistrate Rebukes Evasion.

Mr. White, in replying to questions touching his share in contributing to the campaign fund, was taken to task by Magistrate Denison for the evasive nature of his answers in disclaiming having made any such contribution, and it was then elicited that while the contractor had not made any direct contribution, he had "staked" the quartette from Ottawa, mention of whom had hitherto been avoided.

Another feature of the day was the continued absence of William Spence, Sr., whom it is desired to examine in events leading up to his being suspended in his post of deputy returning officer by Jerry Collins. Mr. DuVernet expressed a belief that Spence had left the country, in which the magistrate concurred.

The remainder of the time was taken up with the depositions of voters who had "got theirs." A stumbling block was struck, however, in one Kallenbach, who flatly contradicted the evidence of Collins as to having been paid for voting for Hyman. A fresh batch of "independent" voters is expected from London, when the court resumes at 11 a. m. to-day.

To Nationalize Railways.

New York, Oct. 16.—The report current in America that Premier Campbell-Bannerman and his associates are considering a scheme of Government ownership of British railroads is true to some extent, says a London cable despatch to The Times. The Government has no idea whatever of bringing in a bill for the nationalization of any other railways than those of Ireland. The Irish roads, the Government is inclined to think, should be taken over by the nation in order to advance the welfare of Ireland.

Henderson Case Dismissed.

Walkerton, Oct. 16.—The case of Adam Sielings of Walkerton vs. R. I. Henderson of Toronto, charged with having obtained $1,400 by false pretences, and which was sent up for trial some time ago by Magistrates Robb and Tolton, was tried yesterday before Judge Barrett. The judge held no reliance could be placed in Mr. Sielings' evidence, as the story he told before the magistrates did not correspond with his story to-day, and he dismissed the case.

Croker Wins Suit.

London, Oct. 16.—The suit of Richard Croker against The London Magazine, for libel, has been settled. The terms include the publication in the next number of a full withdrawal of the statements complained of and an apology, and probably a statement that the series of articles entitled "Tammany in England," will be discontinued. The defendants will also pay Mr. Croker's costs.

C. P. R. Grain Receipts.

Winnipeg, Oct. 16.—The total receipts by the C. P. R. up to the close of business Saturday were: Wheat, 19,876,000 bushels; other grains, 1,225,000 bushels. This establishes a new record. In the corresponding period of last year the receipts were: Wheat, 18,899,000 bushels; other grains, 731,000 bushels.

Resigns the Governorship.

Colmar, Upper Alsace, Germany, Oct. 16.—Prince Alexander Von Hohenlohe, youngest son of the late Chancellor Von Hohenlohe, who recently caused the publication of the latter's "recollections," and was rebuked by Emperor William for his "tactlessness" in so doing, Sunday visited Chancellor Von Buelow at Hamburg, and yesterday sent his resignation as district governor to the governor-general of Alsace Loraine.

Postoffice Robbed.

Brockville, Oct. 16.—Sometime during Saturday night the general store and postoffice at Rockspring, owned by P. J. Latimer, was broken into and between $50 and $60 worth of postal notes purloined, also $25 in stamps, and $20 in cash.

Schooner Hits Lighthouse.

Kingston, Oct. 16—The schooner Bertha Kalkins is in port for repairs. She ran into the lighthouse at Charlotte during a fog, and was somewhat shaken and broken. Capt. Shaw was injured about the face in the kitchen.

He was found shortly after, but life was extinct.

YANKEE FISH POACHERS.

Capt. Chayter of U. S. Revenue Cutter Reports Them in the Wrong.

Washington, Oct. 17.—The controversy which has been waged between the American and Canadian lake fishermen for the past twenty years has been placed in a different light by a report made to the State Department by Capt. E. C. Chayter, commanding the United States revenue cutter Morrill on the great lakes.

The report shows that the American fishermen have been the transgressors, and that they have been treated with the greatest consideration by the Canadian fishing patrol.

From Witness To Prisoner.

Sudden Translation Of "Tom" Lewis in Bribery Case.

Magistrate Denison Ordered Arrest For "the Worst Case of Perjury I Have Heard in Many a Day" —Bail Refused—Thirteen Witnesses Swear to Bribes Received Aggregating $117,50, at $10, $9.50 and $5.

Toronto, Oct. 17.—"Tom" Lewis, erstwhile proprietor of the Normandy Hotel, London, and. by the statements of a number of witneses, an active participator in the wholesale bribery of voters, was placed under arrest on a charge of perjury at the conclusion of evidence given by him in the witness box yesterday afternoon. Mr. Robinette used vigorous arguments in an attempt to induce Magistrate Denison to allow the prisoner to be released on bail, but the magistrate declined to do so, pending instructions from the crown to this effect. Mr. DuVernet was unable to get into communication with Hon. Mr. Foy last night, and Lewis remains in custody for the present.

Transition Was Sudden.

The transition in the role played by Lewis from that of witness to the one of a prisoner charged with a serious offence, was startlingly sudden. For the space of one and a half hours during which Lewis was in the box he did little else than deny the truth of the depositions of other witnesses indicating bribery on his part in the London bye-election, and in previous elections in other ridings. The cumulative effect of all this testimony was staggering, but the witness held his ground against it and gave the court the assurance that never at any time in his life had he bribed a voter. So puny appeared Lewis' attempt at controversion that Magistrate Denison later in refusing bail declared that it was "the worst case of perjury I have heard of in many a day."

Take Him Into Custody.

It was as Lewis turned to leave the box that the crisis came. Magistrate Denison in a low voice directed Constable Macdonald to take him in custody. Lewis' features were impassive as he made his way to where he had been sitting on the east side of the court room, picked up his hat and was received at the entrance of the prisoner's dock by two constables.

The information sworn out against Lewis charges that he

"Unlawfully did, being a witness, in a judicial proceeding, namely, a charge of conspiracy against John O'Gorman and others, being investigated before the said George Taylor Denison in open court make assertions as to matters of fact and knowledge as part of his evidence upon oath, such asertions being known to such witness to be false and being intended by him to mislead the said magistrate holding the said proceeding."

More Voters Get Cash.

The remainder of the day was taken up with listening to the individual experiences of a fresh batch of London voters, several of whom connected Lewis with the arrangements for payment.

These testified yesterday that they had received the amounts opposite their names to vote for Mr. Hyman in the bye-election of June, 1903:

Samuel Baumback	$10.00
George Stevenson	10.00
Henry Taylor	10.00
Henry Gregory	10.00

Canada Must Be Blind.

Toronto, Oct. 17.—"When I think of the great portion of Canadian commerce which is not going through your own ports, I marvel at your blindness—or perhaps apathy is the better word, for I am sure you know that the ports of Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore are getting the bulk of Anglo-Canadian traffic that should be handled by your ports alone."

This was a statement made by F. B. Girdlestone, general manager of the Bristol docks, England, before the members of the Board of Trade yesterday.

8,000,000 Britishers Lost.

In the last 40 years eight millions of emigrants were allowed to discard British allegiance."

The Conference of Premiers

British Columbia appears to have been the rock on which the Inter-Provincial conference split. Premier McBride came down to the conference with definite demands and absolutely refused to consent to any meditication of his proposition. Mr. McBride asked that the British Columbia subsidy should be made on the principle of a sliding scale beginning with an allowance of one dollar per head per annum on a population of 300,000. and gradually decreasing to a minimum of 25 cents per head when the population should reach 2,500,000 and to remain at this minimum allowance. For two days practically, this question was under discussion, the representatives of the other provinces declining to accede to the proposition of the British Columbia Premier and the latter refusing to accept compromise suggestions. The last of these, made, it is rumored, at the instance of Federal Ministers, although the conference was supposedly secret, was that British Columbia be given an additional subsidy of $100,000 per year for three years, the future allowance to be a matter of adjustment with the Dominion Government at the expiration of this period.

Mr. McBride declined to accept this offer in satisfaction of the provinces' claims and after a formal protest withdrew from the conference. This was at noon Saturday. Subsequently he forwarded to the chairman of the conference a letter in which he set forth the position of his Province, pointing out that British Columbia had contributed since joining Confederation nineteen millions of dollars more to the Federal exchequer than had been expended in the Province, that the financial terms originally conceded to British Columbia were the least favorable possible, the fear existing 35 years ago that the province would not pay its way; but as that had proved otherwise the Dominion was bound morally, as well as constitutionally, to substitute fairer terms than those now in force. He further showed that for the past 30 years the average yearly per capita expenditure of the Provinces was as follows. British Columbia, $11.83; Manitoba, $4.31; P. E. Island, $2.91; Quebec, $2.44; New Brunswick, $2.16 Ontario, $1.79; Nova Scotia, $1.65. He added that while willing to accept any reasonable amendment conditions in British Columbia would always remain which would forbid the acceptance of a flat rate.

The withdrawal of the British Columbia representative robs the recommendation of the conference of the element of finality and unanimity which would have rendered it a merely formal matter for Sir Wilfrid Laurier to obtain the sanction of an imperial enactment to the proposed increase of provincial subsidies. These increases will mean an addition of about three millions to the annual allowances to the provinces, providing the million dollars be granted as assistance towards administration of criminal justice which is pledged for on the basis of twenty cents per head of the population. The increased subsidy, apart from this, will work out as follows:

	Present Subsidy.	Proposed.
Ontario	$1,339,287	$2,128,772
Quebec	1,206,413	1,809,279
Nova Scotia	432,805	610,361
New Brunswick	491,059	621,360
Manitoba	646,842	738,917
British Columbia	307,076	422,076
P. E. Island	217,931	277,276
Alberta	1,124,125	1,124,125
Saskatchewan ...	1,124,125	1,124,125
Total	$6,883,988	$8,853,127

Shun the High Collar

That high collars tend to produce numerous headaches among men and women is the most recent discovery of a Viennese physician. Quite accidentally the doctor's attention was directed to the very high style of collar worn by a patient who was always complaining of headaches and giddiness. The collar was laid aside, thus removing the compression of the neck, and the partient's headaches and giddiness disappeared. Struck by this result the doctor paid particular attention to the kind of collars worn by his headache patients, and in very many instances, the change to lower and easier fitting collars brought immediate relief. In case of women wearing high stiff neck bands, it was found that doing away with these had a beneficial result. The doctor declares that nobody with any tendency to headache should wear high collars.

Assuredly Belleville people have much to be thankful for, for the old town has not been so prosperous in many years. New houses, new verandahs, new sidewalks; money for everybody who wants to work. "I had a dream last night, Pat," said one.

"What was it?" the other enquired.

"I dreamed I died and went to heaven, and when I got to the gate I met St. Peter. I asked him how long he had been there, and he said a million years, but that in heaven things were counted large: a minute was a million years, and a cent was a million dollars I asked him to loan me a cent, and he said I will in a minute."

The Brockville Times undoubtedly voices the opinions of a good many people in the following:

"There is very great room for reform in our entire system of municipal management and we are strongly inclined to the belief that commissioners will, before long, be chosen instead of an unwieldy number of councillors. Brockville has experience of both and has found the commissioners' system the better We believe that five commissioners would administer the affairs of the town more simply and satisfactorily than ten councillors and a mayor."

Thieves Identified By Finger Prints.

Toronto, Oct. 17. — The first results to be obtained from the finger-print system of identifying criminals, which was recently adopted by the local Detective Department, came to hand from Scotland Yard yesterday. By it two young Englishmen now serving sentences in the Central Prison for picking pockets have been identified as two notorious crooks from London, Eng. They are John Midland W. H. Fowler, W. Swack-Edward Gleason.

Both of these men were convicted in the Police Court of picking pockets in the crowds attending the Torrey-Alexander meetings at Massey Hall. They completed terms in the Central Prison for these offences, and when they were liberated they were immediately re-arrested and taken to Hamilton to stand trial on charges of theft. They were convicted a second time, and are now serving sentences of 8 and 5 months respectively.

At the time the two prisoners were released from the Central Prison and sent on to Hamilton their finger-prints were transferred to the blank forms provided, in the usual way. They were sent to Scotland Yard for comparison and search. Yesterday the local department received back photos, duplicate finger-prints, and complete records of both Bierman and Gleason.

The finger print system is said to be infallible. The chance of exactly similar markings being found in the finger prints of two different individuals is said to be one in 4,000,000. By the system each and every imprint can be reduced to a separate and distinct mathematical formula, which is the basis of the identification. At Scotland Yard they have the completest apparatus in the world for recording the prints. After they are taken they are photographed, and, by means of a stereopticon they are displayed on a large sheet, which covers the whole wall of a large room, and shows every peculiarity in the marking magnified to immense proportions.

ANOTHER WONDER OF SCIENCE.

Biology has Proved That Dandruff Is Caused by a Germ.

Science is doing wonders these days in medicine as well as in mechanics. Since Adam lived, the human race has been troubled with dandruff, for which no hair preparation has heretofore proved a successful cure until Newbro's Herpicide was put on the market. It is a scientific preparation that kills the germ that makes dandruff or scurf by digging into the scalp to get at the root of the hair, where it saps the vitality; causing itching scalp, falling hair, and finally baldness. Without dandruff hair must grow luxuriantly. It is the only destroyer of dandruff.

Sold by leading druggists. Send 10c in stamps for sample to The Herpicide Co., Detroit, Mich. J. S. McKeown, special agent.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

Literary Notes

PICTURES! PICTURES!

One Thousand Inches of Pictures per Issue.

The names of the "Graphic" and the "Illustrated London News" are household words wherever the English tongue is spoken. But in this country they cost six dollars a year each, a sum that places them among the luxuries in which only a few can indulge. Now, however, Canada has something that, for a mere fraction of the cost, will take the place of these high-grade illustrated periodicals. The first number of the "Canadian Pictorial" has just been issued and is striking in idea, and admirably executed.

Everybody likes pictures — specially pictures of live interest. And it has been unfortunate that for such pictures Canadians have up till now had to depend on the high-priced publications from Britain and the United States, which contain a large proportion of pictures and other matter of little or no interest to Canadians. But we are glad to see that Canada's need in this respect is to be most worthily filled by the "Canadian Pictorial" which is evidently going to excel if possible, the high standard set by such publications as the "Illustrated London News," the "Graphic," "Frank Leslie's," or "Collier's." And yet it will be very much cheaper than any of these, for it has its name and fame yet to make. And though cheaper, an issue of the "Canadian Pictorial" will contain about a thousand inches of pictures, some of them full-page pictures fit for framing, many of them of international interest, and none of them but will be of live interest to Canadians. It is indeed being edited entirely from the Canadian point of view, but with a wide horizon, embracing the great world wide interests, the management having secured connections with the leading photographers in all foreign countries, the telegraph and cable being used to secure the photographs at the earliest possible moment. As its name suggests, the "Canadian Pictorial" will consist largely of pictures, pictures of the leading features of the world's news: pictures of world famous people, in which series Canadian men and women will take their rightful places; pictures of Canadian events and scenes; pictures of Canadian enterprise; pictures of fashions and patterns; pictures of children, of beautiful things, curious things, inventions; snap shots of animals and photo contests of "Happy or Comical Situations," or news events, with money prizes for the best.

"Canadian Pictorial" for one year $1 cash. Even at the dollar rate the "Canadian Pictorial" is ridiculously low. We would greatly appreciate it if our friends would make this offer known to their neighbors.

THE DESIGNER FOR DECEMBER.

Beginning with an attractive, snowy and "Christmasy" cover, the December "Designer" offers an interesting list of seasonable articles. The patterns for midwinter garments will prove of unusual value to those planning costumes, as some particularly new and fashionable effects are shown. Following these comes an expert lesson under "Points on Dressmaking," which will prove of great help to those about to attempt to make one of the popular Empire garments. Some unusually pretty suggestions for "Midwinter Millinery," are clearly illustrated, while "Fashionable Frivolities" and "Fashions and Fabrics" bring to light the latest notions in the little touches that make the woman well dressed. "A Bonnet for an Elderly Woman," by Catherine Campbell, gives ideas for the solution of what is often a difficult question. Some new hair ornaments to be worn with evening attire are illustrated. Christmas stories and poems follow, including an enlightening article on "The Christmas Presents of the Rich," by William M. Van der Weyde, and a bright Christmas play for children, "Santa and the Runaways," in which the funny folks can sing and act and thereby provide a jolly time for themselves and an entertaining one for their audience.

Christmas is the season of all seasons to make the heart warm, and Christmas is the triumphal day of the home. The Designer is the home magazine, too, and this Christmas it is offering an especially "homey" and bright number.

Bad Knee Cured by Zambuk.

A FOOTBALLER'S VALUABLE EXPERIENCE.

As an example of the value of Zam-Buk in cases of abrasions and injuries to muscles and tendons, as well as to the skin, the recent experience of Mr. E. Leslie, of Harriet street, Winnipeg, may be mentioned. He says: "While playing football I received a kick on the knee. I had had previous trouble with that knee, and expected that I would be laid off, unable to walk, next day. I rubbed on some Zam-Buk, however, and, to my surprise and pleasure, it prevented all serious consequences. Before I had used the second box the knee was quite cured! Now, I always carry a box when travelling, for I think Zam-Buk a blessing to humanity."

Such it has proved on many occasions. Made entirely from herbal essences, it is a purely natural balm. Eczema, ulcers, abscesses, sores on the back or loins, piles, scaling sores, itching or chafed surfaces, sore feet, blistered or chapped hands, sore nipples—for all these, as well as for cuts, burns, bruises, scalds and everyday skin injuries, it is a vegitable boon. For household use, nurses, doctor and mothers everywhere give it a good word. Of its value to athletes the above case is but one example. Sherring, the winner of the Marathon race, used Zam-Buk while training, and uses it for bruises, sore feet, and as an embrocation. The leading athletes of the world have expressed their appreciation of its value. All druggists, at 50c per box, or post free from the Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, upon receipt of price; 6 boxes for $2.50. Send one cent stamp and full name and address, and free sample box will be mailed you.

There is a Danish proverb which runs, "No man is so tall that he need ever stretch; and none so small that he need never stoop." It might be added that no one is so rich that he need not read the advertisements.

A man makes allowances for his faults, even though his wife may be one of them.

MEANEST MAN.

STOLE TOMBSTONE FROM MOTHER-IN-LAW'S GRAVE.

New York, Oct. 16—The American says: To Uncle Sam's colonial possessions must be yielded the palm of producing the meanest man under the American flag. He is Pedro Conception, of Manila.

Pedro was hungry. His rooster was pining away, his wife was sick, and a little Conception, fretting for food, was just opening her big, brown eyes in the great drama of life.

There was not a centavo in the treasury, not a bone in the cupboard.

In the dead of the night Pedro went to the grave of his mother-in-law, purloined the slab placed there to record her virtues, took it to a Chinese and pawned it.

Now the police have both tombstone and Pedro.

What Gamey Thinks.

ABOUT THE WAY CERTAIN SHINING LIGHTS OF ONTARIO HAVE BEEN SHOWN UP LATELY.

"I certainly read some of the evidence with interest, when you consider that many men in Toronto gave as a sole and only reason for not considering me as worthy of prominence in our politics, my association with the bribery case," says R. R. Gamey, M.P.P., in an interview in the World. "I wonder what they think of the evidence in the Home Life, where $80,000 was paid without the slightest reason to suppose that the general public interested in those companies would have agreed for one moment to such a thing if they understood it.

ONE FOR STRATTON.

"Then J. R. Stratton in that case did not even play fair with his own friends, but kept $10,000 back, and did not show it in the proper manner in his bank accounts. Sir John A. Boyd deliberately contradicts in the box such men as Hon. George E. Foster, and in the next breath admits he knew next to nothing of what was going on, and hands out to the people a free legal opinion as to what would be a fair divide at this late date, and took the pay for the work he deliberately neglected to do.

TURN ABOUT FAIR PLAY.

"How I would like to have had the pleasure of examining him for a half hour. He was not examined at all practically—just told his story in his own simple child-like way. The reciprocity among lawyers is such that a judge or lawyer who goes in the box as a witness escapes a mighty lot easier than the once Commissioner Boyd allowed me to escape.

"Imagine President Cockburn saying 'Bank losses due to unauthorized stock operations by the manager.' Have directors of all these various institutions no responsibility, who hire the manager, who could discharge the manager; who should have some system that not one dollar of a bank's money could be drawn except the loan was passed by a committee of themselves; who should see that their staff, as assistant manager, inspectors and suchlike, are thorough and competent? Why directors if they do not do this? Then they should be responsible for funds lost through stock or any other unauthorized speculation.

THE MAN ON THE STREET.

"Any ordinary man on the street could see that the general manager was conducting himself as a general manager should not. What excuse is there for a Board of Directors to say they did not know? A splendid lesson could be taught the business community now if every director connected with this bank and the various companies which have been shown to have acted in a manner not up to the proper standard were prosecuted to the limit. There is not the slightest excuse for a bank collapse at present, with no commercial failures of any account. Then why let directors escape who have caused it? Bauwell did not escape, and he only tried to take a farthing of the present losses.

THE MONEY.

"At the time of the investigation three years ago a certain sum of money could not be traced. It was supposed to have passed from the Ontario Bank, managed by this same manager, who has wrecked the bank, to Hon. J. R. Stratton, who is the same Stratton shown in the Home Life investigation to have shuffled the $10,000 to his own credit without his friends knowing it, and without it showing in a proper manner in his bank book. Was it any wonder that we could not trace the other money three years ago? If one man can shuffle one and one-quarter millions unauthorized in 1905, I guess he could shuffle $3,000 in 1903. If a man can shuffle $10,000 to his credit without authority or having it show properly in 1906, I guess he could shuffle $3,000 in 1903."

The Trent Canal

The Trent Canal with only partial completion is justifying itself as a factor in local prosperity, says the Peterboro Examiner. The quantity of local traffic that is, and has been, developing, serves to show that when once the canal is completed not only Peterboro, but all the country tributary to the line of canal will receive substantial benefits and internal trade be vastly benefitted. But great as the local benefit is certain to be, it will be as nothing compared to the national benefit. Though the value of the Trent Canal as a part of a through water route for grain from Port Arthur or Fort William to the seaboard is not fully appreciated, that value still exists. We have but touched the fringe of the wheat production possibilities of the Northwest. Perhaps only a tenth of the land available for the growing of wheat is in use, yet we have every avenue of transportation congested—with less than a hundred millions of bushels. What will the conditions be when the wheat output amounts to five hundred millions, which it promises to do in the not remote future? The building of a new grain line by the C.P.R. from Georgian Bay to Peterboro, the double-tracking of the Grand Trunk line south from Midland, will afford only a temporary relief, and the enlargement of the Welland Canal will not represent all the transportation sure to be demanded within a few years. Under such circumstances the opening and operation of the Trent Canal will be of immense importance as an auxiliary to the work of transportation. When so much transportation is needed the wisdom of opening a route which has such large possibilities cannot be well criticised. The usefulness of the Trent Canal has passed beyond discussion; the stage of action has been reached.

TIMELY TOPICS.

AT THE DRESS GOODS COUNTER.

You're sure it's fast color? How wide did you tell me?
A full yard? Oh, yes. You are sure you can't sell me
Ten yards any cheaper than five?
Just a minute—
You're certain it hasn't a thread of green in it?
I couldn't wear green, and the light
here's a little Confusing. The threads in it seem rather brittle—
These dyes rot stuff so. Dear me seems that one twenty
Is high. Are you sure that six yards will be plenty?
Now what do you think — does this silk sample match it?
It has just a pale tinge of blue—do you catch it?
Now, what I was thinking was—well,
now, I wonder!.
That's not the right sample at all!
Such a blunder!
I picked it up just as I left, in a hurry,
And must have picked up the wrong
one! Such a worry
It is to do shopping! Now, isn't it fretting;
And just as I thought I was no near to getting Some skirt goods to match it! Is this piece as high as
The other? How would this look, cut on the bias?
You say you have none in dark blue?
Such a pity.
A dark blue in that would be awfully pretty!
What's that piece up there? No, the one just above it!
Voile? Get it down, please. Oh, admire
it? I love it!
Now, isn't that sweet? But so light.
I was thinking
It might not be easy to clean without shrinking
Have you some blue silk near at hand? There! Just lay it
Beneath. With that lining of blue
I should say it
Would make up just splendidly. You haven't got it
In red? Why is that? Oh, the red dyes would rot it.
Too bad! Red is just what I wanted.
How queerly
It happens that you always see something nearly
But not quite the color. Well, if it is blue, it
Is blue and not red, and that's all there is to it
I guess we'll go back to that first piece. You say it
Is warranted goods? Oh, yes this is the way it Should go. And you think that six yards would be ample?
You're sure of that? Well—you can give me a sample.

How many in a thousand, asks Collier's Weekly, know that darker colors in leaves often are an attempt of the plant to protect itself from the rays of the sun? Their appearance in autumn in brighter tints is due merely to the fact that they become visible when the green pigments decrease. Substances likely to be useful another season descend into the trunk and leaves in the leaves only those of which the tree has no further need and of which it is better rid. While such derelicts of fact are known to few, we all are moved by the bravery with which "Autumn paints upon the sky the gorgeous fame of summer which is fled." Where science opens the wonders and secrets of her processes to one, the seasons offer priceless poetry to the millions.

MR. HUGHES AND MR. HEARST.

(New York Sun.)

Mr. Hughes in his recent speeches has made specific charges of the most serious character against Mr. Hearst. They are of that nature that unless adequately answered and refuted they must defeat Mr. Hearst's pretensions to office.

Failing refutation Mr. Hearst must assert his candidacy as a self-confessed criminal of the same type as that which he has himself taught the public to abhor as the most repulsive and abhorrent in our time.

The things which Mr. Hughes has alleged will not down. Mere denial and abuse will not abate their damning significance. They will spread from mouth to mouth, and as they spread their force will intensify. Their course will be like that of a conflagration that is unquenchable.

The figure of Hearst that Mr. Hughes depicts is one that a sane people cannot tolerate.

Stomach Troubles and Constipation

No one can reasonably hope for good digestion when the bowels are constipated. Mr. Chas. Baldwin, of Edwardsville, Ill., says: "I suffered from chronic constipation and stomach troubles for several years, but thanks to Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets am almost cured." Why not get a package of these tablets and get well and stay well? Price 25 cents. Sample free. To be had at R. Templeton & Co., drug store.

SAFETY.

Never in all the history of transportation has travel been safer than it is to-day. Seated in perfect comfort in any of the mile-a-minute trains of the Lake Shore Railway you are in less danger by far than was your grandfather in the lumbering six-mile-an-hour stage of a half or three-quarters of a century ago. Trains over this line are protected and guarded in a way that is but little short of marvellous. Every device that skill or money can provide is used without regard to the expense and in spite of the high speed—the fastest in the world—you are as safe here as in your own home. Combined with safety and high speed are luxurious comfort and punctuality, all combined to make a service unequaled the world over. See that your ticket reads "via Buffalo and The Lake Shore Railway," and write for full information to J. W. Daly, Chief Ass't G. P. A., Buffalo, N.Y.; A. J. Smith, G. P. A., Cleveland, Ohio, or W. J. Lynch, Passenger Traffic Mgr., Chicago, Ill.

There is not much FUN in "keeping boarders"—but there is PROFIT in it IF YOU HAVE AS MANY PEOPLE AT YOUR TABLES AS YOU CAN ACCOMMODATE — and timely advertising and reading of ads., enables you to do this.

"Grand Peninsular"
Is an Ornament to the Home.

Popular taste no longer clings to deeply carved, highly ornamental ranges.

People now want rich, yet simple, elegance.

That is the way I make my new Grand Peninsular Range.

The "Grand Peninsular" is easy to keep clean, because there are no deep carvings to collect the dust and dirt. The design is simple but very effective. No fuss or frills. Just smooth surfaces which take a beautiful bright polish. The nickelled castings are detachable, and can be lifted off without loosening a bolt, when the range is to be brushed or cleaned.

Then there is the ALL-STEEL OVEN—the THERMOMETER on the oven door—extra large GRATE BARS—and a dozen other time-and-labor-savings conveniences—that are exclusive with my GRAND PENINSULAR. Have your dealer show you all these points. 42

BEFORE TREATMENT

AFTER TREATMENT

Peter E. Summers, of Kalamazoo, Mich., relates his experience: "I was troubled with Nervous Debility for many years. I lay it to indiscretion and excesses in early youth. I became very despondent and didn't care whether I worked or not. I imagined everybody who looked at me, guessed my secret. Imaginative dreams at night weakened me—my back ached, had pains in the back of my head, hands and feet were cold, tired in the morning, poor appetite, fingers were shaky, eyes blurred, hair loose, memory poor, etc. Numbness in the fingers set in and the doctor told me he feared paralysis. I took all kinds of medicines and tried many first-class physicians, wore an electric belt for three months, went to Mt. Clemens for baths, but received little benefit. While at Mt. Clemens I was induced to consult Drs. Kennedy & Kergan, though I had lost all faith in doctors. Like a drowning man I commenced the New Method Treatment and it saved my life. The improvement was like magic—I could feel the vigor going through my nerves. I was cured mentally, physically and sexually. I have sent them many patients and will continue to do so."

was a slippery dog. Of course, he had found two of those plates. He kept the one back so as to sell the other at a fancy price. My enemy discovered this, and Van Sneck's sudden flight was his opportunity. He could afford to get rid of me at an apparently dear rate. He stole Littimer's engraving—in fact, he must have done so, or I should not have it at this moment. Then he smudged out some imaginary spots on the other and hid it in my luggage, knowing that it would be found. Also he knew that it would be returned to Littimer, and that the stolen plate could be laid aside and produced at some remote date as an original find. The find has been mine, and it will go hard if I can't get to the bottom of the mystery now. It is strange that your mysterious trouble and mine should be bound up so closely together, but in the end it will simplify matters, for the very reason that we are both on the hunt for the same man."

"Which man we have got to find, Bell."

"Granted. We will bait for him as one does for a wily old trout. The fly shall be the Rembrandt, and you see he will rise to it in time. But beyond this I have made one or two important discoveries to-day. We are going to the house of the strange lady who owns 218 and 219, Brunswick Square, and I shall be greatly mistaken if she does not prove to be an old acquaintance of mine. There will be danger."

"You propose to go to-night?"

"I propose to go at once," Bell said. "Dark hours are always best for dark business. Now, which is the nearest way to Longdean Grange?"

"So the House of the Silent Sorrow, as they call it, is to be our destination! I must confess that the place has ever held a strange fascination for me. We will go over the golf links and behind Ovingdean village. It is a rare spot for a tragedy."

Bell rose and lighted a fresh cigar.

"Come along," he said. "Poke that Rembrandt behind your books with its face to the wall. I would not lose that for anything now. No, on second thoughts I find I shall have to take it with me."

David closed the door carefully behind him, and the two stepped out into the night.

CHAPTER XIII.

Two dancing eyes of flame were streaming up the lane towards the girls, a long shadow slanted across the white pathway, the steady flick of hoofs drew nearer. Then the hoofs ceased their smiting of the dust and a man's voice spoke.

"Better turn and wait for us by the farm, driver," the voice said. "Bell, can you manage, man?"

"Who was that?" Enid whispered. "A stranger?"

"Not precisely," Ruth replied. "That is Mr. David Steel. Oh, I am sure we can trust him. Don't annoy him. Think of the trouble he is in for our sakes."

"I do," Enid said, drily. "I am also thinking of Reginald. If our dear Reginald escapes from the fostering care of the dogs we shall be ruined. That man's hearing is wonderful. He will come creeping down here on those large feet of his, and that cunning brain will take in everything like a flash. Good dog!"

A hound in the distance growled, and then another howled mournfully. It was the plaint of the beast who has found his quarry, impatient for the gaoler to arrive. So long as that continued Henson was safe. Any attempt to escape, and he would be torn to pieces. Just at the present moment Enid almost hoped that the attempt would be made. It certainly was all right for the present, but then Williams might happen along on his way to the stables at any moment.

The two men were coming nearer. They both paused as the dogs gave tongue. Through the thick belt of trees lights gleamed from one or two windows of the house. Steel pulled up and shuddered slightly in spite of himself.

"Crimson blinds," he said. "Crimson blinds all through this business. They are beginning to get on my nerves. What about these dogs, Bell?"

"Dogs or no dogs, I am not going back now," Bell muttered. "It's perfectly useless to come here in the daytime; therefore we must fall back upon a little amateur burglary. There's a girl yonder who might have assisted me at one time, but——"

Enid slipped into the road. The night was passably light and her beautiful features were fairly clear to the startled men in the road.

"The girl is here," she said. "What do you want?"

Bell and his companion cried out simultaneously: Bell because he was so suddenly face to face with one who was very dear to him, David because it seemed to him that he recognized the voice from the darkness, the voice of his great adventure. And there was another surprise as he saw Ruth Gates side by side with the owner of that wonderful voice.

"Enid!" Bell cried, hoarsely. "I did not expect——"

"To confront me like this," the girl said, coldly. "That I quite understand. What I don't understand is why you intrude your hated presence here."

Bell shook his handsome head mournfully. He looked strangely downcast and dejected, and none the less, perhaps, because a fall in crossing the down had severely wrenched his ankle. But for a belated cab on the Rottingdean road he would not have been here now.

"As hard and cruel as ever," he said. "Not one word to me, not one word in my defence. And all the time I am the victim of a vile conspiracy——"

"Conspiracy! Do you call vulgar theft a conspiracy?"

"It was nothing else," David put in, eagerly. "A most extraordinary conspiracy. The kind of thing that you would not have deemed possible out of a book."

"And who might this gentleman be?" Enid asked, haughtily.

"A thousand pardons for my want of ceremony," David said. "If I had not been under the impression that we had met before I should never have presumed——"

"Oh, a truce to this," Bell cried. "We are wasting time. The hour is not far distant, Enid, when you will ask my pardon. Meanwhile I am going up to the house, and you are going to take me there. Come what may, I don't sleep to-night until I have speech with your aunt."

David had drawn a little aside. By a kind of instinct Ruth Gates followed him. A shaft of grey light glinted upon her cycle in the grass by the roadside. Enid and Bell were talking in vehement whispers—they seemed to be absolutely unconscious of anybody else but themselves. David could see the anger and scorn on the pale, high-bred face; he could see Bell gradually expanding as he brought all his strength and firm power of will to bear.

"What will be the upshot of it?" Ruth asked, timidly.

"Bell will conquer," David replied. "He always does, you know."

"I am afraid you don't take my meaning, Mr. Steel."

David looked down into the sweet, troubled face of his companion, and thence away to the vivid crimson patches beyond the dark belt of foliage. Ever and anon the intense stillness of the night was broken by the long-drawn howl of one of the hounds. David remembered it for years afterwards; it formed the most realistic chapter of one of his most popular novels.

"Heaven only knows," he said. "I have been dragged into this business, but what it means I know no more than a child. I am mixed up in it, and Bell is mixed up in it, and so are you. Why we shall perhaps know some day."

"You are not angry with me?"

"Why, no. Only you might have had a little more confidence in me."

"Mr. Steel, we dared not. We wanted your advice, and nothing more. Even now I am afraid I am saying too much. There is a withering blight over yonder house that is beyond mere words. And twice gallant gentlemen have come forward to our assistance. Both of them are dead. And if we had dragged you, a total stranger, into the arena, we should morally have murdered you."

"Am I not within the charmed circle now?" David smiled.

"Not of our free will," Ruth said, eagerly. "You came into the tangle with Hatherly Bell. Thank Heaven you have an ally like that. And yet I am filled with shame——"

"My dear young lady, what have you to be ashamed of?"

Ruth covered her face with her hands for a moment and David saw a tear or two trickle through the slim fingers. He took the hands in his, gently, tenderly, and glanced into the fine, grey eyes. Never had he been moved to a woman like this before.

"But what will you think of me?" Ruth whispered. "You have been so good and kind and I am so foolish. What can you think of a girl who is all this way from home at midnight? It is so—so unmaidenly."

"It might be in some girls, but not in you," David said, boldly. "One has only to look in your face and see that only the good and the pure dwell there. But you were not afraid?"

"Horribly afraid. The very shadows startled me. But when I discovered your errand to-night I was bound to come. My loyalty to Enid demanded it, and I had not one single person in the world whom I could trust."

"If you had only come to me, Miss Ruth——"

"I know, I know now. Oh, it is a blessed thing for a lonely girl to have one good man that she can rely upon. And you have been so very good, and we have treated you very, very badly."

But David would not hear anything of the kind. The whole adventure was strange to a degree, but it seemed to matter nothing so long as he had Ruth for company. Still, the girl must be got home. She could not be allowed to remain here, nor must she be permitted to return to Brighton alone. Bell strode up at the same moment.

"Miss Henson has been so good as to listen to my arguments," he said. "I am going into the house. Don't worry about me, but send Miss Gates home in the cab. I shall manage somehow."

David turned eagerly to Ruth.

"That will be best," he said. "We can put your machine on the cab, and I'll accompany you part of the way home. Our cabman will think that you came from the house. I shan't be long, Bell."

Ruth assented gratefully. As David put her in the cab Bell whispered to him to return as soon as possible, but the girl heard nothing of this.

"How kind—how kind you are," she murmured.

"Perhaps some day you will be kind to me," David said, and Ruth blushed in the darkness.

CHAPTER XIV.

There was a long pause till the sound of the horse's hoofs died away. Bell was waiting for his companion to speak. Her head was partly turned from him, so that he could only watch the dainty beauty of her profile. She stood there cold and still, but he could see that she was profoundly agitated.

"I never thought to see the day when I should trust you again," she said; "I never expected to trust any man again."

"You will trust me, darling," Bell said, passionately. "If you still care for me as I care for you. Do you?"

The question came keen as steel. Enid shivered and hesitated. Bell laid a light hand on her arm.

"Speak," he said. "I am going to clear myself, I am going to take back my good name. But if you no longer care for me the rest matters nothing. Speak."

"I am not one of those who change, God pity me," Enid murmured.

Bell drew a long, deep breath. He wanted no assurance beyond that.

"Then lead the way," he said. "I have come at the right time; I have been looking for you everywhere, and I find you in the hour of your deepest sorrow. When I knew your aunt last she was a cheerful, happy woman. From what I hear now she is suffering, you are all suffering, under some blighting grief."

"Oh, if you only knew what that sorrow was, Hatherly."

"Hatherly! How good the old name sounds from your lips. Nobody has ever called me that since—since we parted. And to think that I should have been searching for you all these years, when Miss Ruth Gates could have given me the clue at any time. And why have you been playing such strange tricks upon my friend David Steel? Why have you——What is that?"

Somebody was moving somewhere in the grounds, and a voice shouted for help. Enid started forward.

"It is Williams coming from the stables," she said. "I have so arranged it that the dogs are holding up my dear cousin, Reginald Henson, who is calling upon Williams to release him. If Reginald gets back to the house now we are ruined. Follow me as well as you can."

Enid disappeared down a narrow, tangled path, leaving Bell to limp along painfully in her track. A little way off Henson was yelling lustily for assistance. Williams, who had evidently taken in the situation, was coming up leisurely, chuckling at the discomfiture of the enemy. The hounds were whining and baying. From the house came the notes of a love song passionately declaimed. A couple of the great dogs came snarling up to Bell and laid their grimy muzzles on his thighs. A cold sensation crept up and down his spine as he came to a standstill.

"The brutes!" he muttered. "Margaret Henson must be mad indeed to have these creatures about the place. Ah! would you? Very well, I'll play the game fairly, and not move. If I call out I shall spoil the game. If I remain quiet I shall have a pleasant night of it. Let us hope for the best and that Enid will understand the situation."

Meanwhile Enid had come up with Williams. She laid her hand imperiously upon his lips.

"Not a word," she whispered. "Mr. Henson is held up by the dogs. He must remain where he is till I give you the signal to release him. I know you answered his call, but you are to go no farther."

Williams assented willingly enough. Everything that tended to the discomfort of Reginald Henson filled him with a peculiar and deep-seated pleasure.

"Very well, miss," he said, demurely. "And don't you hurry, miss. This is a kind of job that calls for plenty of patience. And I'm really shocking deaf to-night."

Williams retreated leisurely in the direction of the stables, but his malady was not so distressing that he failed to hear a groan and a snarling curse from Henson. Enid fled back along the track, where she found Bell standing patiently with a dog's muzzle close to either knee. His face was white and shining, otherwise he showed no signs of fear. Enid laid a hand on the head of either dog, and they rolled like great cats at her feet in the bushes.

"Now come swiftly," she whispered. "There is no time to be lost."

They were in the house at last, crossing the dusty floor, with the motes dancing in the lamp-light, deadening their footsteps and muffling the intense silence. Above the stillness rose the song from the drawing-room; from without came the restless murmur of the dogs. Enid entered the drawing-room, and Bell limped in behind her. The music immediately ceased. As Enid glanced at her aunt she saw that the far-away look had died from her eyes, that the sparkle and brightness of reason were there. She had come out of the mist and the shadows for a time at any rate.

"Dr. Hatherly Bell to see you, aunt," Enid said, in a low tone.

Margaret Henson shot up from the piano like a statue. There was no welcome on her face, no surprise there, nothing but deep, unutterable contempt and loathing.

"I have been asleep," she said. She passed her hand dreamily over her face. "I have been in a dream for seven long years. Enid brought me back to the music again to-night, and it touched my heart, and now I am awake again. Do you recollect the 'Slumber Song,' Hatherly Bell? The last time I sang it you were present. It was a happy night; the very last happy night in the world to me."

"I recollect it perfectly well, Lady Littimer," Bell said.

"Lady Littimer! How strange it is to hear that name again. Seven years since then. Here I am called Margaret Henson, and nobody knows. And now you have found out. Do you come here to blackmail and rob me like the rest?"

"I come here entirely on your behalf and my own, my lady."

"That is what they all say—and then they rob me. You stole the Rembrandt."

The last words came like a shot from a catapult. Enid's face grew colder. Bell drew a long tube of discolored paper carefully tied round a stick from his pocket.

"I am going to disprove that once and for all," he said. "The Rembrandt is at present in Lord Littimer's collection. There is an account of it in to-day's Telegraph. It is perfectly familiar to both of you. And, that being the case, what do you think of this?"

He unrolled the paper before Enid's astonished eyes. Margaret Henson glanced at it listlessly; she was fast sinking into the old, strange oblivion again. But Enid was all rapt attention.

"I would have sworn to that as Lord Littimer's own," she gasped.

"It is his own," Bell replied. "Stolen from him and a copy placed by some arch-enemy in my portmanteau, it was certain to be found on the frontier. Don't you see that there were two Rembrandts? When the one from my portmanteau was restored to Littimer his own was kept by the thief. Subsequently it would be exposed as a new find, with some story as to its discovery, only, unfortunately for the scoundrel, it came into my possession."

"And where did you find it?"

"I found it," Bell said, slowly, "in a house called 218, Brunswick Square, Brighton."

A strange cry came from Enid's lips. She stood swaying before her lover, white as the paper upon which her eyes were eagerly fixed. Margaret Henson was pacing up and down the room, her lips muttering, and raising a cloud of pallid dust behind her.

"I—I am sorry," Enid said, falteringly. "And all these years I have deemed you guilty. But then the proof was so plain; I could not deny the evidence of my own senses. And Von Gulden came to me saying how deeply distressed he was, and that he would have prevented the catastrophe if he could. Well?"

A servant stood waiting in the doorway with wondering eyes at the sight of a stranger.

"I'm sorry, miss," she said, "but Miss Christiana is worse; indeed, she quite frightens me. I've taken the liberty of telephoning to Dr. Walker."

The words seemed to bring consciousness to Margaret Henson.

"Christiana worse," she said. "Another of them going; it will be a happy release from a house of sorrow like this. I will come up, Martin."

She swept out of the room after the servant. Enid appeared hardly to have heard. Bell looked at her inquiringly and with some little displeasure.

"I fancy I have heard you speak of your sister Christiana," he said. "Is she ill?"

"She is at the point of death, I understand; you think that I am callous. Oh, if you only knew! But the light will come to us all in time, God willing. Look at this place, look at the blight of it, and wonder how we endure it. Hatherly, I have made a discovery."

"We seem to be living in an atmosphere of discoveries. What is it?"

"I will answer your question by asking another. You have been made the victim of a vile conspiracy. For seven years your career has been blighted. And I have lost seven years of my life, too. Have you any idea who your enemy is?"

"Not the faintest, but, believe me, I shall find out in time. And then——"

A purple blackness like the lurid light of a storm flashed into his eyes, the lines of his mouth grew rigid. Enid laid a hand tenderly on his arm.

"Your enemy is the common enemy of us all," she said. "We have wasted the years, but we are young yet. Your enemy is Reginald Henson."

"Enid, you speak with conviction. Are you sure of this?"

"Certain. When I have time I will tell you everything. But not now. And that man must never know that you have been near the house to-night, not so much for your sake as for the sake of your friend David Steel. Now I can see the Providence behind it all. Hatherly, tell me that you forgive me before the others come back."

"My darling, I cannot see how you could have acted otherwise."

Enid turned towards him with a great glad light in her eyes. She said nothing, for the simple reason that there was nothing to say. Hatherly Bell caught her in his strong arms, and she swayed to reach his lips. In that delicious moment the world was all forgot.

But not for long. There was a sudden rush and a tumble of feet on the stairs, there was a strange voice speaking hurriedly, then the drawing-room door opened and Margaret Henson came in. She was looking wild and excited and talked incoherently. An obviously professional man followed her.

"My dear madam," he was saying, "I have done all I can. In the last few days I have not been able to disguise from myself that there was small hope for the patient. The exhaustion, the shock of the system, the congestion, all point to an early collapse."

"Is my sister so much worse, Dr. Walker?" Enid asked, quietly.

"She could not be any worse and be alive," the doctor said. "Unless I am greatly mistaken the gentleman behind you is Mr. Hatherly Bell. I presume he has been called in to meet me? If so, I am sincerely glad, because I shall be pleased to have a second opinion. A bad case of"—here followed a long technical name—"one of the worst cases I have ever seen."

"You can command me, Enid," Bell said. "If I can."

"No, no," Enid cried. "What am I saying? Please to go upstairs with Martin."

Bell departed, wonderingly. Enid flew to the door and out into the night. She could hear Henson cursing and shouting, could hear the snarling clamour of the dogs. At the foot of the Clifford Sifton's garden at Assiniboine Lodge, on the St. Lawrence River, near Brockville, the gardener, William Griffiths, is reaping the harvest of a peanut crop, planted early in the season. The growing of peanuts is an experiment in this country, but Mr. Griffiths is an expert, and by the present effort it is seen that fully developed and well-flavored peanuts can be grown here.

Drops Dead.

Port Arthur, Oct. 17.—Alex Nettles, one of the oldest explorers of this district, dropped dead yesterday morning. He was digging a trench and went to get a drink of water. When found he was lying on his face dead.

THE LOVE OF SAND.

Man's Unconscious Harking Back to Primitive Times.

The love of sand is universal, felt by all and at all ages. The child finds in in a ready and a plentiful material for giving something of definiteness to the world of his childish imagination, and when experience shall have proved the real world to be less pleasant and not expressible in sand he nevertheless as a grown man tacitly admits the attraction of the old time medium and spends his holidays upon it. No watering place need trouble as to its prosperity if it has a broad forefront of sand.

Probably so general and ingrained a love is only to be accounted for as the result of a sympathetic and unconscious "harking back" to the feel of the life on the dry sandy soils of the east, upon which man first wandered and in which he first delved. He can sit or lie with greater comfort and ease—as he originally sat, without a chair, or lay, without a couch—upon sand than upon any other kind of earth, and upon sand he reverts readily and without fear of convention to primeval barefootedness. Possibly even the charm of the "sanded floor"—in the concrete to our forefathers, the comfort and coziness of cherry inn parlors and kitchens, warm with the ruddy heat of glowing logs, on snowy nights—may also be due to vaguely assertive instinct.

In proof it may be readily concluded that far distant man would not have been long in finding out the advantages of a dry cave as a dwelling place. It would be found most readily in soft, friable rocks. The natural and further easy expansion of the cave to meet growing demands for house room by scraping down of roof and sides would result in a sanded floor. Litter of rude cave living and housekeeping could be more easily swept out with the leafy bough or bunch of sedges acting as the original broom when mixed with sand than without its aid. The savage family which swept its cave out oftenest and most thoroughly would certainly be the healthiest and strongest.—London Spectator.

ST. ANTHONY.

The Temptations of the Father of Monasticism.

What were the temptations of St. Anthony? St. Anthony was one of the earliest names placed on the calendar. He is called the father of monasticism because his life and teachings were really the foundation of the many monkish orders of a mediaeval times. He was born in a city of Egypt in 251 A. D. of parents who were both wealthy and pious, and he early decided to give his life up to religious contemplation. He went into the wilderness, taking up his solitary abode in an old ruin on a high hill, where he disciplined himself in austerity. But his devotions were interrupted by a protracted series of sadly irrelevant hallucinations, believed to be sent by the devil to tempt him aside from a holy life. He was visited successively by visions of all the idolatries of the early world, by the princes and potentates of history and their wives and daughters, by Solomon and the queen of Sheba, by the gods and goddesses of Greece and Rome, especially by Diana and Venus, and other interesting characters. According to the legend, his devoutness at last breaks the power of the visions, and they leave him forever. He remained twenty years in his lonely ruin, then, yielding to the wishes of other anchorites, went to Memphis and there founded the first monastery, which was little more than a group of cells. After six years of teaching he returned to his desert home and at last died there at the age of 105 years. The French novelist Gustave Flaubert has written an entire volume on "The Temptations of St. Anthony," giving all his visions with most elaborate description. A decidedly flippant, not to say profane, poem bearing the same title and in the style of the "Ingoldsby Legends" is sometimes included with these humorous ballads. But Barham did not write it. It was the work of one Tom Sellers, a much inferior scribbler.—Housekeeper.

Ignorant of Legal Terms.

Tarantula Tom—Why did Bill plug the tenderfoot?

Lava Bed Pete—It all come o' Bill's distressin' ignorance o' legal terms.

T. T.—How 'uz that?

L. B. P.—Well, Bill owed the shorthorn some money an' was sorter slow about payin'. So the stranger writ him a letter sayin', "I will draw on you at sight." An' Bill thought that meant a gun play, so when he meets up with the stranger he draws first. It was a misunderstandin'.

How Sponges Are Propagated.

There are a great many things which the scientists of today are not able to explain and a great many others over which they have frequent discussions owing to a difference of opinion. The method by which sponges are propagated when left to themselves is one of these mooted scientific questions. Some declare that they are reproduced from true eggs; others are equally positive that they are propagated from buds.

Your Heart.

The heart of man resembles a secret chamber wherein stands, like the block of white unhewn marble set in the studio of a sculptor, a veiled figure. Though the man may not so much as lift the corner of the veil, yet must he forever and in secret work to fashion and to form the figure that lies beneath.

Many a man who thinks he was born to command marries a woman who was born to countermand.

POOR COOKING.

Responsible For Much of the Misery That Invades the Home.

Just so long as people live principally upon cooked food, just so long will cooking and the kitchen be, as they now are, exceedingly important features of every household, impossible to ignore or overlook with impunity.

Many a good cause has been lost for the time being and many a bright future has been darkened by some one's indigestion. Indigestion is at the root of almost as many of humanity's troubles as selfishness itself. But of course ignorance is at the root of them all. Whenever people know better they avoid and escape the woes that come through ignorance.

Without a good digestion health is impossible, and lack of health is misery. Poor cooking produces about as much indigestion as bad temper. In fact, it is a case of action and reaction—indigestion, low spirits, bad temper; bad temper, low spirits, indigestion, and so on interminably. Bad cooking, bad temper, low spirits, all belong together. They propagate each other. Since poorly cooked food produces indigestion, poor cooked food should be abolished, says Woman's Life. It can be abolished by all who set about it by paying attention to having the very best possible cooking for each meal, however simple it may be.

DON'T SHOW OFF THE BABY.

Shield the Little One From Excitement and Fatigue.

Too great emphasis cannot be laid on this matter of shielding the baby from excitement. Undoubtedly the temptation to show him off is very great—he is such a cunning little dear, and he has such pretty tricks. But decide now. Is it your desire to gratify your pride or promote your baby's welfare? It is a great mistake to handle an infant any more than necessary, not only on the score of his nerves, but on that of his bones. Baby's bones, you know, are soft; thus constant handling tends to destroy the shapeliness of his body. The greater part of his early life should be spent on the bed. When he gets tired of lying in one position gently roll him over without picking him up. When it is strictly necessary to lift him, there is only one way to do so without subjecting any part of his body to pressure or strain that may endanger a delicate organ. With your right hand grasp his clothing just below his feet and then spread out your left hand and extend it along his spine until your palm is supporting his back and your three middle fingers his neck and head. In this way baby's clothing is made to form a hammock in which he comfortably lies.—Outing Magazine.

KITCHEN HELPS.

In blending flour and water if a fork is used it will not lump.

When washing glasses in hot water be sure the outside of the glass is washed first. In this way the glass is kept from breaking.

Do not lay the scrubbing brush with the bristles upward. The water is allowed to soak into the wooden part and the bristles very soon become loose. Always place it with the bristles down.

To clean copper take a handful of common salt, enough water and flour to make a paste; mix together thoroughly. There is nothing better for cleaning copper. After using the paste wash thoroughly.

Cut newspaper sheets into four pieces, put a string through one corner and hang near the sink. If a sheet of paper is placed under any cooking utensil that is set in the sink after being taken off the stove, much scrubbing and cleaning will be saved.

Women In Chivalry.

The old order changeth, and orders of chivalry, that had their first origin in the association together of men for the protection of women, are now beginning to admit women to their ranks, says the London Globe. The movement is very slow and moves faster in France, where it had its rise. One of the first members of the great Bonaparte's Legion of Honor was a woman who had won the distinction and her commission by rising from the ranks in his wars, with a dozen wounds to show as her title deeds. During the restored monarchy, the second republic and the second empire, no more women were admitted, but the third republic has gone back to Bonaparte's tradition, and has this year admitted three women, two of them belonging to the stage, of whom Bernhardt is one, and the third a woman painter, Mme. Lemaire, whose studio is a veritable garden of the roses she delights to paint.

Two Important Don'ts.

Don't, my dear girls, begin dabbing your faces with creams and lotions one moment before you need. Pure soap and rain water are all the cosmetics necessary till you are twenty-five at least. After that nightly applications of cold cream and an occasional dust of powder are permissible.

Don't, because you are married, think things do not matter; that you can wear shabby dressing jackets and present a cold cream smeared countenance to your husband's astonished gaze. He may not say anything, but he thinks all the more, and lots of little rifts begin just that way.

Kitchen Scissors.

A kitchen convenience which is not present in every household is a pair of sharp scissors. Scissors are used to trim lamp wicks, which is wrong, and to cut papers and string, but seldom for trimming bacon and ham rinds, skinning parts of fowls which need skinning and trimming salads. These are proper uses for scissors, and the use of them saves much labor.

HUES OF WOOD.

Mahogany When It Is New Is of a Light Color.

Not all the mahogany which we see in use today exhibited as an heirloom is the real antique it is said to be, for heirlooms may be made to order, and even a furniture connoisseur will have difficulty in detecting the difference. Most people think of mahogany as a deep red, while, in fact, when new it is a light color without stain, and when treated with colorless liquids it becomes a golden shade. This darkens with age, and at present all the genuine mahogany which we see must have attained its dark hue through centuries of use. It is about the most expensive of the woods in general use, but Circassian walnut is valued even higher. Birdseye maple is next, a costly material on account of the great difficulty in treating it. Its grain is perhaps the most eccentric of all the various styles, and consequently its working up and its lasting qualities are rather uncertain. The differences in grain make differences in its density and hence its disposition to crack and split. Vernis Martin is a style which was a favorite in the reign of Louis XV., and its popularity has not waned with the years. It takes its name from a famous family named Martin who were noted cabinetmakers in Louis XV.'s reign. This beautiful spattered gold dust decoration, with its paintings by Watteau, is the real Vernis Martin style, unchanged today.

Oak is at the head of the lists of woods which have varied finishes. Bog oak is a brown green shade, caused by long immersion in peat or marsh bogs. Old English oak has a rich brown shade, supposed to be acquired by age and the smoke from fireplaces. Both these styles are, however, successfully imitated by the manufacturers of today. Weathered oak and Flemish oak are both popular finishes, the former representing the color which rain and sun and wind would cause on the oak, and the latter is black, representing the effect caused by centuries of smoke on overheated rafters. Antwerp oak is one of the dark finishes like the others mentioned, but varnish and shellac are used, so that a high polish is the result.

Birch, natural or curly; maple and sycamore are the original wood shellacked and varnished without artificial stain.

RUSSIAN SAYINGS.

He who fears a sparrow will never sow millet.

An untried friend is like an uncracked nut.

When you die even your tomb shall be comfortable.

The absentminded man looks for the horse he rides on.

Better to beg than steal, but better to work than beg.

A mother's love will draw up from the depths of the sea.

When the ass bears too light a load he wants to lie down.

He who is on horseback no longer knows his own father.

Man carries his superiority inside, animals theirs outside.

The nobleman is always in the right when the peasant sues.

If the thunder is not loud the peasant forgets to cross himself.

One whip is enough for a good horse, for a bad one not a thousand.

All For Naught.

All these "international conferences" to remove "causes" of war are futile. Wars arise from conflict of human desires. There will always be wars while desires conflict, until the millennium comes and we are angels. The impelling desire that brings together these universal peace conferences is chiefly social. The dreamers want a chance to tell their dreams to other dreamers. Men who find happiness in "prominence" want more prominence. So they gather and shake hands and make speeches and tell how happy the world will be when dreams come true.

Power of a Song.

A pleasant incident happened at the Crystal palace when Mme. Albani was once singing the "French Partridge." As soon as the concert was over one of the audience, a gentleman well known as a good shot and keen sportsman, called upon Mme. Albani and said, "Madam, I am sorry to say that I have shot many a little 'red leg' in my time, but after hearing you sing that song I will never kill another," a delicate compliment to a great singer—and to a song.

A Famous Bell.

On the watch tower of the Vela, at the Alhambra, Spain, there is a silver toned bell which the Moslems hung as a signal to let on the water in the gardens and the fountain in the city below. Its sound can be heard at Liga, thirty miles away. The maiden who strikes it is sure of a husband before the year is out, and of a good one if she rings loud enough. On certain fete days it is lively for the bell.

Preferred Prison.

She—Here's an interesting story of a man who begged to be sent to prison in place of his wife. He—Aha! and yet you always declare that men are never self sacrificing. She—Well, this man's wife happened to be a washerwoman, and if she went to prison he'd have to work.

He Found That Out.

"I could never understand," said the solemn person, "what is the attraction in autoing."

"Perhaps," replied the beginner with the bandaged head, "it's the attraction of gravitation."

BLINDED BATS.

They Proved Themselves Independent of the Sense of Sight.

Bats are remarkably independent of the sense of sight. A naturalist describes some experiments demonstrating this fact. Covering the eyes of a bat with wax, he released the creature in a room. It first of all made its way to the door, but instead of striking this hovered a few inches off, slowly making its way along the top edge and down the side, apparently guided by the incoming draft of air. Next a thorough exploration of the room was made, and throughout the examination it never once struck either chairs or table and swerved aside when a stick was placed in its path. As a result of this experiment naturalists believe that bats have an acute perception of atmospheric currents and vibrations resident in the nerves of the wing membranes.

This matter was thoroughly investigated so long ago as 1793, when, by the cruel experiment of blinding the animals, it was shown that they could cross a room across which silken threads were stretched in such a way as to leave just sufficient space for them to pass between with outstretched wings. They not only succeeded in passing the threads without touching them, but they avoided with equal ease the walls and ceiling. Even when the threads were placed still nearer together they managed, by contracting the wings, to pass without contact. Branches of trees were similarly avoided, and when tired they suspended themselves on the walls of the room as easily as if they enjoyed the use of sight.

From this it was inferred that these creatures possess a marvelously delicate sense of touch in the wing membranes. But it is also regarded as probable that this is increased by the expansion of the skin of the external ear and by the development of folds of skin on the nose and muzzle. In some bats, indeed, a perfect rosette of such skin is developed in the latter region, as in the "leaf nosed" bats, and it is supposed that the additional lobe of the ear, known as the "tragus," performs a similar function.

VITALITY THE MAIN THING.

He Who Has It Pulls Through, but the Other Fellow Dies.

Two men undergo operations of the same character in a hospital. The same surgeon does the work. The conditions are identical. Equal care is exercised in each operation, and each is successfully performed. Yet one man recovers; the other dies. Or there is a tremendous business pressure which does not let up for months. It puts the men under a terrible strain. One man goes to pieces, and his business is wrecked. He cannot keep the pace; he loses control of himself. His rival has no better brains than he, perhaps not so good, yet he pulls through successfully. We say that there is a difference in vitality; that one man has more of it than the other.

I once saw a man in a hospital who was suffering from five fatal diseases, and yet he would not die. He had kept on living year after year in spite of everything. He refused to succumb. We find the same thing illustrated every day. In a shipwreck there are men who seem to give up their lives without a struggle, without any power to resist; others cling to an open raft for days without food, almost frozen, constantly whipped by the waves, but for some reason or other they survive. The vitality in them is strong.

Notice how rapidly and surely one man recovers himself after a nervous breakdown while another drags along through years of semi-invalidism. Notice the results upon two men of a long cold drench of rain. One of them comes down with pneumonia; the other suffers no ill effects. How is it to be explained?

He has a reserve somewhere—an inner power of resistance, an aggressive something that will not be downed. We call it vitality. A man can't have a more valuable asset than that. It means joy instead of dumps, success instead of failure, life perhaps instead of death.—Luther H. Gulick, M. D., in World's Work.

The Modern Dinner.

A medical journal complains that the modern dinner has become an extremely depressing affair and that, so far from being a feast of reason and a flow of soul, the conversation is a mere interchange of symptoms, details of operations or the advantages of this or that cure. Such topics evidently are not provocative of remarks that set the table in a roar, nor do they tend to promote the good digestion which should wait on appetite. Indeed, there is little appetite for digestion to wait upon. The daintiest of menus is disregarded when the diners are under a regime, and courses pass untouched, while powders are openly stirred into wineglasses.

Following Directions.

Jones had been quite ill. One day the doctor called and found him in a bathtub.

"Why, man, are you crazy? You must be anxious to die."

"No, I ain't," protested poor Jones, "but didn't you say that your last medicine was to be taken in water?"—London Answers.

By Special Permit.

"Here! What does this mean?" shouted Whooply as he found his youngest riding a broomstick over the top of the piano.

"This is all right. Mamma said if I'd stay in I could play on the piano."

ROBBING A BANK SAFE

THE EXPERIENCE OF AN OLD TIME EXPERT CRACKSMAN.

He Was Hired to Do the Job, and He Did It Well, but the Reward Was Not What Had Been Promised by His Unscrupulous Employer.

"One day in the fall of 1874," said an old retired detective, "one of the most finished and successful bank burglars that ever used a drill in this country was walking across Sixth avenue, New York, enjoying his parole and the mellow sunshine. There were a whole lot of indictments hanging over him, of course, but they didn't worry him any, for he happened to be on pretty fair terms with some of the men attached to the municipal administration at that time. As he swung along he was accosted by a prosperous looking man whom he did not know, although the prosperous looking citizen addressed the burglar by his right name. The crook, finding after some stalling that the man who knew his name wasn't a detective, took him into a cafe and asked him some things.

"'In the first place, how did you know me?' he inquired of the stranger.

"Well, it appeared that the burglar had been pointed out to the stranger by a detective who was so shady that he afterward did time for surreptitiously extending aid and comfort to the enemy, one of the old time bands of New York crooks.

"'All right,' said the cracksman then. 'Now, I don't suppose you are seeking my acquaintanceship for the sake of being introduced into society or for the enjoyment of my winning ways. What's your lay?'

"Then the stranger up and told the burglar what his graft was.

"'I'm the cashier of a bank a bit up the state,' said he to the burglar. 'The directors don't know anything about it, but I'm short in my accounts. There's only one way out of it. The bank will have to be robbed by professional cracksmen. That will let me out, and in addition I'll expect to get my rakeoff from the robbery. I want you to rob the bank. You'll find $35,000 in cash in it on the night you arrange the job. I'll attend to that. Of course I want my bit out of that, $10,000 at least. I've always heard that you're square in these divisions of plunder, and therefore I'll trust you to hand me my share after you've done the job for putting you on to it.'

"'This sounds good enough to eat,' replied the cracksman. 'Fact is, it's so sweet that it's almost cloying. Now, I've heard your proposition. You give me a couple of days to investigate you, and then we'll talk business.'

"They arranged another meeting at the same place a couple of days later, and in the meantime the cracksman, whose facilities were the best, looked into the job. He found that his man really was the cashier of an up state bank in a town not more than an hour's run from New York. So when the cashier called at the appointed time the burglar was ready to talk business.

"'You'll have a hard night's work,' said the cashier, 'for in order to avert suspicion I'll have to leave the vaults and safes locked tighter'n a drum, as usual. You'll need several assistants.'

"'That's my end of it,' replied the cracksman. 'You just let me handle those little details. Every man to his trade. They don't make 'em so strong that I can't get into 'em.'

"Then all of the details were arranged, and the robbery was fixed for a certain night in the following week. The cashier was especially solicitous that he should get his share of the proceeds of the crib cracking. The cracksman assured him that if there was $35,000 in the job $25,000 would be enough for himself and his associates and the cashier would get the rest. On the night fixed the cracksman and three of his best men went up to the town and pulled off the job. It was a matter of four hours before the gang after overpowering and gagging the watchman got into the main safe. They found it empty. Then they tackled the smaller safes. These, too, were empty. The top notch cracksman was pretty mad, naturally.

"He had been played for a good thing, and he knew it. The cashier had simply looted the bank himself, and the robbery which he had arranged was to cover up his own trail. There have been Napoleons of finance without number developed from among bank cashiers, but I never heard of a neater job than that.

"Of course the cracksman and his pals had nothing for it but to pack their kits and drill back to New York. They weren't, of course, in a position to say anything about how they'd been done. The top notch cracksman had to read in the afternoon papers the lurid accounts of how the bank had been robbed of cash and securities 'approximating $100,000 in amount' and grind his teeth and cuss. The bank's failure was announced a few days later.

"The cashier? Oh, within a dozen years he died a beggar on the streets of New York."

Through the visual centres hundreds of thousands of foot-pounds of energy can be conserved daily, sent by the mind, and called by physical treatment into parts that are in need of it, thus restoring vigor. Badly Crushed At The Baptist Church

A young Englishman named James Pullan, employed on the construction of the Baptist Church, yesterday afternoon met with a painful accident. He was assisting some other employees in carrying a windlass, when he fell and the portion of the windlass he was holding fell across him injuring him internally. He was also rendered unconscious by his head striking upon a brick. Pullan was taken to his boarding house and attended by a physician. It is not anticipated that the injuries will be of a fatal nature, but he will possibly be laid up for some time.

Cool Curing in Belleville District.

Brockville Times: Chief Dairy Instructor G. G. Publow visited Brockville for a few hours this morning. He has lately been working through the Belleville district and says that there the question of cool curing has occupied much attention and he expects that about 50 factories in the Belleville district will next year be fully equipped with cool curing facilities. The manufacturers earnestly desire such facilities and are determined to go no longer without them.

Tar Macadam Walk Is Being Constructed

In conversation with Ald. Panter, chairman of the Public Works Committee, this morning, it was learned that at last a start has been made on the tar macadam walk on South George St., which was ordered by the Council early last summer. Experiments will be tried in heating the tar and stone, and the best way adopted. Frost, Ald. Panter says, will make no difference to tar macadam walks, and it is possible that, should the one in question prove satisfactory, other walks of the same kind may be built this fall. The Bridge St. west granolithic walk, which is now being laid, will probably be the last cement walk laid this year, and no time is being lost in getting it completed before the frost comes. With this end in view, orders, we are told have been issued that the men will work to-morrow.

The new crusher, which was ordered and expected long ago, has not yet arrived. The wisdom of the Public Works Committee, in going on with sand finish walks, rather than waiting for the crusher, is very apparent.

A Successful Fair.

One of the most successful fairs held in this district this fall was that of Madoc, which the Madocers claim to have been the best in the county. The exhibits numbered 2065, and there was a cash prize list of nearly $1000. Over 80 cheese were on exhibition and the Chief Inspector of Eastern Ontario, who judged the cheese, said the Madoc cheese and butter department was ahead of any fair he had visited, it being better in quantity and quality than the cheese shown at Ottawa. A high compliment.

Sports Had Good Sport.

A party of U. S. gentlemen, composed of Messrs. J. Giens, C. Ellis, L. McClellan, J. Smith, Bert Grant, W. Monroe, L. Bailey and Dr. Frame, who have been spending some days here, fishing, left this morning for Clayton, N.Y., on their steam yacht Castanet. The gentlemen are loud in praise of Belleville and the scenery along the bay front. They also had excellent sport securing a goodly number of bass each day they were out and also a few maskinonge. From their remarks, they will no doubt visit the city again next year.

Warrants Issued for McGill and Cockburn

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOY HAS TAKEN ACTION RE THE WRECKED ONTARIO BANK — INVESTIGATION SHOWS THAT ASSETS WERE PADDED AND NOTES UNDER DISCOUNT LESS THAN STATED.

Toronto, Oct. 17.—(Special.) — As the result of a conference held this morning between Attorney-General Foy, Crown Attorney Drayton and James Bickle, K.C., representing the Bankers' Association, a warrant has been issued for the arrest of Charles McGill, former manager of the wrecked Ontario Bank, on the charge of falsifying the Government returns regarding current loans in 1905 and 1906.

A summons has also been issued for Mr. G. R. R. Cockburn, president of the bank, on the charge of having, as president of the bank, wilfully signed false returns to the Minister of Finance and the Receiver-General.

It is now stated the notes under discount at the bank are really over $200,000 less than stated in the returns, while the assets of the bank were padded.

The total shortage is believed to be $1,000,000.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE MARKS BROTHERS.

The Marks Bros.' company were last night greeted by a large audience, and the bill presented, "Possum Ridge," a comedy drama, gave general satisfaction. The piece abounds in startling situations, as well as being amusing in its character. Ernie Marks, as Lige, a sleepy coon, was the fun-maker. J. H. Machan, as Tom Hatfield, a moonshiner, gave a good representation of that character. Miss Kitty Marks as Tatters, old Joe's daughter, won favor by her fine acting in a rather difficult role. The other members of the company did well. The specialties were first-class and thoroughly enjoyed. The singing and dancing of little Rosie Machan charmed the audience and was repeatedly applauded.

FIRST TIME IN MUSICAL COMEDY

George F. Hall, long and favorably known to Canadian theatre-goers from his annual visits in "The American Girl," "An American Hustler" and "A Ragged Hero" will be seen here next Monday evening in Frank W. Nason's musical production entitled, "Hello Bill." The book and score are from the pen of the well known Boston author, Matt Ott, who wrote such successes as "The Dazzler" and "The Star Gazer" for his brother, the late Joe Ott. Mr. Nason has engaged the strongest company that Mr. Hall has ever had in his support, including a well trained and elegantly costumed chorus and pony ballet, and both Mr. Hall and Mr. Nason's following may rest assured that they will spend the pleasantest evening with these two gentlemen that they have as yet enjoyed.

Two Little Episodes

(Canadian Mute.)

On one of the cars which brought our pupils to Belleville on the day of the opening were the fathers of two of our boys, one of whom is a new pupil and the other has been here for a year or two. The father of the former was lamenting the necessity of leaving his boy in the hands of strangers. "O you needn't worry about that," the other gentleman replied, "The children get a good deal better care and attention at the Institution than they do at home."

The other little incident occurred at the Institution. A new pupil was brought to school by his father, who naturally enough had dismal forebodings of how lonesome and homesick the little fellow would be. Next morning the father, as soon as he was dressed, started out to find his boy, who, he imagined, would be moping disconsolately some place at the front of the building. He was, however, no where in sight in that part of the grounds, and it took the father a considerable time to locate him, but he was at last discovered out on the campus with a lot of other "forlorn" little chaps and all having the time of their lives. Needless to say the father departed in a much more cheerful and contented frame of mind than he had expected.

Dropped Dead After Breakfast

Mr. Robert P. Allison, a well-known yeoman residing near Albury, Ameliasburg township, died suddenly this morning. Deceased arose in his apparent usual health, and after doing some work about the place partook of breakfast. When through with the morning meal he arose from the table and fell to the floor. It was thought that he had fainted, but death had claimed him as a victim. Heart disease was the cause of death. Mr. Allison was about 62 years of age and had lived in Ameliasburg all his life. He was esteemed by all who knew him. Deceased was a member of the Independent Order of Foresters, and in religion was a Methodist. A widow but no family survives.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

BASEBALL.

A Great Manager.

Charles A. Comiskey, by winning the world's championship, added the tenth pennant to his string—eleventh if you count the victory over the Cubs as giving him the championship pennant of Chicago. In 1885 and 1886 Comiskey led the St. Louis Browns to victory in the championship pennant races of the American Association, and in those years his team defeated Chicago, champions of the National League, for the world's championship. In 1887 and 1888 the Browns, under Comiskey, again won the American Association championship, but they lost the world's title to the Detroit and New York teams of the National League respectively. In 1900 and 1901 Comiskey's American League team celebrated the advent of that organization into Chicago by capturing the pennant. This year "Commy" wins the American League championship and his third championship of the world.

FOOTBALL.

Theologs Won

Last night the first football match of the season was played, between the Albert College and B.B.C. teams, on the Albert grounds, resulting in a score of 2 to 1 in favor of Albert. The ball was faced at 4.55 and the spectators witnessed a very clean and fast game, as the teams were well matched. During the first half Albert succeeded in scoring one goal, and shortly after the ball was faced for the second half the B.B.C. team scored. Both teams then did their best to break the tie, which was finally accomplished by Albert getting the last goal of the game shortly before time was called.

The line-up was as follows:

Albert.—Goal, McCreary; backs, Wheeler, Sutherland; half-backs, Griffith, Smith, Burton; forwards, Fisher, Rawson, Goddard, Halbert, Wellos.

B.B.C.—Goal, Hunter; backs, Mills, Gerow; half-backs, Peake, Moon, Shaw; forwards, Chown, Neadle, Hayes, McNeil, O'Flynn.

REFUSE YANKEE WARSHIPS CONCESSIONS GRANTED TO FRENCH MEN-OF-WAR.

St. John's, Nfld., Oct. 16.—The colonial ministry has refused the United States tug Potomac, which is now at Bay of Islands, free entry for stores in spite of the fact that this concession is accorded French warships in these waters. The Potomac has on board A. B. Alexander, Chief of Division of Statistics and Methods of the Bureau of Fisheries for the Department of Commerce and Labor, who is studying the Newfoundland fisheries dispute. The attitude of the colonial authorities arises from the displeasure over recent negotiations between Great Britain and the United States in reference to the fishing privileges.

The colonial cruiser Flora reached Bay of Islands on Monday, and reports the presence there of four American and three Canadian vessels. Very few herring have yet been taken. The British cruiser Brilliant will sail for Bay of Islands to-day and remain until the new year. She has on board 30 colonial naval reserves for training purposes.

A Remarkable Woman.

Mrs. Jefferson Davis, whose death is recorded in our telegraphic columns, was the daughter of the late Governor Richard Howell, of New Jersey and was born at Natchez, Miss., on May 7, 1826. At the age of nineteen she married the man who afterwards became President of the Confederate States. Her husband was elected to Congress the year of his marriage, but resigned twelve months later to go to the Mexican war. From this he returned severely wounded, and the wife had to nurse him back to health. Mrs. Davis lived at Washington while her husband was Senator and Secretary of War there from 1847 to 1861, and at Richmond during his Presidency of the Confederate States. During the first year of Mr. Davis' imprisonment after the fall of Richmond she was not allowed to be with him, but the second year they lived together at Fortress Monroe. Later when he came to write his "Decline and Fall of the Confederate Government" she acted as his amanuensis. Since her husband's death in 1889 she had written numerous criticisms and magazine articles, and has left besides an interesting memoir of her husband.

Out of a family of four sons and two daughters only one daughter survives, Mrs. J. A. Hayes, of Colorado Springs.

WOMEN IN SECRET SESSION.

Toronto Chosen for Quinquennial Session of International Council.

Hamilton, Oct. 17.—Yesterday was the last and most strenuous day of the thirteenth annual convention of the National Council of Women. Reporters were barred. Toronto was chosen as the place for the quinquennial meeting of the International Council of Women in 1909.

On the question of political equality for the sexes, the ladies changed their minds, and instead of appointing a committee on that subject, as proposed by Dr. Augusta Stowe-Gullen, Toronto, a good citizen's committee, was appointed.

The matter of agitating for an amendment to the divorce laws, introduced by the Victoria, B. C., Council, was left over for discussion at the next meeting.

These are the officers chosen: Lady Edgar, Toronto, president; Mrs. John Thompson, St. Louis; Lady Laurier, Lady Taylor and Mrs. Sanford, Hamilton, vice-presidents; Miss Detrick, Montreal, recording secretary; Mrs. Frost, Smith's Falls, treasurer; Mrs. Willoughby Cummings, Toronto, corresponding secretary.

NOT KILLED BY STRIKERS.

Post Mortem Reveals That Explosive Bullet Killed Detective Warner.

Buckingham, Que., Oct. 17.—A post-mortem examination yesterday on the body of Detective Warner of Montreal, who died from a wound received in the recent strike battle, revealed that the detective was hit by an explosive bullet.

The strikers' defence will be that he was shot by one of his own men, the bullet being the same kind that killed Union Leader Belanger.

The town is quiet. The bodies of the two dead strikers, Belanger and Theriault, will be exhumed by order of the Attorney-General, so that the new jury may view them.

W. H. Kelly and Alexander Cunningham, the other lumbermen here, have engaged fifteen of the strikers on the point of starvation and sent them to their camps about eight miles up the Lievre River.

The deadlock continues. A citizens' committee has failed to bring about a settlement.

In addition, the soldier is upheld in the order of the day as an example to his comrades of the faithful performance of duty.

MR. BORDEN TO CONSERVATIVES.

Deplores Lack of Organization Which Causes Many Defeats.

St. John, N. B., Oct. 17.—R. L. Borden and Hon. George E. Foster were the chief speakers at a banquet last evening, tendered S. D. Scott, former editor of The Sun by his Conservative friends in this city.

Mr. Borden deplored the lack of organization in the Conservative party throughout Canada, and regretted that his supporters were not paying more attention to this very foundation of future success.

"I want to impress on every Conservative in Canada," said the Opposition leader, "that it is not enough to begin the work of organization three weeks before the election, nor three months, but three years. Our only hope depends on this."

Galt's Homage to Kentucky Todd.

Galt, Oct. 17.—Kentucky Todd, Miss Wilkes' famous 2-year-old which distinguished himself at Lexington, Ky., by winning the Futurity Stakes, 2.14 3-4, arrived yesterday. The mayor and citizens turned out last night in a big procession, led by the Kiltie Band, and held a reception to the colt at the curling rink, which was packed. A beautiful wreath was presented to the horse. Speeches were delivered by the mayor, President Martin Todd of the Horse Show Association, and several other representative citizens.

McINTOSH BROS.

PROBING THE SUN LIFE

Large Contingent Fund Defended by Actuary Macaulay.

Secretary of the Company Strongly Opposed to Policyholders Voting—Fears Agents Will Control Proxies and Absentees Be at a Disadvantage—Writing Up and Writing Down of Securities Show Loss and Gain.

Montreal, Oct. 17.—When the investigation was resumed in the morning, President Robertson Macaulay told the Commissioners that prior to 1901 the company was in the habit of charging in a lump 50 per cent. for expenses, but it was found that the expenses did not amount to so much and this was rectified.

Commissioner Kent severely criticized the bookkeeping methods of the Sun Life. The company keeps no cash-book, but a sort of journal in which items of accounts are entered.

Writing Up Profits.

Mr. Shepley continued with the profit and loss on investment account. T. B. Macaulay was on the stand. In 1903 a sum of $10,000 had been taken from profits on securities to lessen the apparent cost of some real estate investments, and large sums had also in that year been written off Detroit Telephone and Michigan Telephone when their properties were taken over by the Michigan State Telephone Co.

In 1904 a similar state of affairs existed. There was another $10,000 on real estate profit and loss. Another item of debit was $20,000 on interest on Ohio Street Railway bonds. The bonds had become worthless and the interest on them, which was never paid, was taken off profit on securities.

Agents' Advances Figures.

An item of $17,000 for agents' advances, which were non-collectable, also figured, and witness defended entering this because American companies did, and Commissioner Kent insisted that if agents were solvent advances should be repaid. Witness said that $30,000 profit on Illinois traction bonds had been supplied to wiping out these advances to agents.

In 1904 a share of the profits on investments was paid to shareholders, although arrangement had been altered previously. They were paid 5 per cent. of profits for the last four years. The company thought that 6 per cent. on their investments was not enough for the shareholders.

Writing Down Bonds.

In the year 1905 the writing down of bonds had been largely practiced, and there were items of $3,500 for special expenses re securities, and $1,000 traveling expenses for selling them.

About $558,000 had been wiped off for losses in securities. Mr. Shepley remarked this, but witness said these were not necessarily losses. The company was doubtful about them and had money enough to put these securities out of assets in the meantime. He gave as an instance the case of Ohio bonds, which are now worth $675,000, although wiped off in 1904.

Undeclared Assets.

There was a warm discussion between witness and Mr. Shepley as to the advisability of the company keeping such large amounts of their assets undeclared and without profit to policyholders. Witness said that the Sun Life had now $3,000,000 of contingent account, and it was each year accumulating.

Mr. Shepley noted that the growth of the contingent account was outstripping that of divisable profits, but Mr. Macaulay contended that there had never been complaint on this score from policyholders.

No Votes For Policyholders.

Commissioner Kent sprung a surprise on the witness by asking one of his usual question: "Would you be in favor of giving policyholders votes in the company?"

Mr. Macaulay: "No, the shareholder is liable for more money, and it would not be fair to put policyholders on equal terms."

When policyholders vote by proxy their votes are controlled by agents, and in that case the management cannot be ousted. If they vote by franchise all but those who live in the vicinity are deprived of the right by their distance from the place of meeting.

Ideal Management.

The ideal management is when those in charge of the affairs of a company control enough of the stock that they cannot be easily ousted and yet not enough to make them infallible.

Mr. Shepley asked whether it was the intention of the Sun Life to have the growth of contingent account outstrip that of divisible assets.

Mr. Macaulay said that the company wanted the contingent fund to be as large as possible, as it was the strength to the company, but they wanted the increase of divisible assets to go hand in hand with it.

An Heroic Encounter.

54,600 Meals Did Him No Good.

HOW ONE MAN WASTED 50 YEARS OF HIS LIFE — THOUSANDS LIKE HIM.

"What's the use of eatin', anyhow?" said the scrawny dyspeptic to his rotund, prosperous - looking friend. "Here I've been eatin' three times a day, and sometimes twice a day, for 50 years, and look at me. I'm rawboned and skinny, still at the bottom of the ladder, sour on the world, and a pessimist. I know it, and I can't help it. If I had it to do over again, though, I would take care of my stomach, for I don't believe I ever really relished a meal in my life, not even mother's Christmas dinners, and I firmly believe that my way of eating, or whatever it was, brought along with it darkness and impossibility of success."

"You're right," nodded his companion. "Of course, that isn't always the case. But in this age we must not only 'Trust in the Lord and keep our powder dry,' but we must swallow sunshine with our food. Cheerfulness, especially while eating, which is the most essential act of man, is as necessary to him as sunshine is to the flowers. Nothing normal can be produced in darkness.

"But this is what you haven't been doing, Mr. Dyspeptic. Your brain and your stomach, remember, are twins, and you have to treat them accordingly. Why not start now and repair the damage you've done. It is never too late, you know."

"You mean at my age? And suppose you can't always have the sunshine?"

"Absolutely, yes. Science has made it possible to get the sunshine, the health and the strength that your stomach needs, all put up together in little tablets. They call them Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, the most effective tablets in the world for this very thing. One ingredient in these tablets digests 3,000 grains of food without the help of the stomach. Two tablets after each meal can do more work, quicker work and better work, in digesting a heavy meal, than the stomach can itself. The stomach need not work at all. Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets does all the work, and gives your jaded stomach a rest, the rest it needs. Meanwhile you cure yourself of brash, irritation, burning sensation, heartburn, sour stomach, acidity, fermentation, bloat, and the worst cases of dyspepsia and indigestion. You get rid of these for all time. And then, besides, you can eat all you want and whenever you want, and you will also relish mother's Christmas dinners if you will take Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after eating. That's the sunshine I was talking about. Then your face will reflect the internal change going on, you'll be more energetic, your mind will be clearer, you will have more confidence in yourself, you'll be happier, and you'll be yourself again.

"Your heart will change and you'll feel rosy. You'll enjoy your meals—and live. Let's walk down to the drug store and let me introduce you to one little package of these Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. You can get them at any drug store in the world for only 50c a package. It is worth it, Mr. Dyspeptic."

LAW WILL BE INVOKED

County Crown Attorney Drayton to Act re Ontario Bank.

Asked to Do So by the Attorney-General's Department of Ontario—Cabinet Meeting Held, But Ministers Won't Talk—Shareholders Want to Know Some Things, and Some of Them Institute Proceedings.

Toronto, Oct. 17.—The Attorney-General's Department have asked County Crown Attorney Drayton to take steps toward an enquiry into the affairs of the Ontario Bank.

There will be no hurried measures, but when sufficient facts are known the law will be invoked in whatever directions may seem warranted.

Ministers Won't Talk.

A meeting of the Ontario Cabinet was held yesterday afternoon, at which were present the Premier and the Hon. Messrs. Foy, Pyne, Matheson, Reaume, Cochrane, Monteith and Hendrie. Besides routine business the only topic which came up appeared to be the Ontario Bank disaster, but none of the Ministers would discuss the point.

The Provincial Treasurer, Hon. Mr. Matheson, said that the Government deposit, amounting to about $79,000, had been formally removed to the Bank of Montreal.

Ex-Manager Charles McGill is assisting the officials in their investigation of the affairs of the bank. It is understood that he has turned over all his property to the bank, including his life insurance policies. The latter will enure to the benefit of the shareholders, and are not included in the transfer to the Bank of Montreal.

Shareholders Want to Know.

There is a general feeling among officials that the wreck may after all not be so complete as supposed. One of the directors has expressed a belief that the shareholders may, in the end, receive 70 cents on the dollar.

This has led some of the shareholders to ask why they were not given the opportunity to save their interests by reorganizing and strengthening the bank and carrying it on as a going concern. They consider $150,000 for the business and good-will to be ridiculous.

A meeting of the shareholders was called for yesterday to ratify the transfer to the Bank of Montreal, but it was postponed until the board of directors can submit some more definite statement.

To Institute Recovery Proceedings.

A very considerable number of shareholders have already instructed their solicitors to institute proceedings against the directors to recover any loss that they may sustain by reason of their performance of duties as may be provided by the act.

Manager Braithwaite left for New York last evening. It is said that he will be appointed receiver of the assets of the Ontario Bank in that state. These consist of money on deposit with the Fourth National Bank of New York, and certain securities also deposited with that bank as collateral.

STOP LANDING OF HINDUS.

Vancouver Police Guard Government Immigration Sheds.

Vancouver, B.C., Oct. 17.—Acting under instructions from Mayor Buscombe, the Vancouver police are guarding the Dominion Government immigration detention shed on the waterfront to prevent the landing of the Hindus now held there.

The local objection to the Hindus immigration has reached an acute stage here, and trouble similar to that which marked the Chinese exclusion several years ago is anticipated. The steamer Empress of Japan brought in over 100 Hindus Monday, none being allowed to land.

Negro Artist Wins Harris Prize.

Chicago, Oct. 17.—Henry Tanner, a negro artist, has been awarded the N. W. Harris prize of $500 for the best painting at the 19th annual exhibition of American paintings, which will open at the Art Institute to-day. The decision on Mr. Tanner's "Two Disciples at the Tomb" was unanimous. The picture shows the faces of Peter and John before the Saviour with a fine light playing across their features, which are strained with expectancy while awaiting the fulfilment of the promise that had been made them.

Will Co-operate With Canada.

Ottawa, Oct. 17.—Dr. Rutherford, veterinary director-general and live stock commissioner for Canada, has returned from Washington, where he spent some days in consulting with veterinary experts in regard to the enforcement of quarantine regulations on the international boundary and other matters. He found the United States officials quite willing to cooperate with Canada in preventing the spread of disease.

Aldrich Wiped Out By Fire.

Brockville, Oct. 17.—The little hamlet of Aldrich, on the line of the Carthage and Adirondack Railway, was wiped off the map a few days ago. The fire started in the dry kiln of the Aldrich Lumber Co. and, fanned by a heavy wind, spread rapidly, taking in turn the general store, postoffice and several houses. Several cars backed into the lumber yards were reduced to ruins.

G.T.P. Can't Get Labor.

Ottawa, Oct. 17.—The Transcontinental Railway Commissioners left yesterday for the west.

They learn that great difficulty has been experienced in securing labor for the construction of the transcontinental line eastward from Winnipeg to Superior Junction, and will look into the complaint.

Judge Stevens Dead.

St. Stephen, N. B., Oct. 17.—Judge Stevens, one of the most prominent men in the province, died yesterday after a lengthy illness. He was an enthusiastic Presbyterian, taking great interest in the work of the general assembly He was a grandson of Sir Colin Campbell of Argyle.

Late last evening it was semi-officially stated that the whole Cabinet would resign, and that M. Clemenceau, as Premier, would retain the portfolio of the Interior. M. Clemenceau contemplates inviting another old colaborator, M. Viviani, at present a Socialist deputy for Paris, to enter the Cabinet.

Remanded For A Fortnight.

Expectation re President Cockburn and Ex-Manager McGill

What the Contentions of the Crown Will Be—Worry Telling on Ex-Manager McGill, But President Cockburn Treats His Summons Lightly—A. E. Ames Says Shareholders May Begin Suit.

Toronto, Oct. 19—President Cockburn and ex-Manager McGill of the Ontario Bank will be formally arraigned this morning in the Police Court, and a remand for a fortnight is expected by those interested in the case.

What Crown Will Contend.

"That for five years Charles McGill manipulated the monthly statements of the Ontario Bank in order to conceal losses in the market now aggregating almost a million and a half of dollars; that for five years the monthly misstatement of the bank's affairs were signed by the president of the bank as being a truthful and accurate return of its condition."

This in substance will be the contention in the trial of the president and the ex-Manager of the Ontario Bank. The Crown counsel will traverse the road which Charles McGill has travelled since November of 1901. The milestones marking that road are the alleged fraudulent reports, sixty of them, which he sent to the Finance Minister of Canada, and the end of it is the dock in Magistrate Denison's court.

Worry Tells on Him.

The worry of the past few days since the exposures of the bank's troubles has told on him. He evidently has taken his short confinement in the cells much to heart. He found a small cell with a hard bench and nothing to look through but an iron grating greatly different from what he had been accustomed to.

In an interview Mr. McGill is quoted as saying:

"None of the directors has made loans from the funds of the bank, and they were not aware of all the things going on. I believe there are loans to the extent of three or four thousand dollars in which some of the directors' names figure, but not to themselves."

Mr. Cockburn Not Alarmed.

"Think of it," said Mr. Cockburn, "the president of the Bank of Montreal must sign a return which certifies to the exact condition of 132 branches. He can't possibly do that upon his personal knowledge. He must rely implicitly upon the good faith of his general manager."

Of Mr. McGill's arrest he said:

"Too bad! I am very sorry for him. But what else could they do?"

"But suppose that Mr. Cockburn signed the returns, not knowing that they were false?" was the question put to Crown Attorney Corley.

"The very fact that false returns were signed is, under the act, taken as proof that they were wilfully signed," he replied. "A bank president is supposed to know that what he is signing is correct. He must take the necessary steps to verify it."

Shareholders May Sue.

The shareholders are still indignant at the transfer to the Bank of Montreal for $150,000. It is said that if the matter had been properly handled, the good-will and connection might have brought $1,000,000. The sudden panic of the directors, which led to the slaughter, arose from the necessity of making a return to the Government on the 10th. To avoid this, the transfer was hurried through on the 13th, the 14th being Sunday.

A. E. Ames intimates that the shareholders may begin some proceedings to-day. This will probably result in leave being asked of the court by certain shareholders to sue for the benefit of, and in the name of, the bank.

Curator in Charge.

The curator, Mr. Stavert, appointed by the Canadian Bankers' Association, has taken charge of all the affairs of the Ontario Bank, and the books and papers of that institution are in his custody and absolutely in his control.

It will be several weeks before any definite statement of the bank's condition may be looked for.

Canada's Banking Laws

The banking laws of Canada make ample provision for the prosecution and punishment of men guilty of fraud in the preparation or presentation of returns. Section 99 of the Act of 1900 reads as follows:

"The making of any wilfully false or deceptive statement in any account, statement, return, report, or other document respecting the affairs of the bank is, unless it amounts to a higher offence, a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years; and every president, vice-president, director, principal, manager, cashier, or other officer of the bank who prepares, signs, approves, or concurs in such statement, return, report, or document, or uses the same with intent to deceive or mislead any person, shall be held to have wilfully made such false statement, and shall further be responsible for all damages sustained by any person in consequence thereof."

It was under the foregoing section that the prosecution was launched against the officials of the Bank of Yarmouth. They were accused of signing monthly statements that they knew to be false and the president was found guilty. Some years ago the failure of the Ville Marie Bank was followed by a similar prosecution by the conviction of the president, and his imprisonment for a period of two years. To the public the disgrace and punishment inflicted on a man of great age and former high esteem seemed extremely harsh, but, if he had been let off lightly, the general confidence in our banking system would have been weakened.

The certainty that justice will be meted out to offenders against the banking law promotes that confidence with which investors buy bank shares, and makes bank notes as acceptable as gold. If lenity were shown to bank wreckers or to officials detected in acts tending to wreck their banks, the public's faith in the banks would be withdrawn our bank currency would be put under suspicion, and the business of the country would be crippled because of the defective financial organization that would be a consequence of savings not making their way to the bank deposits of the country. Not to mention any worse effects, the present time of prosperity might easily be turned into a period of inflation if the penal clauses of the Bank Act were treated as a nullity.

So much for the law which governs banking in Canada. The following, from the Montreal Gazette, shows how the said laws may be, and have been, violated;

"The case of the Ontario Bank, coming unpleasantly soon after some worse failures, shows that banks in Canada are subject to all the weaknesses that have developed in connection with monetary institutions, in other countries. The dishonest man, the reckless man, the weak man, the man who does not understand a business at once delicate and intricate and calling for constant watchfulness, can make as had a record for a bank in Canada as can be shown in the United States, where bank failures are most numerous. There is a discouragingly long list of failed banks to be counted in the past twenty-five years, which is a short time in financial reckoning. The cause almost invariably was the failure of some one who had been trusted, as some one has to be trusted at the head of every business enterprise. On the other hand there have been cases where capable and conscientious men have used their trust in such a way that the institutions, which they directed or managed have gone forward increasing in strength and usefulness year after year, till people have come to think that what men did was due to the system and to imagine that the system could make up for the lack of probity, capacity or attention in carrying it out. The great strength of Canadian banking is in the men that have been trained in it. When, from time to time, they have failed, there has been loss and sometimes disaster. At the same time the system is a good one, and especially useful in a country where in some places there is more money than safe and profitable employment can be found for, while in others there is a demand beyond the local power to supply. The result is the evening down of interest rates, to the especial benefit of the business man in the smaller and newer communities. The branches train men for the higher positions, where the greatest responsibility rests, and where these higher positions are filled by the right class of men year after year the result is the development of strong institutions which can stand with little loss the strain of a time of depression, or, as has just been done, can take hold of a less fortunately directed bank, avert a panic, reduce the probable loss, and do the whole business community and the country itself a service. The system is all right; but unless the men who work under it are also all right, the results are not satisfactory. It would be well to remember this, not only when unfortunate incidents occur, but when new schemes for the investment of capital are being pressed on the public's attention."

Sunday next, October 21, will be the 101st anniversary of the death of Nelson. It is probably no exaggeration to say that the memory of Nelson has stayed, and will stay, brighter and greener than that of any other hero of British history. In that case 'England expects that every man" that day will do his duty and go to church.

It will soon be moving day with some of the fraternal societies in this city. Belleville lodge of Oddfellows, we are told, will leave the quarters on Front St. which they have occupied so long and find elegant new quarters on Bridge St., over the cement company's offices. It is claimed that, when completed, the new lodge rooms of "Old 81" will not be surpassed by any in Canada. The lodge and assembly rooms on Front St., which have been headquarters for many a jolly gathering, will, when 81 moves, be occupied by the C. M. B. A. Oxford lodge, Sons of England, will shortly leave their present quarters in the Orange hall, moving to the rooms now being fitted up over the Cement company's premises on Bridge St.

Mail and Empire; It is bare justice to say that the Ontario Government through the resignation of Mr. Robert Mathison, superintendent of the Deaf and Dumb Institution at Belleville, has lost a worthy officer and the general public a devoted servant. Mr. Mathison has been in charge of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum for years, and he has made the proper administration, of that trust his highest object in life. There are thousands of deaf and dumb people throughout Ontario who remember the head of the institution which taught them how to communicate with one another, and how to make a living, with affection. it is gratifying to know that Mr. Mathison goes to a position which will be more remunerative. Government offices, after all, are not very agreeable from the financial point of view.

McKeown's DRUG STORE

A Story Denied.

To the Editor of The Intelligencer;

Dear Sir, — I beg space in your paper in which to contradict a story circulated around town last week by some irresponsible person or persons who asserted that two college students were "held up" by fellow-students and were so badly frightened that they had to have the police escort them home.

I wish to state that this story is a malicious, slanderous fabrication.

The young men who were assaulted were not college students but strangers in town and I doubt, as the story ran, that the hoodlums who assaulted them were students. If they were there is less excuse for them and such toughs should be severely punished. The hoodlums resorted to rock-throwing, and some respectable residents of the town saw the assault and assisted in driving off the toughs.

The police did not escort us home, as we reported personally at the station, and our home for the night in question was at the Hotel Quinte, which is only a stone's throw from the police headquarters.

Should the civic authorities be unable or unwilling to cope with the toughs of the town, the men assaulted, neither of whom, has spent his life within the confines of a village or a province, will be prepared to deal with the thugs in a little less lenient manner next time.

ONE OF THE ASSAULTED.

No More Net Fishing In Bay Of "Kanty."

Toronto, Oct. 16.—Hon. Dr. Reaume has issued instruction whereby the fisheries branch has refused to renew the licenses to fish with nets in the waters in and around the Bay of Quinte. The reason for this is the practical depletion of the Bay of Quinte game fish. Bass have almost entirely disappeared, notwithstanding that spawn has been continually placed in these waters. The place is looked upon as a natural breeding ground, and net licenses to fish in these waters will not again be granted for some years, if ever.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

SACRED CONCERT AT HOLLOWAY STREET LAST NIGHT.

A goodly number of the music-lovers of this city enjoyed a treat last evening in the form of an organ recital and concert in Holloway St. Methodist Church. The programme in the main was given by Mr. W. H. Dingle, organist of Parkdale Presbyterian Church, Toronto, formerly organist of Bridge St. Church, this city. Mr. Dingle gave a pleasing programme, varying from favorite old melodies to the heavy "Pilgrims' Chorus" from "Tannhauser," his programme throughout being rendered in a manner that demonstrated perfect command over this greatest of all instruments. When Mr. Dingle left this city some years ago he had gained for himself a most enviable reputation as an organist, and his work last evening not only sustained, but added materially to this reputation. While Mr. Dingle's work was most pleasing throughout, his last number, the well-known overture, "Poet and Peasant," by Von Suppe, was given in such a manner as to call forth loud and continued applause.

The organist was well supported by a number of other artists. Miss Elsie Price sang "Rock of Ages" in a manner which sustained her reputation as one of this city's most pleasing soloists. The duet by Mrs. and Mr. M. C. Gordon, and the quartette by Miss E. Price, Mrs. M. C. Gordon, Mr. D. Leitch and Mr. M. C. Gordon were also much appreciated. The voices in the quartette blending in a most pleasing manner. It was a delightful bit of part singing.

Miss Dora Spencer, of Albert College, contributed two readings, which were much enjoyed. Miss Spencer gave her selections in a manner that did her much credit, and received a hearty reception from the audience. Taken altogether, the concert was very enjoyable.

THE MARKS BROS.

The Marks Bros.' company continues to attract large crowds at the opera house. On Wednesday evening, yesterday afternoon and last night the house was crowded, and the performance gave general satisfaction. The play last night was "For His Sake," and it was well acted by the members of the company. The illustrated songs, moving pictures and specialties were also pleasing features.

GEORGE F. HALL, IN "HELLO BILL."

The play "Hello Bill," in which Frank W. Nason is exploiting the comedian George F. Hall, and in which he will be seen at the Carman Opera House on Monday next, is entirely different from any of the plays that Mr. Hall has ever before been seen here in. It is a musical comedy pure and simple, enlisting the services of a large company of principals aided and abetted by a pony ballet of eight young girls, who make no less than twelve complete changes of costumes during the play. Some of the song hits in the piece are; "Holding Hands," "The Jackies of the U. S. A.," "Joe Miller," "The Gibson Girl," "I'm a Chef," and Mr. Hall's entrance song, "General Delivery."

Two Small Fires.

At about 3.30 yesterday afternoon, as some workmen were heating tar which was being spread on the new planking of the upper bridge, it became ignited, making for a few minutes a considerable blaze and dense, black smoke. A line of hose from No. 2 fire hall near by was run out and the blaze extinguished before any damage was done to the structure.

Last evening, shortly after 6 o'clock the fire brigade was called out. In some manner the roof of the blacksmith's shop in connection with the Walker Foundry had become ignited, but the blaze was extinguished. The loss was trifling and covered by insurance.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance. With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

DO YOU AWAKEN FEELING SICK?

OR WITH A BAD TASTE IN YOUR MOUTH?

BILEANS WILL REMOVE THESE SYMPTOMS.

When you awaken in the morning do you feel sick and languid—not sick enough to vomit, but with just a lingering trace of nausea. Not feeling really ill, but weak and languid and averse to all effort? These symptoms should warn you that the liver and stomach is beginning to go wrong. Bileans will correct the evil. This was the condition in which Mr. T. Mills, of Kingston (Ont.), found himself: "On rising in the morning," he says, "I had a headache and a feeling of sickness. Sometimes this would increase until I had a vomitting spell. At times it would work off, to appear again next morning. It made me feel weak and unfit for work. A few doses of Bileans had a wonderful effect, and a little perseverence with this remedy led to a complete cure. I have not now been troubled with the sickness or headache for some time and I believe Bileans have removed the cause of the trouble completely."

All druggists sell at 50c a box, or free from the Bilean Co., Toronto, 6 boxes for $2.50. Send one-cent stamp for free sample box.

Going To Be a Hard Winter.

One of the oldest farmers in this district, who has witnessed many a hard winter, and who has made a practice for many years of observing the conditions which precede winter, and which he takes to be signs as to the severity or otherwise of that season, asserts that the coming winter will be the hardest one for the past twenty years, and still claims that there is an abundance of signs to show this. He mentions the following among others;

The corn husks are a foot and a half thick, and all the stalks lean to the west.

The geese, ducks and chickens are growing a deal of fur under their feathers, and are rubbing borax on their feet to harden them up.

All the one-eyed owls are leaving the country a month earlier than usual and the bob-tailed squirrels are laying in sweet potatoes as well as nuts for winter provisions.

The farmers who has taken the trouble to investigate has found that all the toadstools on the old logs have wrinkles on them. The last time that this happened we had winter weather that froze the handles of plows.

Rabbits are sitting around with a humped-up look to them, and field mice have wrinkles in their tails. If this means anything it means 20 degrees below zero from November to May.—Ex.

The intense itching characteristic of salt rheum and eczema is instantly allayed by applying Chamberlain's Salve. As a cure for skin diseases this salve is unequalled. To be had at R. Templeton & Co.'s drug store.

Where the Blame Lies.

(Toronto World.)

Newspaper editors as usual are deploring the crimes that have been unveiled in connection with the London and other elections in the Province of Ontario. One newspaper says it was lamentable that deputy returning officers should lend themselves to the crimes that were committed, or that agents could be found who would bribe and pay men for switching ballots and things of that kind.

All this talk is twaddle. The real culprits are the members of the Dominion Government headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who found this money and whose organizers engaged these men to perpetrate these crimes. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has made alliances with corporations that have put ministers like Charles Hyman and those who preceded him in the management of the conduct of elections in this province in the interests of the Liberal party, in funds sufficient to do all these devilish things. This money came through ministers of the crown or men who were directly in contact with them. Preston hadn't the money, Collins hadn't the money, Serviss hadn't the money, Mulloy hadn't the money, nor Lewis nor O'Gorman, nor had they any object in finding the money, But the Liberal party found the money, and we believe got the money from corporations and deliberately put it into the hands of the men now being tried for these crimes. The men at the bar in the minds of public opinion are Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Charles Hyman and their colleagues in the Laurier Cabinet. They had a desperate game to play in regard to the educational clauses of the Northwest Autonomy bills and they were determined, cost what it might to have that policy of coercion appear to be endorsed in London and South Oxford. "Carry the elections" was the orders and the means and men were found to do it. The men who profit by corrupt elections are the men who put up the jobs. All the others are tools. The chief culprits are ministers of the crown.

Baptists In Session.

YESTERDAY WAS HOME MISSION DAY WITH THE BRETHREN IN PETERBORO.

Peterboro, Oct. 18. — To-day was home mission day at the Baptist convention, and several impressive addresses were delivered. Most encouraging reports were presented. Rev. W. J. Scott, of Toronto, presented the report of the Church Edifice Board. The fund had been increased by $1,000 during the past year. The number of churches contributing to the fund had increased from 15 to 45. The report referred appreciatively to the work of the Toronto Baptist Church Extension Board. By the aid of this board about $53,000 had been expended in new edifices. Other Church Extension Boards had been formed at Hamilton and Montreal, London had enlarged the Adelaide and Maitland Street churches. These churches had repaid their loans. The total number of loans on the books was 31, amounting in all to $16,416.61. The total number of churches helped since 1857 was 102, and the total amount of loans issued reached $47,959. Rev. G. R. Welch, of Lindsay, seconded the report, which was adopted.

A resolution was passed endorsing the work of the International Reform Bureau, now in session at Brussels, Belgium, and it will be cabled to that body.

WESTERN MISSIONS.

Rev. Jas. Grant, of Dundas, presented the report of the Committee on Western Missions. During the year 60 new mission stations had been opened, 16 new churches organized, 600 candidates were baptized, 1,150 new members had been received, and at least 950 persons converted in the field.

The treasurer's statement showed the receipts to be $10,872.36. The sum of $7,716 was remitted to the treasurer of the Manitoba convention, and $2,538 to the treasurer of the British Columbia convention.

HOME MISSION FUND.

In the afternoon the home mission report was submitted by Rev. W. E. Norton, superintendent. Rev. A. A. Torie, Midland, has been appointed as evangelist to assist Rev. M. Van Sickle in the work. During the year the board had assisted in the support of 136 pastors, representing 249 churches and preaching stations, and 41 students, representing 76 churches and preaching stations, making a total of 177 pastors and students, representing 325 churches and preaching stations. Eighteen church buildings had been erected and six new churches organized. The total baptisms in Home Mission churches during the year was 936, as compared with 632 the year previous. The membership in the Home Mission churches was about 9,000. Sixty-nine churches had contributed nothing to Home Mission finances, although the board financially was in a much better position than expected.

The treasurer's statement was read by Rev. E. T. Fox, of Toronto, showing total receipts of $31,950.98, with a total expenditure of $39,041.54, leaving a deficit of $7,090.56, compared with $6,860.75 for the previous year.

A Few Rounds With Caesar.

A high school girl appealed to us the other day to read a certain sentence from Caesar's Commentaries in which Caesar in his excitement had tangled up a few chunks of Latin of the baser sort and then viciously thrown the whole into direct discourse so as to tangle up school girls with infinitives and accusative subjects, the whole held up in the thin air of thought by a far-distant verb, so far distant, in fact, that its outlines were misty and purple.

Father assumed an air of long dead but reviving wisdom and allowed himself to be piloted by one hand into this jungle, by the youthful designing one, where he soon found himself with one leg in a linguistic trap and the other waving frantically about in the underbrush in search of something familiar and homelike to rest on. Nothing appeared.

Just why the school authorities, after a pupil has learned to conjugate "amo" and to rattle off that "certain verbs take the dative after the analogy of their primitives," continue to tease the helpless pupils into the Caesarian tangle to extricate themselves the best they can, is still a hopeless mystery to the judicious, unless it is done on the principle that, after a touch of hotel kitchen work, parlor work becomes twice as pleasant.

However, father cuffed the dictionary a few times, pulled out all the stops on the notes, threw a little sand into the grammar, and came up the grade laboring heavily, with sparks flying from every wheel and whistling fiercely for the crossings to keep up courage.

Caesar, the Helvetians, the Heduans, Liscus and Dumnorix, somebody's frater, all wore themselves into a nasty tangle, but father topped the grade dragging all the loaded freight cars and suffering no damage other than a strained construction or two and a hotbox in the dictionary.

Liscusses' little explanation to Caesar, as it strikes an old graduate, is so full of profound circumlocution and complexity that the most recondite cryptogram ever rescued from a pyramid seems a burst of innocent and childish candor in comparison.

We are led to understand that teacher threw down our construction the next day and adopted one more in harmony with the genius of the Latin tongue. We felt no wounded pride over this. Any construction at all of a sentence like that would come as the vision of the oasis after the trip across the desert; would fall upon the hungry soul as gently as the bag of peanuts at the three-ring circus. Let teacher keep her old construction; ours is good enough for us.

But the next time we take on Caesar it will be with more humble and chastened spirit. He was a great fighter.—Minneapolis Journal.

NICE HAIR FOR ALL.

Once Destroy the Dandruff Germ, And Hair Grows Luxuriantly.

Any one can have nice hair if he or she has not dandruff, which causes brittle, dry hair, falling hair and baldness. To cure dandruff it is necessary to kill the germ that causes it, and that is just what Newbro's Herpicide does. Cornelius Grew, Colfax, Wash., says:

"One bottle of Newbro's Herpicide completely cured me of dandruff, which was very thick; and it has stopped my hair from falling out." It makes hair soft and glossy as silk, delightful odor, and refreshing hair dressing. It permits the hair to grow abundantly, and kills the dandruff germ. Sold by leading druggists. Send 10c in stamps for sample to The Herpicide Co., Detroit, Mich. J. S. McKeown, special agent.

AS SMOOTH AS A BILLIARD TABLE.

Your comfort on a railway journey very largely depends upon the roadbed of the route you select. No matter how luxurious the coaches, or how much personal attention you receive from the employees, you cannot be comfortable if jolted and jarred by a poor and irregular roadbed. On the Lake Shore Railway no expense has been spared to make a roadbed as nearly perfect as the most skilful engineering could build, and as a result, throughout the entire length and breadth of the system the right of way is as smooth as a billiard table. No jolts or jars, nor dust nor dirt. This perfection of service extends throughout the entire system. Lake Shore trains are the most luxurious, they are equipped with every comfort and convenience and are run at highest speed and in safety. They run on time. For your own sake you should see that your ticket reads "via Buffalo and The Lake Shore Railway." Write for full information about rates and routes to J. W. Daly, Chief A.G.P.A., Buffalo, N. Y.; A. High Praise For Mr. Leo. B. Riggs, Former Belleville Musician

The Indianapolis News of October 16, in a fine critique of a concert given in that city by Guiseppe Campanari, the barytone of the Metropolitan opera, New York, has the following to say of Mr. Leo B. Riggs, son of Mr. W. B. Riggs, of this city, and a former favorite with Belleville music-lovers:

FINDS ACCOMPLISHED ACCOMPANIST.

Campanari and his accompanist, Leo B. Riggs, of this city, had an unusual experience. The singers arrived last evening at 6.40, from Texas. Mr. Rice, who was to meet him, found him at the station and hurried him to the Claypool Hotel, where, leaving him to get a bit of dinner and to dress for the concert, he took the singer's music and hurried to the home of Mr. Riggs, so that the accompanist might look over the score. As soon as Campanari was ready he hurried to Mr. Riggs' home and they began their rehearsal. The singer had great fear that the accompanist might not be equal to the tremendous difficulties of the piano part to the songs, but Mr. Riggs had not played very long until Campanari enthusiastically threw his arms around him and said, "Splendid! I would like to take you with me to New York."

When the two came before the audience Campanari watched the pianist for a time, and then, realizing that Mr. Riggs was equal to his task, he resigned himself to his singing. A specially difficult piece of Mr. Riggs' work was in the final number of the evening, when Campanari sang a "Tarantella" by Rossini. The whirlwind accompaniment was in manuscript, and with no voice part written in which might guide the accompanist. Had the audience known what was going on between the two, it would have made even a greater demonstration, if that were possible.

Literary Notes

THE DESIGNER FOR NOVEMBER.

In The Designer for November is to be found, in addition to the many designs for winter apparel for ladies and young folks, a special article, "For Those Who Wear Mourning"; another on "Riding Habits" and still a third on "Fashionable Furs"; all beautifully illustrated. "The Outdoor Baby in Winter" will please not only the mothers, but the children and "Leather Treatment for the Library" offers novel suggestions for the use of the pyrographic needle. There are three capital Thanksgiving stories, and some excellent bits of Thanksgiving verse. Lessons in sewing, millinery, lace-work, embroidery and knitting are given, and there are two pages filled with designs for home-made Christmas gifts. "Fashions and Fabrics," "Fashionable Frivolities," "Toilet-Table Chat," "Etiquette Hints" and "Floriculture Talks" are among the many other good things supplied by authentic specialty writers, while the departments edited by The Designer readers — "What Women are Doing," "Helps Along the Way," and "The Mothers' Advisory Club" are fairly tingling with lively personal interest.

GOOD INTENTIONS.

(Chicago News.)

He meant quite well
When he tried to rock the boat,
Though the other people told him he ought not to get the goat,
It was strange he didn't float,
But he sunk right where he fell
And those others were not sorry, though he meant quite well.

He meant quite well
When he went into the cage
To subdue the forest monarchs, but they flew into a rage,
It may be they took his gauge,
For they simply wouldn't quell,
There was nothing left to bury, but he meant quite well.

He meant quite well
When he butted in the strife,
For he choked the brutal husband who was beating up his wife,
Was he slugged? You bet your life,
His fate's too sad to tell,
For the two combined their forces,
though he meant quite well.

He meant quite well
But he didn't own the horse,
It was purely accidental: he believed
he did, of course,
He was full of keen remorse,
But they threw him in a cell
And just now he's picking oakum,
though he meant quite well.

Oh, they mean quite well;
They are guiltless of offence,
But the trouble is they never seem to have a lick of sense:
Yes, their intellects are dense—
And their numbers we may swell
If we're not a little careful, though we mean quite well.

District Attorney Jerome, of New York, tells of a certain citizen whom he encountered on the last Presidential election day. Conversation was somewhat hampered by the fact that the citizen's vocabulary was limited to about eighty words. "Who" and "what" were evidently one to him as yet, but he made himself clear on one point.

"How long have you been in this country?" he was asked.

"Ah hane one month," he answered.

"Are you going to vote?"

"Yah."

"Whom are you going to vote for?"

"Ah hane goin vote for tan dollars," was the self-satisfied response.

Here is how a writer in the London Daily Mail deals with the problem of existence; "In novels, romances, scientific reports, and similar documents we have all come across the story of the man who, on waking up, forgets his name and wanders out into the streets without any identity. He can exercise an ordinary intelligence; he can perform all ordinary functions, but he cannot remember who he is. I am in this position. But then, as it is a comfort to me to reflect, so are you. Every human being has forgotten who he is and where he came from. We are all blasted with one great obliteration of memory. We none of us saw ourselves born; and if we had, it would not have cleared up the mystery. Parents are a delight; but they are not an explanation. The one thing that no man, however learned, can ever know, is his own name. It is easier to comprehend the cosmos than to comprehend the ego; it is easier even to know where you are than to know who you are. We have forgotten our own meaning, and we are all wandering about the streets without keepers. All that we call common sense and practically all worldly wisdom only means that we forget that we have forgotten. All that we mean by religion and poetry only means that for one wild moment we remember that we forget."

The heavy loss of life in the riot at Buckingham, Que., emphasizes the danger of the growing practice of carrying and using firearms in Canada. There is no excuse for the practice, as the laws are fair and justly administered between man and man. If we are to prevent a repetition of the shooting and bloodshed which disgrace most of the large strikes in the United States, we must insist that every man found carrying firearms or knives, during times of excitement, be dealt with in the severest manner. When the matter cannot be adjusted with fists and sticks it had better be left for legal adjustment, rather than that our Canadian reputation as a law-abiding race be brought into question.

ALL HOPE ABANDONED.

Crew of Sunken Submarine, Lutin, Are Likely Dead.

Paris, Oct. 19.—In spite of the fact that it was announced from Bizerta yesterday morning that the spot where the submarine boat Lutin sank on Tuesday had been definitely ascertained, all hope of rescuing her crew alive has been practically abandoned at the Ministry of Marine.

The Ministry of Marine is coming in for a lot of criticism owing to its failure properly to equip the Bizerta naval station with salving apparatus.

The British Admiralty has sent a warm message of sympathy to the Ministry of Marine in connection with the loss of the Lutin.

It was established yesterday that the crew of the Lutin consisted of two officers and fourteen men.

The British battleship Implacable, the armored cruiser Carnarvon and the torpedo boat destroyer Albatross have arrived from Malta to assist in raising the Lutin.

MARKING TRUNKS.

Odd Devices Used by Which to Easily Identify Baggage.

A curious fashion of marking trunks by some individual and odd device has come into practice. It is a trick that helps to identify one's baggage instantly, even at a distance, in a crowded railway station, and thus facilitates travel, especially abroad, where so much red tape entangles baggage transportation.

Some of the devices used are queer, to say the least. A lover of dogs had big brindle's heads in brown and white painted at intervals on all her trunks and suit cases before sailing for Germany. She felt sure, she said, that she would be able to identify her baggage anywhere by these signs.

Another curious design is that of skull and crossbones, done in black, white and red, on top, sides and ends of trunk and on the bottom of every bag of one traveler.

Dumbbell designs in red, white and blue identify another lot of baggage.

One society woman has her trunks all marked with a design of a pair of gloves, painted red, black and gold, and appearing as if just taken off the hand and carelessly tossed in the trunk.

Family crests in gold and colors are used, and college girls going abroad have curious Chinese dragons, birds, etc., done in oriental color combinations on their baggage.

TORONTO LIVE STOCK.

Toronto, Oct. 18.—Receipts of live stock at the city market since Tuesday, as reported by the railways, were 157 car loads, consisting of 2497 cattle, 2840 hogs, 3292 sheep and lambs, 110 calves and one horse. Besides the above there were 1390 hogs, or at least 14 car loads, that were shipped direct to other firms besides those on the market.

Exporters.

There were a few loads, three or four, averaging 1100 to 1270 lbs., that were brought in as exporters that were sold for short-keep feeders at less than $4.25 per cwt., amongst which there were some fine steers. A few export bulls sold at $3.65 to $4. The export trade is practically dead on this market.

Butchers.

Trade in butchers' cattle was brisk, but owing to the heavy run prices declined, as stated above. The best butchers sold at $4.12½ to $4.50; loads of fairly good sold at $3.65 to $3.90; medium light, $3.12½ to $3.00; good cows, $3.25 to $3.60; common cows, $2.25 to $2.80; canners, $1 to $2 per cwt.

Feeders and Stockers.

Trade in stockers and feeders was brisk, especially for the best grades. Harry Murby, who has handled several hundred this week, reports prices as follows: Best short-keeps, 1100 to 1200 lbs. each, at $4 to $4.25; best feeders, 950 to 1050 lbs., at $3.60 to $3.80; best feeders, 800 to 900 lbs., at $3.25 to $3.60; best stockers, 600 to 800 lbs., at $3 to $3.25; common stockers, 500 to 800 lbs., at $2.12½ to $2.90.

Milch Cows.

There were from 40 to 50 milch cows on sale, amongst which there were a few of choice quality. Prices ranged from $30 to $60 each.

Veal Calves.

There are too many heavy calves being offered, at least some farmers are making a mistake in keeping them until they weigh 400 or 500 lbs. each, when they ought to have sold them when they weighed 175 to 225 lbs. each, which are the popular weights. Prices ranged from $3 to $6.50, with an occasional prime milk-fed calf at $7 per cwt.

Sheep and Lambs.

Notwithstanding the heavy run of sheep and lambs there was a brisk market at easier prices for lambs. Export ewes, $4.25 to $4.75, but the bulk sold from $4.25 to $4.50 per cwt.; bucks, $3 to $3.50; lambs, $5 to $6 per cwt.

Hogs.

Deliveries were the largest for some time and prices declined 25c per cwt. Mr. Harris quotes selects at $6.40, with lights and fats at $6.15 per cwt.

drive she paused and called Steel softly by name. To her intense relief he came from the shadow.

"I am here," he cried. "Do you want me?"

"Yes, yes," Enid panted. "Never more were your services needed. My sister is dying; my sister must—die. And Hatherly Bell is with her, and—— you understand?"

"Yes," said David. A vivid flash of understanding had come to him. "Bell shall do as I tell him. Come along."

"Hold him up, dear doggies," Enid murmured. "Hold him up and I'll love both of you for ever."

CHAPTER XV.

David Steel followed his guide with the feelings of the man who has given himself over to circumstances. There was a savour of nightmare about the whole thing that appealed distinctly to his imagination. The darkness, the strange situation, the vivid streaks of the crimson blinds—the crimson blind that seemed an integral part of the mystery—all served to stimulate him. The tragic note was deepened by the whine and howling of the dogs.

"There is a man over there," David whispered.

"A man who is going to stay there," Enid said, with grim satisfaction. "It is virtually necessary that Mr. Reginald Henson should not be disturbed. The dogs have a foolish weakness for his society. So long as he shows no signs of boredom he is safe."

David smiled with a vague grasp of the situation. Apparently the cue was to be surprised at nothing that he saw about the House of the Silent Sorrow. The name of Reginald Henson was more or less familiar to him as that of a man who stood high in public estimation. But the bitter contempt in his companion's voice suggested that there was another side to the man's character.

"I hope you are not asking me to do anything wrong," David murmured.

"I am absolutely certain of it," the girl said. "It is a case of the end justifying the means; and if ever the end justified the means, it does in this case. Besides——"

Enid Henson hesitated. David's quick perception prompted him.

"Besides, it is my suggestion," he said. "When I had the pleasure of seeing you before——"

"Pardon me, you have never had the pleasure of seeing me before."

"Ah, you would make an excellent Parliamentary fencer. I bow to your correction and admit that I have never seen you before. But your voice reminds me of a voice I heard very recently under remarkable circumstances. It was my good fortune to help a lady in distress a little time back. If she had told me more I might have aided her still further. As it is, her reticence has landed me into serious trouble."

Enid grasped the speaker's arm convulsively.

"I am deeply sorry to hear it," she whispered. "Perhaps the lady in question was reticent for your sake. Perhaps she had confided more thoroughly in good men before. And suppose those good men had disappeared?"

"In other words, that they had been murdered. Who by?"

There was a snarl from one of the hounds hard by, and a deep, angry curse from Henson. Enid pointed solemnly in his direction. No words of hers would have been so thrilling and eloquent. David strode along without further questions on that head.

"But there is one thing that you must tell me," he said, as they stood together in the porch. "Is the first part of my advice going to be carried out?"

"Yes. That is why you are here now. Stay here one moment whilst I get you pencil and paper. . . . There! Now will you please write what I suggest? Dr. Bell is with my sister. At least, I suppose he is with her, as Dr. Walker desired to have his opinion. My sister is dying—dying, you understand?"

Enid's voice had sunk to a passionate whisper. The hand that she laid on David's shoulder was trembling strangely. At that moment he would have done anything for her. A shaft of light filtered from the hall into the porch, and lit up the paper that the girl thrust upon Steel.

"Now write," she commanded. "Ask no questions, but write what I ask, and trust me implicitly."

David nodded. After all, he reflected, he could not possibly get himself into a worse mess than he was in already. And he felt that he could trust the girl by his side. Her beauty, her earnestness, and her obvious sincerity touched him.

"Write," Enid whispered. "Say, 'See nothing and notice nothing, I implore you. Only agree with everything that Dr. Walker says, and leave the room as quickly as possible!' Now sign your name. We can go into the drawing-room and wait till Dr. Bell comes down. You are merely a friend of his. I will see that he has this paper at once."

Enid led the way into the drawing-room. She gave no reasons for the weird strangeness of the place, it was no time for explanations. As for Steel, he gazed around him in fascinated astonishment. A novelist ever on the look-out for new scenes and backgrounds, the aspect of the room fascinated him. He saw the dust rising in clouds, he saw the wilted flowers, he noted the overturned table, obviously untouched and neglected for years, and he wondered. Then he heard the babel of discordant voices overhead. What a sad house it was, and how dominant was the note of tragedy.

Meanwhile, with no suspicion of the path he was treading, Bell had gone upstairs. He came at length to the door of the room where the sick girl lay. There was a subdued light inside and the faint suggestion of illness that clings to the chamber of the sufferer. Bell caught a glimpse of a white figure lying motionless in bed. It was years now since he had acted thus in a professional capacity, but the old quietness and caution came back by instinct. As he would have entered Margaret Henson came out and closed the door.

"You are not going in there," she said. "No, no. Everything of mine you touch you blight and wither. If the girl is to die, let her die in peace."

She would have raised her voice high, but a lightning glance from Bell quieted her. It was not exactly madness that he had to deal with, and he knew it. The woman required firm, quiet treatment. Dr. Walker stood alongside, anxious and nervous. The man with the quiet practice of the well-to-do doctor was not used to scenes of this kind.

"You have something to conceal," Bell said, sternly. "Open the door."

"Really, my dear sir," Walker said, fussily. "Really, I fancy that under the circumstances——"

"You don't understand this kind of case," Bell interrupted. "I do."

Walker dropped aside with a muttered apology. Bell approached the figure in the doorway and whispered a few words rapidly in her ear. The effect was electrical. The figure seemed to wilt and shrivel up, all the power and resistance had gone. She stepped aside, moaning and wringing her hands. She babbled of strange things; the old, far-away look came into her eyes again.

Without a word of comment or sign of triumph Bell entered the sick room. Then he raised his head and sniffed the heavy atmosphere as an eager hound might have done. A quick, sharp question rose to his lips, only to be instantly suppressed as he noted the vacant glance of his colleague.

The white figure on the bed lay perfectly motionless. It was the figure of a young and exceedingly beautiful girl, a beauty heightened and accentuated by the dead-white pallor of her features. Still the face looked resolute and the exquisitely chiselled lips were firm.

"Albumen," Bell muttered. "What fiend's game is this? I wonder if that scoundrel—but, no. In that case there would be no object in concealing my presence here. I wonder——"

He paused and touched the pure white brow with his fingers. At the same moment Enid came into the room. She panted like one who has run fast and far.

"Well," she whispered, "is she better, better or—Hatherly, read this."

The last words were so low that Bell hardly heard them. He shot a swift glance at his colleague before he opened the paper. One look and he had mastered the contents. Then the swift glance was directed from Walker to the girl standing there looking at Bell with a world of passionate entreaty and longing in her eyes.

"It is your sister who lies there," Bell whispered meaningly, "and yet you——"

He paused, and Enid nodded. There was evidently a great struggle going on in Bell's mind. He was grappling with something that he only partially understood, but he did know perfectly well that he was being asked to do something wrong and that he was going to yield for the sake of the girl he loved.

He rose abruptly from the bedside and crossed over to Walker.

"You are perfectly correct," he said. "At this rate—at this rate the patient cannot possibly last till the morning. It is quite hopeless."

Walker smiled feebly.

"It is melancholy satisfaction to have my opinion confirmed," he said. "Miss Henson, if you will get Williams to see me as far as the lodge-gates . . . . it is so late that—er——"

Williams came at length, and the little doctor departed. Enid fairly cowered before the blazing, searching look that Bell turned upon her. She fell to plucking the bedclothes nervously.

"What does it mean?" he asked, hoarsely. "What fiend's plaything are you meddling with? Don't you know that if that girl dies it will be murder? It was only for your sake that I didn't speak my mind before the fool who has just gone. He has seen murder done under his eyes for days, and he is ready to give a certificate of the cause of death. And the strange thing is that in the ordinary way he would be quite justified in doing so."

"Chris is not going to die; at least, not in that way," Enid whispered, hoarsely.

"Then leave her alone. No more drugs; no medicine even. Give Nature a chance. Thank Heaven, the girl has a perfect constitution."

"Chris is not going to die," Enid repeated, doggedly, "but the certificate will be given, all the same. Oh, Hatherly you must trust me—trust me as you have never done before. Look at me, study me. Did you ever know me to do a mean or dishonorable thing?"

They were down in the drawing-room again; David waiting, with a strange sense of embarrassment under Margaret Henson's distant eyes; indeed, it was probable that she had never noticed him at all. All the same she turned eagerly to Bell.

"Tell me the worst," she cried. "Tell me all there is to know."

"Your niece's sufferings are over," Bell said, gravely; "I have no more to tell you."

A profound silence followed, broken presently by angry voices outside. Then Williams looked in at the door and beckoned Enid to him. His face was wreathed in an uneasy grin.

"Mr. Henson has got away," he said. "Blest if I can say how. And the dogs have rolled him about, and tore his clothes, and made such a picture of him as you never saw. And a sweet temper he's in!"

"Where is he now?" Enid asked. "There are people here he must not see."

"Well, he came back in through the study window, swearing dreadful for so respectable a gentleman. And he went right up to his room, after ordering whisky and soda-water."

Enid flew back to the drawing-room. Not a moment was to be lost. At any hazard Reginald Henson must be kept in ignorance of the presence of strangers. A minute later, and the darkness of the night had swallowed them up. Williams fastened the lodge-gates behind them, and they turned their faces in the direction of Rottingdean Road.

"A strange night's work," David said, presently.

"Aye, but pregnant with result," Bell answered. There was a stern, exulting ring in his voice. "There is much to do and much danger to be faced; but we are on the right track at last. But why did you send me that note just now?"

David smiled as he lighted a cigarette.

"It is part of the scheme," he said. "Part of my scheme, you understand. But, principally, I sent you the note because Miss Enid asked me to."

CHAPTER XVI.

With a sigh of unutterable relief Enid heard Williams returning. Reginald Henson had not come down yet, and the rest of the servants had retired some time. Williams came up with a request as to whether he could do anything before he went to bed.

"Just one thing," said Enid. "The good dogs have done their work well to-night, but they have not quite finished. Find Rollo for me, and bring him here quick. Then you can shut up the house, and I will see that Mr. Henson is made comfortable after his fright."

The big dog came presently and followed Enid timidly upstairs. Apparently the great black-muzzled brute had been there before, as evidently he knew he was doing wrong. He crawled along the corridor till he came to the room where the sick girl lay, and here he followed Enid. The lamp was turned down low as Enid glanced at the bed. Then she smiled faintly, yet hopefully.

There was nobody in the room. The patient's bed was empty!

"It works well," Enid murmured. "May it go on as it has been started. Lie down, Rollo; lie there, good dog. And if anybody comes in tear him to pieces."

The great brute crouched down obediently, thumping his tail on the floor as an indication that he understood. As if a load had been taken from her mind Enid crept down the stairs. She had hardly reached the hall before Henson followed her. His big face was white with passion; he was trembling from head to foot from fright and pain. There was a red rash on his forehead that by no means tended to improve his appearance.

"What is the meaning of this?" he demanded, hoarsely.

Enid looked at him coolly. She could afford to do so now. All the danger was past, and she felt certain that the events of the evening were unknown to him.

"I might ask you the same question," she said. "You look white and shaken; you might have been thrown violently into a heap of stones. But please don't make a noise. It is not fitting now. Chris——"

Enid hesitated: the prevarication did not come so easily as she had expected.

"Chris has gone," she said. "She passed away an hour ago."

Henson muttered something that sounded like consolation. He could be polite and suave enough on occasions, but not to-night. Even philanthropists are selfish at times. Moreover, his nerves were badly shaken and he wanted a stimulant badly.

"I am going to bed," Enid said, wearily. "Good-night."

She went noiselessly upstairs, and Henson passed into the library. He was puzzled over this sudden end of Christiana Henson. He was half inclined to believe that she was not dead at all; he belonged to the class of men who believe nothing without proof. Well, he could easily ascertain that for himself. There would be quite time enough in the morning.

For a long time Henson sat there thinking and smoking, as was his usual custom. Like other great men, he had his worries and troubles, and that they were mainly of his own making did not render them any lighter. So long as Margaret Henson was under the pressure of his thumb, money was no great object. But there were other situations where money was utterly powerless.

Henson was about to give it up as a bad job, for to-night at any rate. He wondered bitterly what his admirers would say if they knew everything. He wondered—what was that?

Somebody creeping about the house, somebody talking in soft, though distinct, whispers. His quick ears detected that sound instantly. He slipped into the hall; Margaret Henson was there, with the remains of what had once been a magnificent opera-cloak over her shoulders.

"How you startled me!" Henson said, irritably. "Why don't you go to bed?"

Enid, looking over the balustrade from the landing, wondered so also, but she kept herself prudently hidden. The first words that she heard drove all the blood from her heart.

"I cannot," the feeble, moaning voice said. "The house is full of ghosts; they haunt and follow me everywhere. And Chris is dead, and I have seen her spirit."

"So I'm told," Henson said, with brutal callousness. "What was the ghost like?"

"Like Chris. All pale and white, with a frightened look on her face. And she was all dressed in white, too, with a cloak about her shoulders. And just when I was going to speak to her she turned and disappeared into Enid's bedroom. And there are other ghosts——"

"One at a time, please," Henson said, grimly. "So Christiana's ghost passed into her sister's bedroom. You come and sit quietly in the library whilst I investigate matters."

Margaret Henson complied in her dull, mechanical way, and Enid flew like a flash of light to her room. Another girl was there—a girl exceedingly like her, but looking wonderfully pale and drawn.

"That fiend suspects," Enid said. "How unfortunate it was that you should meet aunt like that. Chris, you must go back again. Fly to your own room and compose yourself. Only let him see you lying white and still there, and he must be satisfied."

Chris rose with a shudder.

"And if the wretch offers to touch me," she moaned. "If he does——"

"He will not. He dare not. Heaven help him if he tries any experiment of that kind. If he does, Rollo will kill him to a certainty."

"Ah, I had forgotten the faithful dog. Those dogs are more useful to us than a score of men. I will step by the back way and through my dressing-room. Oh, Enid, how glad I shall be to find myself outside the walls of this dreadful house!"

She flew along the corridor and gained her room in safety. It was an instant's work to throw off her cloak and compose herself rigidly under the single white sheet. But though she lay still her heart was beating to suffocation as she heard the creak and thud of a heavy step coming up the stairs. Then the door was opened in a stealthy way and Henson came in. He could see the outline of the white figure, and a sigh of satisfaction escaped him. A less suspicious man would have retired at once; a man less engaged upon his task would have seen two great amber eyes close to the floor.

"An old woman's fancy," he muttered. "Still, as I am here, I'll make sure that——"

He stretched out his hand to touch the marble forehead, there was a snarl and a gurgle, and Henson came to the ground with a hideous crash that carried him staggering beyond the door into the corridor. Rollo had the intruder by the throat; a thousand crimson and blue stars danced before the wretched man's eyes; he grappled with his foe with one last despairing effort, and then there came over him a vague, warm unconsciousness. When he came to himself he was lying on his bed, with Williams and Enid bending over him.

"How did it happen?" Enid asked, with simulated anxiety.

"I—I was walking along the corridor," Henson gasped, "going—going to bed, you see; and one of those diabolical dogs must have got into the house. Before I knew what I was doing the creature flew at my throat and dragged me to the floor. Telephone for Walker at once. I am dying, Williams."

He fell back once more utterly lost to his surroundings. There was a great, gaping, raw wound at the side of the throat that caused Enid to shudder.

"Do you think he is—dead, Williams?" she asked.

"No such luck as that," Williams said, with the air of a confirmed pessimist. "I hope you locked that there bedroom door and put the key in your pocket, miss. I suppose we'd better send for the doctor, unless you and me puts him out of his misery. There's one comfort, however, Mr. Henson will be in bed for the next fortnight, at any rate, so he'll be powerless to do any prying about the house. The funeral will be over long before he's about again."

* * * * * * *

The first grey streaks of dawn were in the air as Enid stood outside the lodge-gates. She was not alone, for a neat figure in grey, marvellously like her, was by her side. The figure in grey was dressed for traveling and she carried a bag in her hand.

"Good-bye, dear, and good luck to you," she said. "It is dangerous to delay."

"You have absolutely everything that you require?" Enid asked.

"Everything. By the time you are at breakfast I shall be in London. And once I am there the search for the secret will begin in earnest."

"You are sure that Reginald Henson suspected nothing?"

"I am perfectly certain that he was satisfied; indeed, I heard him say so. Still, if it had not been for the dogs! We are going to succeed, Enid, something at my heart tells me so. See how the sun shines on your face and in your dear eyes. Au revoir, an omen—an omen of a glorious future."

CHAPTER XVII.

Steel lay sleepily back in the cab, not quite sure whether his cigarette was alight or not. They were well into the main road again before Bell spoke.

"It is pretty evident that you and I are on the same track," he said.

"I am certain that I am on the right one," David replied; "but, when I come to consider the thing calmly, it seems more by good luck than anything else. I came out with you to-night seeking adventure, and I am bound to admit [illegible] Also I found the lady who interviewed me in the darkness, which is more to the point."

"As a matter of fact, you did nothing of the kind," said Bell, with a suggestion of a laugh.

"Oh! Case of the wrong room over again. I was ready to swear it. Whom did I speak to? Whose voice was it that was so very much like hers?"

"The lady's sister. Enid Henson was not at 218, Brunswick Square, on the night in question. Of that you may be certain. But it's a queer business altogether. Rascality I can understand. I am beginning to comprehend the plot of which I am the victim. But I don't mind admitting that up to the present I fail to comprehend why those girls evolved the grotesque scheme for getting assistance at your hands. The whole thing savours of madness."

"I don't think so," David said, thoughtfully. "The girls are romantic as well as clever. They are bound together by the common ties of a common enmity towards a cunning and utterly unscrupulous scoundrel. By the merest accident in the world they discovered that I am in a position to afford them valuable advice and assistance. At the same time they don't want me to be brought into the business, for two reasons—the first, because the family secret is a sacred one; the second, because any disclosures would land me in great physical danger. Therefore they put their heads together and evolve this scheme. Call it a mad venture if you like, but if you consider the history of your own country you can find wilder schemes evolved and carried out by men who have had brains enough to be trusted with the fortunes of the nation. If these girls had been less considerate for my safety——"

"But," Bell broke in eagerly, "they failed in that respect at the very outset. You must have been spotted instantly by the foe, who has cunningly placed you in a dangerous position, perhaps as a warning to mind your own business in future. And if those girls come forward to save you—and to do so they must appear in public, mind you—they are bound to give away the whole thing. Mark the beautiful cunning of it. My word, we have a foe worthy of our steel to meet."

"We? Do you mean to say that your enemy and mine is a common one?"

"Certainly. When I found my foe I found yours."

"And who may he be, by the same token?"

"Reginald Henson. Mind you, I had no more idea of it than the dead when I went to Longdean Grange to-night. I went there because I had begun to suspect who occupied the place and to try and ascertain how the Rembrandt engraving got into 218, Brunswick Square. Miss Gates must have heard us talking over the matter, and that was why she went to Longdean Grange to-night."

"I hope she got home safe," said David. "The cabman says he put her down opposite the Lawns."

"I hope so. Well, I found out who the foe was. And I have a pretty good idea why he played that trick upon me. He knew that Enid Henson and myself were engaged; he could see what a danger to his schemes it would be to have a man like myself in the family. Then the second Rembrandt turned up, and there was his chance for wiping me off the slate. After that came the terrible family scandal between Lord Littimer and his wife. I cannot tell you anything of that, because I cannot speak with definite authority. But you could judge of the effect of it on Lady Littimer to-night."

"I haven't the faintest recollection of seeing Lady Littimer to-night."

"My dear fellow, the poor lady whom you met as Mrs. Henson is really Lady Littimer. Henson is her maiden name, and those girls are her nieces. Trouble has turned the poor woman's brain. And at the bottom of the whole mystery is Reginald Henson, who is not only nephew on his mother's side, but is also next heir but one to the Littimer title. At the present moment he is blackmailing that unhappy creature and is manoeuvring to get the whole of her large fortune in his hands. Reginald Henson is the man those girls want to circumvent, and for that reason they came to you. And Henson has found it out to a certain extent and placed you in an awkward position."

"Witness my involuntary guest and the notes and the cigar-case," David said. "But does he know what I advised one of the girls—my princess of the dark room—to do?"

"I don't fancy he does. You see, that advice was conveyed by word of mouth. The girls dared not trust themselves to correspondence, otherwise they might have approached you in a more prosaic manner. But I confess you startled me to-night."

"What do you mean by that?"

"When you sent me that note. What you virtually asked me to do was to countenance murder. When I went into the sick room I saw that Christiana Henson was dying. The first idea that flashed across my mind was that Reginald Henson was getting the girl out of the way for his own purposes. My dear fellow, the whole atmosphere literally spoke of albumen. Walker must have been blind not to see how he was being deceived. I was about to give him my opinion pretty plainly when your note came up to me. And there was Enid, with her whole soul in her large eyes, pleading for my silence. If the girl died I was accessory after and before the fact. You will admit that that was a pretty tight place to put a doctor in."

"That's because you didn't know the facts of the case, my dear Bell."

"Then perhaps you'll be so good as to enlighten me," Bell said, drily.

"Certainly. That was part of my scheme. In that synopsis of the story obtained by the girls by some more or less mechanical means, the reputed death of a patient forms the crux of the tale. The idea occurred to me after reading a charge against a medical student some time ago in the Standard. The man wanted to get himself out of the way; he wanted to be considered as dead, in fact. By the artful use of albumen in certain doses he produced symptoms of disease which will be quite familiar to you. He made himself so ill that his doctor naturally concluded that he was dying. As a matter of fact, he was dying. Had he gone on in the same way another day he would have been dead. Instead of this he drops the dosing and, going to his doctor in disguise, says that he is dead. He gets a certificate of his own demise, and there you are. I am not telling you fiction, but hard facts recorded in a high-class paper. The doctor gave the certificate without viewing the body. Well, it struck me that we had here the making of a good story, and I vaguely outlined it for a certain editor. In my synopsis I suggested that it was a woman who proposed to pretend to die thus so as to lull the suspicions of a villain to sleep, and thus possess herself of certain vital documents. My synopsis falls into certain hands. The owner of those hands asks me how the thing was done. I tell her. In other words, the so-called murder that you imagined you had discovered to-night was the result of design. Walker will give his certificate, Reginald Henson will regard Miss Christiana as dead and buried, and she will be free to act for the honor of the family."

"But they might have employed somebody else."

"Who would have had to be told the history of the family dishonor. So far I fancy I have made the ground quite clear. But the mystery of the cigar-case and the notes and the poor fellow in the hospital is still as much a mystery as ever. We are like two allied forces working together, but at the same time under the disadvantage of working in the dark. You can see, of course, that the awful danger I stand in is as terrible for those poor girls."

"Of course I do. Still, we have a key to your trouble. It is a dreadfully rusty one and will want a deal of oiling before it's used, but there it is."

"Where, my dear fellow, where?" David asked.

"Why, in the Sussex County Hospital, of course. The man may die, in which case everything must be sacrificed in order to save your good name. On the other hand, he may get better, and then he will tell us all about it."

"He might. On the other hand, he might plead ignorance. It is possible for him to suggest that the whole affair was merely a coincidence, so far as he was concerned."

"Yes, but he would have to explain how he burgled your house, and what business he had to get himself half murdered in your conservatory. Let us get out here and walk the rest of the way to your house. Our cabby knows quite enough about us without having definite views as to your address."

The cabman was dismissed with a handsome douceur, and the twain turned off the front at the corner of Eastern Terrace. Late as it was, there were a few people lounging under the hospital wall, where there was a suggestion of activity about the building unusual at that time of the night. A rough-looking fellow, who seemed to have followed Bell and Steel from the front, dropped into a seat by the hospital gates and laid his head back as if utterly worn out. Just inside the gate a man was smoking a cigarette.

"Halloa, Cross," David cried, "you are out late to-night!"

"Heavy night," Cross responded, sleepily, "with half a score of accidents to finish with. Some of Palmer of Lingfield's private patients thrown off a coach and brought here in the ambulance. Unless I am greatly mistaken, that is Hatherly Bell with you."

"The same," Bell said, cheerfully "I recollect you in Edinburgh. So some of Palmer's patients have come to grief. Most of his special cases used to pass through my hands."

"I've got one here to-night who recollects you perfectly well," said Cross. "He's got a dislocated shoulder, but otherwise he is doing well. Got a mania that he's a doctor who murdered a patient."

"Electric light anything to do with the story?" Bell asked, eagerly.

"That's the man. Seems to have a wonderfully brilliant intellect if you can only keep him off that topic. He spotted you in North Street yesterday, and seemed wonderfully disappointed to find you had nothing whatever to do with this institution."

"If he is not asleep," Bell suggested, "and you have no objection——"

Cross nodded and opened the gate. Before passing inside Bell took the rolled-up Rembrandt from his deep breast-pocket and handed it to David.

"Take care of this for me," he whispered. "I'm going inside. I've dropped upon an old case that interested me very much years ago, and I'd like to see my patient again. See you in the morning, I expect. Good-night."

David nodded in reply and went his way. It was intensely quiet and still now; the weary loafer at the outside hospital seat had disappeared. There was nobody to be seen anywhere as David placed his key in the latch and opened the door. Inside the hall-light was burning, and so was the shaded electric lamp in the conservatory. The study leading to the conservatory was in darkness. The effect of the light behind was artistic and pleasing.

It was with a sense of comfort and relief that David fastened the door behind him. Without putting up the light in the study David laid the Rembrandt on his table, which was immediately below the window in his work-room. The night was hot; he pushed the top sash down liberally.

"I must get that transparency removed," he murmured, "and have the window filled with stained glass. The stuff is artistic, but it is so frankly what it assumes to be."

CHAPTER XVIII.

David idly mixed himself some whisky and soda water in the dining-room, where he finished his cigarette. He was tired and ready for bed now, so tired that he could hardly find energy enough to remove his boots and get into the big carpet slippers that were so old and worn. He put down the dining-room lights and strolled into the study. Just for a moment he sat there contemplating with pleased, tired eyes the wilderness of bloom before him.

Then he fell into a reverie, as he frequently did. An idea for a fascinating story crept unbidden into his mind. He gazed vaguely around him. Some little noise outside attracted his attention, the kind of noise made by a sweep's brushes up a chimney. David turned idly towards the open window. The top of it was but faintly illuminated by the light of the conservatory gleaming dully on the transparency over the glass. But David's eyes were keen, and he could see distinctly a man's thumb crooked downwards over the frame of the sash. Somebody had swarmed up the telephone holdfasts and was get-

SPORT IN AMERICA.

The Change That Has Come Since the War Between the States.

Before the civil war we Americans had few outdoor pastimes. There was some fox hunting in the south, some shooting in the north. There was considerable fishing, very little angling. Tennis and golf were unknown to us. Croquet was decorously played. Driving and riding were restricted to the few who could afford the time and expense. One or two cricket elevens struggled for existence. There were no bicycles, no motors, of course, only an absurd velocipede or two. Extreme youth "flew kites," played marbles and whipped tops. Among their elders, however, there was a mincing, artificial attitude toward all outdoor sport which found its fullest expression in a quadrille, at croquet or a sentimental sailing expedition under the calmest of skies.

However, even then we had yachtsmen—naturally corollary of our superb commercial navy—and we had good horses and were breeding better ones, and we by inheritance were a nation of men who handled a rifle properly.

War came and left us with its immense accumulation of good and evil, and it seemed then that out of sheer weariness of sadness and trouble the germ of the old play spirit, so long dormant, awoke among us to save us from ourselves.

Browning's French Grammar.

It is not generally known that Robert Browning was the author of a French grammar. It appears that even the late Dr. Garnett, whose knowledge of literature was encyclopedic, had not heard of this early venture of the poet's. His surprise was therefore great when a reference to the work in question by Browning himself was pointed out to him. It occurs on page 203 of the first volume of Browning's letters to his wife. "Thus in more than one of the reviews and magazines that laughed my 'Paracelsus' to scorn ten years ago—in the same column often of these reviews—would follow a most laudatory notice of an elementary French book, on a new plan, which I 'did' for my old French master and he published it—'that was really a useful work.'"

Could Tell It Another Way.

Many years ago an old and well to do farmer in western New York had something of a reputation as a litigant. He had a peculiar twist about his mouth when he talked, due to some muscular affection, which gave a striking effect to his utterances. His old neighbors tell of a trip that he made to see his lawyers on a certain occasion when he had made up his mind to have a lawsuit. He sat down with his lawyer and laid out his case before him at length. The lawyer said, "Well, on that statement you haven't any case." The old man hitched his trousers nervously, twitched his face and hastily replied, "Well, I can tell it another way."

The Dominion of Canada.

The Dominion of Canada came into existence on July 1, 1667. The province of Canada was divided into upper and lower Canada, which divisions are known now as Ontario and Quebec respectively. It was subsequently augmented by the province of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories in 1870, by British Columbia in 1871 and Prince Edward Island in 1873 and now includes the whole of British North America.

VIBRATION.

Designs In Sand Formed by the Production of Sounds.

Did you ever hear that you can make drawings by sound, or, rather, that the sound vibrations will cause designs to be made with the proper implements at hand? Here is the way to do it:

At a hardware store get a piece of sheet brass one-eighth of an inch thick and six inches square. The sheet should be perfectly flat, or if it is not it should be hammered so and the edges rounded off. In the center of the sheet cut a hole three-sixteenths of an inch in diameter. If the sheet has been hammered it must now be heated in a redhot stove and cooled slowly.

Now cut a six inch piece from a broom handle and fix one end of it firmly in a block of wood. The other end you must round off and screw the plate of brass on it.

If you draw a violin bow over the edge of the brass plate a tone will be sounded. Practice this until the tone is quite clear and strong. Now sprinkle some sand on the plate, and the grains will dance about while the note is sounded, showing that the plate is in vibration.

Now put your finger on the edge of the plate in the middle of one side. At the corner of the side at an angle of forty-five degrees draw the bow, and the sand will form in two lines at right angles, starting from your finger. This is because the plate now vibrates in parts, one part moving up, while the other moves down, and the lines between these parts have no motion. Therefore the sand settles in them.

By drawing the bow at regular distances from the finger or by touching the plate in more than one place at a time while some one else draws the bow a variety of sand figures will be made.

If you will mix a little lycopodium powder with the sand when the plate vibrates it will form curious little heaps and whirlpools, which add to the moving effect of the designs.

Instead of a brass plate you may use one of glass six or eight inches square, and its sharp edges you may smooth down with a file moistened with turpentine.

To prove to yourself that the plate is still or almost so at the sand lines make a cardboard cone about ten inches long, two and a half inches in diameter at its larger end and small enough at the other end to fit into a rubber tube, which should be about two feet long. Let one person cause the plate to vibrate, while another holds the large end of the cone over the plate, applying the rubber tube to the ear. When the middle of the cone is exactly over a sand line scarcely any tone at all will be heard, and the nearer the cone is to the sand line the weaker the sound will be, while it will be clear and strong at the farthest points from the sand lines, proving that the sand falls into lines, and as the parts of the plate move in opposite directions on each side of the sand lines their effect is equalized or destroyed, causing no sound in the air in the cone balance when directly over those lines.

Tragedy In a Moment's Chat.

"How easy it is to lose your friends in this great New York!" the woman was saying. "Yesterday I stood next to a pretty creature I thought I recognized. She turned around and exclaimed at sight of me—I hadn't seen her for years, both of us right in the city all the time:

"'You don't even know what I have been through, do you? I married. Then did you know about my little baby? A girl. Here is her picture.' She opened a locket and showed the pictures of her husband and baby. 'Isn't she a precious little beauty?' She sighed as she shut the locket with a soft click. 'She is dead,' she told me. 'She lived three months.' That was all."

The Statue of Liberty.

The Colossus of Rhodes probably never brought any returns in cash to the city, but its tradition will last when everything else Rhodesian is entirely lost from history. So with this Statue of Liberty. It gives a welcome to every stranger who comes to America to seek his fortune in a country which has been the friend of the oppressed for centuries. It is hailed with joy by every American who catches a glimpse of it as he returns from a sojourn in Europe. Its meaning is more apparent after a short absence from America than perhaps it was before such an experience. It is one of the few things which we have which is not commercialized.

The Wrong Line.

A society which disseminates moral literature once sent a railway manager a large number of free tracts to place in the waiting rooms. One was entitled, "A Route to the New Jerusalem." The letter which the moral literature society received in reply declined the tracts. "We cannot place the tracts," wrote the manager, "as the N. J. is not on our system."

Quite a Variety.

The fashionable girl had accepted him and the young man was wondering how far his $30 a week would go.

"You must remember that life is not all golf and tennis," murmured he.

"Why, of course it isn't," she responded brightly. "There's boating and coaching and bridge and ever so many things."

At the Doctors' Club.

"Carvus, was that operation you performed on old Hunks successful?"

"Successful? Yes; singularly so."

"Singularly? Then he's recovering, is he?"

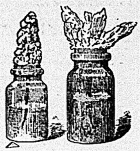
FOR YOUNG FOLKS

ARTIFICIAL SNOW.

A Simple Experiment With Sulphuret of Carbon.

A very beautiful and interesting effect may be obtained by a simple experiment with sulphuret of carbon. This is a colorless liquid formed by the union of sulphur and carbon. It should be handled with extreme caution, as it is highly inflammable. To produce the effect shown in the illustration, you have but to fill a small flask with sulphuret of carbon. Pierce a hole through the center of the cork stopper. Roll up finely a piece of white paper and pass it through the hole in the cork until the lower end touches the bottom of the flask. The upper end should project somewhat above the cork and be cut into narrow strips like a fringe, each strip being made to stand out well from the rest. Let the apparatus stand, and at the end of fifteen minutes you will find the cut paper covered with little particles of snow.



ARTIFICIAL SNOW FORMATION.

The liquid has mounted in the paper by capillary action. Coming in contact with the air, its rapid evaporation causes such a sudden drop in the temperature of the air immediately surrounding it that the moisture contained in the atmosphere congeals and appears in the form of snow. This experiment may be successfully tried in midsummer and in full sunshine. It is advisable, however, owing to the powerful and disagreeable odor of the liquid employed, to conduct the operation out of doors or on a window sill.

THE FLOWERS.

A Message the Wind, Blowing Over the Garden, Brought Them.

The flowers got into a debate one morning as to which of them was the flower of God, and the rose said, "I am the flower of God, for I am the fairest and the most perfect in beauty and variety of form and delicacy of fragrance of all flowers."

And the crocus said: "No, you are not the flower of God. Why, I was blooming long before you bloomed. I am the primitive flower. I am the first one."

And the lily of the valley said modestly: "I am small, but I am white. Perhaps I am the flower of God."

And the trailing arbutus said: "Before any of you came forth I was blooming under the leaves and under the snow. Am I not the flower of God?"

But all the flowers cried out: "No, you are no flower at all. You are a come outer."

Then God's wind, blowing over the garden, brought this message to them: "Little flowers, do you not know that every flower that answers God's sweet spring call and comes out of the cold, dark earth and lifts its head above the sod and blooms forth, catching the sunlight and flinging it back to men, taking the sweet south wind from God and giving it back to others in sweet and blessed and health giving fragrance, do you know they are all God's flowers?"—Lyman Abbot.

Just Like a Story.

Byssus, of which fine, iridescent stockings and shawls are made in Sicily, is a silk made by a fish. The puina is a Mediterranean shellfish that has an odd little tube at the end of its tongue. Out of this tube, spider fashion, or silkworm fashion, it spins a silk thread with which it fastens itself to any rock that it wishes to adhere to. When the puina moves on its fastenings, its silken cable remains behind. This cable, which is called byssus, the Sicilian fishermen gather. Byssus weaves into the softest, finest, sheeniest of fabrics, but it is very rare and expensive.—Popular Science Siftings.

Cork Toys.

Curious toys may be made of cork. One of these is the well known little tumbler such as is generally constructed of pith. But cork, especially if it be hollowed, will answer the purpose quite as well. Make the puppet of three or four corks, shape and paint it as skillfully as you can and glue to the feet or under them little hemispheres of lead. When thrown into any position the figure of course rights itself and, like a cat, always falls on its feet. It is quite possible to make a cat of pith or of cork too.

The Careless Doll.

I took my dolly for a walk. Before we reached the gate
She kicked one little slipper off, and soon she lost the mate.

I took my dolly for a ride; it was a windy day.
She broke her pretty parasol; her bonnet flew away.

I took my dolly for a sail, and what did dolly do
But drop her necklace overboard—it was her best one too!

And then, the more I scolded her the more she smiled and smiled.
Now, would you take her out again—she's such a naughty child?

Cats.

A man of cats declares it is the worst of luck for a pet black cat to forsake your home. A woman of cats asserts it is the best of luck. In the middle ages Satan's favorite form was a black cat. Witches always have a cat as their familiar—a stray black pussy in preference. If a white cat races across your yard a child is going to die. If a stray cat of any color takes up with you, making your house its home, you will have good luck. Napoleon Bonaparte showed a morbid horror of cats. The night before the battle of Waterloo a black cat passed near him, and at the sight the great warrior was completely unnerved. He saw an omen of defeat. Henry III. of France swooned whenever he saw a cat, and one of the Ferdinands of Germany would tremble in his boots if a harmless tabby got in the line of his vision. Among the Romans cat was a symbol of liberty. The Egyptians held the animal in veneration under the name of Aelurus, a deity with a human body and a cat's head. Whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was put to death. Diana assumed the form of a cat and excited the fury of the giants.

Yellowtail Fishing.

There are no "between rounds," no breathing spells, with the yellowtail. He is fighting for his life desperately, no quarter given nor asked, with an amazing staying power akin to that marvelous faculty of the leaping tuna. The angler is far more likely to be the first one exhausted; the inches of line gradually granted to the "pumping" rod are earned by the sweat of his brow and the semiparalysis of the biceps.

"Have I got a fish or a devil?" exclaimed a weary Englishman after a half hour's work, with Sir Yellowtail still gamboling at the end of 200 feet of line. And many have shared his astonishment while "catching" these animated galvanic batteries.

That man has lived and lived intensely to whose bending rod a half dozen lusty yellowtail have capitulated in a bright afternoon. May his remaining history be ever so humdrum or prosaic, that crisp encounter will illuminate the dullest moments.—F. L. Harding in Field and Stream.

Brazil's Jungles.

The jungles of Central America and Brazil are masses of vegetation so dense that it is practically impossible to penetrate them. Swain and his party when crossing the Isthmus of Darien labored hard with their hatchets and machetes the whole of one day and achieved but half a mile. In many parts of Central America the undergrowth renews itself so rapidly that it is almost impossible to keep a road open through it. In one instance in Honduras a road sixteen feet wide was made by engineers and laborers through a jungle, the underbrush and vines being cut away even with the ground. Two weeks later, returning to complete the work by laying stones on the roadbed, they could not find the road, the vines having completely filled the vacant space.

As Seen From a Balloon.

Sense of danger you have of course none, for you are so aghast at the dangers run by your dear ones below from motors and bicycles and trains and gas works and all the other things terrestrial that all concern for your own safety goes. And the shocking air they breathe and the horrid little wormlike trains that burrow in and out of dark looking holes—how unhealthy the whole earthly existence seems to you as you glide motionless through the air, with white clouds below you stretched out as a sort of silver carpet at your feet and above you nothing but a limitless expanse of deep blue sky!—Bystander.

Velvet.

Velvet is manufactured by placing in the loom rows of very short threads of the material designed to be employed, whether cotton or silk. These are then caught up by the cross threads in the weaving and fastened in such a way that the fleecy ends present themselves all on one side of the fabric. The manufacture of velvet is so slow that for a hand weaver a yard is considered a good day's work. The machine made velvet is of course turned out much more rapidly.

Corrected.

"No," remarked the man who had traveled and had returned to the place of his birth, "the village is not what it used to be. Many of the old landmarks have vanished."

"What landmarks?" asked the native resentfully.

"Why, the town pump, for instance."

"Call that a landmark? I call it a water mark!"

Parental Influence.

"Sir," said the young man, "I trust you will object to my marriage with your daughter?"

"Why so?" queried the astonished parent.

"Because," explained the young man, "if you do I think she will consent to have me."

What She Said.

Jack—I thought you were very attentive to Miss Banker. Tom—I was, but after what she said I shall have nothing more to do with her. Jack—What did she say? Tom—She said "No."

Heliotrope.

The name of the heliotrope comes from two Greek words signifying "twining toward the sun." It has long been a belief that the flower of the heliotrope turns, with the advancing day, so as to face the sun. In some species of this plant this curious practice is noticed.

Swamp Mosquitoes.

The mosquitoes found in swamps and damp woods are generally more brilliantly colored than those varieties which frequent human habitations.

Snow White Cattle.

The breed of snow white cattle which were used in the sacrifices in Athens and Rome from 2,000 to 2,500 years ago is still in existence in Calabria. Great pains are taken to maintain the strain of blood in all its purity, and calves showing a single hair of any other color than white are at once separated from the herd.

Sherring of Marathon

TELLS HOW ZAM-BUK HELPED HIM.

Wm. Sherring, of Hamilton, the world-famed winner of the Marathon race, the proud son of Canada, who, side by side with the Crown Prince Constantine (who ran the finishing portion with him), came first to the Stadium at Athens in the great race, has since his return told how Zam-Buk, the great herbal balm, helped him bring the honor to Canada. Speaking to a Hamilton Herald representative, he said:

"While training for my great Marathon race at Athens, I used Zam-Buk, and it proved a great boon to me. I have used it both as an embrocation and as a salve for chafing sores, bruises caused by stepping on to stones while running in light shoes, and other bruises, and have found it the best salve and ointment I have ever tried. Its healing powers are exceptional, and for general household use it should be a wonderfully fine curative. I have pleasure in expressing my appreciation of its value."

Sherring is undoubtedly right, for as a household balm Zam-Buk has no equal. Zam-Buk is to be regarded as much a skin food as a medicine. When skin disease, such as eczema, ulcers, abscesses, running sores, etc., occur, the skin needs increased vigor to overcome the evil. Zam-Buk provides it. When you sustain a cut, a burn or a bruise the surrounding tissue has to do extra work to overcome the damage. Zam-Buk helps it. Ever since the dawn of creation vegetable essences and extracts have been the proper sources of human medicine, and in Zam-Buk is found a blending of the finest herbal extracts it is possible to obtain.

Sufferers from any of the above mentioned skin diseases should give Zam-Buk a thorough trial. This unique balm is also a cure for chapped hands, chilblains, sore nipples, eczema, eruptions, itching, scalding sores, etc. It eases the pain and itching of piles, and stops the bleeding. For skin rashes, ringworm or scalp sores in children it is an effective remedy, and for all purposes to which a household balm may be put is unequalled. All druggists sell it at 50c a box or post free from the Zam-Buk Company, Toronto, on receipt of price (6 boxes for $2.50). Write for free sample box, sending one-cent stamp to pay return postage.

Patriarchs Spent A Pleasant Evening.

GRAND PATRIARCH POWLEY VISITS BELLEVILLE, AND RECEIVES A WARM AND FRATERNAL WELCOME.

On Wednesday evening, Mr. J. Powley, of Toronto, Grand Patriarch of the Patriarchal branch of Oddfellowship, paid an official visit to Quinte and Moira Encampments, in this city. The gathering was held in Mizpah Lodge room, and was well attended by the members of this branch of the order in Belleville.

After business had been concluded at the lodge room an adjournment was made to the assembly room of Belleville Lodge, No. 81, I. O. O. F., where a repast was partaken of. The spread was provided by Bro. H. Jones and was all that could have been desired. Patriarch R. H. Ketcheson occupied the chair, and the guest of the evening sat at his right, Past Grand Patriarch Bro. L. B. Cooper, and D.D.G.P. Bro. W. Bowen also had seats of honor.

At the conclusion of the repast a short toast list was carried out and the addresses by the various speakers were upon the lines of the Patriarchal work and the benefit derived by being connected with it. The toast list and those who responded to the same were as follows:

"The King" — The National Anthem, by the company.

"Grand Encampment" — Responded to by Grand Patriarch Powley and D.D.G.P. Bowen. The former spoke at some length, detailing more particularly the social side of Encampment work. This had the effect, he said, of bringing the brethren into closer touch with each other. He thought the Grand Encampment might go a step farther in its legislation, and allow subordinate Encampments to set apart some of the funds for the purpose of holding social functions at stated intervals. In concluding he urged upon the members the necessity of doing all in their power to increase the membership of the Encampments.

"Grand Lodge" — Responded to by Bro. S. Barclay.

"Sovereign Grand Lodge" — This toast was most appropriately responded to by Past Grand Patriarch Cooper and Bro. Capt. F. M. Clarke. The former referred to the recent session of the Sovereign Grand Lodge, held in Toronto, which proved to be such a successful affair. He was proud of the fact that he was the only Canadian appointed on Gen. Rannie's staff during the session. He was impressed with the militant end of the great parade held there, and paid a compliment to Belleville Canton which took part.

"Subordinate Lodges and Subordinate Encampments" — Responded to by Bros. O. S. Hicks and W. Kelley

"The Ladies" — Responded to by Bros. C. Boyle and T. W. Byam.

"The Press" — Responded to by P. Harrison.

"The Chairman" was proposed by Bro. Clarke and responded to by Bro. R. H. Katcheson.

The singing of the National Anthem brought the pleasant gathering to a close at a seasonable hour.

Hastings County Man Drowned In Quebec.

FATALITY OCCURRED AT THREE RIVERS, P. Q., YESTERDAY.

Mr. John Shannon, a bridge-builder by occupation, and whose home is in the Township of Tyendinaga, yesterday met an untimely death by drowning. The accident, the particulars of which we were unable to learn, occurred during the afternoon at Three Rivers, Quebec. Deceased had been for some three years in the employ of a Toronto bridge building concern and was engaged at his occupation when the accident occurred. Up to a late hour last night the body had not been recovered.

Shannon was 25 years of age, and was born in Tyendinaga, being a son of Mr. Michael Shannon, who resides in the 7th concession. He was unmarried and a fine specimen of manhood. Deceased was very popular with all who knew him, being a general favorite in the neighborhood where he spent his boyhood days. He was a member of the Roman Catholic church.

The only surviving brother, Leo. Shannon, left early this morning for the scene of the accident, and will bring the body home when it is recovered.

The parents and one brother and one sister, who reside at home, are the surviving members of the family.

NO EXORBITANT PROFITS.

Slater Shoes Made and Marketed to Protect the Buyer.

"We want shoes upon which we can place our own profit," said a shoe dealer, who was discontented with the stamped price and fixed profit on the Slater Shoe.

The Slater Shoe system protects the shoe wearer from exacting exorbitant profits; it further enables the maker to make a first-class shoe, and allows the dealer a fair profit. Both price and trade mark are stamped on the real Slater Shoe, and the buyer who is careful to see these cannot be deceived. Slater Shoes at $4, $5 and $6 for men, and at $3.50, $4 and $5 for women are all Goodyear welted and warranted. J. J. Haines, exclusive agent, Belleville.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

FOOTBALL.

Mutes Beat Picked Team.

A football match took place yesterday afternoon on the Institution grounds, between a picked team from the city, and the boys of the Institution. The teams were very evenly matched, but the mutes won out by a score of 2 to 1. The two teams will play again some day next week.

SPORTING NOTES.

Peterboro's Rugby team went to Hamilton yesterday, and got theirs to the tune of 42 to 1. The score in the Peterboro match was 37 to 0, so that the Petes have, in the two games, made 1 while the Tigers made 79. Chris Graham should put his men in strict training for a year and then enter them in a crokinole contest.

Other football results yesterday were: Toronto Varsity 12, Queen's 0; Argonauts 15, Victorias 5; Ottawa Rough Riders 10, Ottawa St. Patrick's 1; McGill 27, Ottawa College 1.

Three road races were run in Canada yesterday. At Hamilton the famous Herald race was won by an Indian, Thomas Longboat, of the Six Nations. He covered the course, 19 miles, 168 yards, in 1.49.25, which is within 42 seconds of the record, made by Sammy Mellor in 1904. Longboat, who is only 19 years of age, stood at 100 to 1 in the betting, which was afterwards cut to 40 to 1. At Montreal the Herald had a road race round the mountain, a distance of 9 2-5 miles. Seventy-six runners started and 66 finished. Tom Shipman, of the Gordon Harriers, won in 59.21. At Peterboro there was a ten-mile road race for prizes given by the Examiner. Seventeen started and four finished, Ray Best, of the Y.M.C.A., winning in 59.50.

LEWIS IN COURT.

Magistrate Refuses Bail—Mr. Kingsford Will Hear Charges.

Toronto, Oct. 19.—Thomas Lewis appeared in the Police Court Wednesday morning to answer to the formal charge preferred against him, of perjury in connection with his testimony in the London bribery investigation. Mr. Robinette urged that, in the indictment brought against Lewis, no specific offence was set forth, and was assured by Mr. Armour, for the crown, that any particulars required would be forthcoming.

The prisoner, who pleaded not guilty, elected to be tried by a jury. On Mr. Robinette's asking for bail, Magistrate Denison replied that, so far as he was concerned he would not allow any. "I'm tired of this continual perjury," he commented.

A remand till Monday was given.

Mr. Venner sues as a stockholder of the Great Northern, claiming to own 300 of its preferred shares.

VAST BILLOWS OF FIRE

Consume Toronto Exhibition Buildings Worth $225,000.

Famous Grand Stand In Ashes—Historic Crystal Palace Also In Ruins—Five Stables Are Burned — By Its System of Partial Insurance City of Toronto Will Stand Two-Thirds of Loss—Soldiers as Fire-Fighters.

Toronto, Oct. 19.—A tornado of fire swept the exhibition grounds last night for two hours, around midnight, and left in ruins the grand stand, the transportation building and four or five stables that lay between.

The fire started in the southeast corner of the grand stand, in what is known as Darling's Restaurant, where some officers of the garrison were quartered, with a number of horses and artillery equipment, including ammunition, all of which was rescued.

The strong southeasterly wind blowing at the time, which afterwards veered to a more easterly direction, forced the flames through the grand stand, whose inflammable wooden structure ignited with great rapidity.

Vast Billows of Flame.

Vast billows of flame carried sparks and firebrands across the open spaces. Several of the stables immediately north, at the back of the grand stand, caught fire, and were speedily roaring furnaces.

This all occurred between 10.45 and 11.30.

About midnight some sparks entered the southeast corner of the transportation building (the old main building, or Crystal Palace), and paper around the broken panes, which gave entrance to the cinders, and in five minutes the whole upper structure was alight. By this time the grand stand had burned itself to embers, and the stables were controlled.

By 12.30 the transportation building was in ruins, and further danger completely averted.

Losses and Insurance.

The insurance on the buildings was only renewed on Wednesday, for one month, pending a readjustment of the amounts. A blanket policy covers all the buildings on the grounds, but the amount is only one-third of their actual value. This was placed by Dr. Orr last night at $108,000, the cost of the grand stand; $100,000, the value of the transportation building, which used to stand, as the Queen street Asylum, and was moved in 1878 to the present site, where Lord Dufferin performed the inaugural ceremonies in that year, and about $25,000 for the stables, four of which—Nos. 1 and 2 and 8 and 9—were utterly consumed, and No. 3 badly damaged.

Permanent Buildings Uninjured.

Slight damages were also sustained by some other adjoining stables, straw being lighted by sparks through open doors, but the permanent buildings were quite uninjured. Electric service poles and wires were badly damaged on the immediate scene of the conflagration, and wooden sidewalks were charred to ashes. An estimate of $225,000 is, therefore, a conservative one, and two-thirds of this will fall directly on the city.

Insurance Details.

In detail the transportation building (old main building) there is $40,000 insurance with $13,400 on the annex (uninjured.)

On the grand stand, kitchen, lunch rooms, ticket boxes, entrances and fences there is $54,000.

There is $1,000 insurance on each of the cattle sheds.

The insurance was distributed among 26 companies, practically all in the business, on a percentage basis.

Had Seats For 12,500.

The grand stand was built in 1892. It was 725 feet long and built of wick and iron, with a seating capacity of 12,500. It overlooked a first-class half mile track, and was, indeed, one of the finest structures of its kind on the continent.

Changes All Plans.

Dr. Orr said that the fire meant an entire reconstruction of the plans for the development of the exhibition.

"We will need $250,000 at once, and we can be ready for next year all right.

"If it had occurred a week before the exhibition it would have ruined us. If it had happened during the exhibition, no one can imagine the result.

"We will never build another two-storey grand stand. One storey is enough, so as to let the people out in case of fire."

Dr. Orr was well pleased with the way the permanent buildings showed their secure construction.

Soldiers Help Firemen.

The military forces, horse, foot and artillery, were speedily on the ground from the Stanley barracks. And there was just a minute between the time the military arrived and the fire department hose was going.

"The finest help I ever saw," was Chief Thompson's tribute to the soldier lads. "They were so many they could take hold of a hose and just run away with it, and they were fine and able and willing."

A Fierce One.

For ferocity there has never been a fire to exceed it in Toronto. The strong gale blew the big bonfires into roaring volcanoes. At the transportation building the constant falling of the interior structures produced a roar as of muffled thunder, while the timbers crackled like rattling volleys of musketry.

No such pyrotechnics ever graced the exhibition as distinguished the night of Thanksgiving Day, 1906.

Five thousand people witnessed the fire, nearly all of whom walked home through torrents of rain.

KIDNAPPED IN CANADA.

Accusation Made by Alleged Thief Arrested in United States.

Watertown, N. Y., Oct. 19.—A case of international concern has developed in the arrest of Louis De Bauval, a Frenchman, on the St. Lawrence River, last summer, for the alleged stealing of pleasure boats.

De Bauval claims that he is without the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in that he was taken in Canadian territory, brought to Alexandria Bay, and turned over to an officer of the law, by whom he was arrested.

Supreme Court Justice Andrews has appointed a referee to investigate the matter, and De Bauval has written the Canadian authorities and the French ambassador in Washington.

Falls 40 Feet.

Toronto Junction, Oct. 19—Yesterday Bert Jobin, a carpenter employed on the Dominion Carriage Co. building on Campbell avenue, while laying joist on the top flat, stepped on a loose brick and fell the distance of 40 feet. His fall was broken by striking a projection, otherwise he would have been instantly killed. He received a cut on the head, one behind the ear and a cut over the left eye. He was taken to the Western Hospital.

Battle With Bank Robbers.

Auxvasse, Mo., Oct. 19.—Paris Bartley, cashier, and F. C. Stokes, assistant cashier, surprised two robbers at work in the Auxvasse State Bank yesterday. Armed with shotguns the bank officials fired 20 shots at the robbers who, after firing fifteen revolver shots in return, escaped on horseback, getting away with $200 in cash. One of the robbers was wounded.

Spanish Legislation.

Madrid, Oct. 19.—The text of the law of associations which the Government is to introduce at the opening of Parliament Oct. 23 has not yet been published, but the points in the summary of the Heraldo of this city, cabled Oct. 10, are approximately correct. Minister of Justice Romanones declares that the law was "conceived in the broadest democratic spirit."

Guilty of Granting Rebates.

New York, Oct. 19.—A verdict of guilty of granting rebates on sugar shipments was returned Wednesday against the New York Central Railway Co. and Frederick L. Pomeroy, the company's general traffic manager. Sentence was deferred until to-day.

54,600 Meals Did Him No Good.

HOW ONE MAN WASTED 50 YEARS OF HIS LIFE — THOUSANDS LIKE HIM.

"What's the use of eatin', anyhow?" said the scrawny dyspeptic to his rotund, prosperous - looking friend. "Here I've been eatin' three times a day, and sometimes twice a day, for 50 years, and look at me. I'm rawboned and skinny, still at the bottom of the ladder, sour on the world, and a pessimist. I know it, and I can't help it. If I had it to do over again, though, I would take care of my stomach, for I don't believe I ever really relished a meal in my life, not even mother's Christmas dinners, and I firmly believe that my way of eating, or whatever it was, brought along with it darkness and impossibility of success."

"You're right," nodded his companion. "Of course, that isn't always the case. But in this age we must not only 'Trust in the Lord and keep our powder dry,' but we must swallow sunshine with our food. Cheerfulness, especially while eating, which is the most essential act of man, is as necessary to him as sunshine is to the flowers. Nothing normal can be produced in darkness.

"But this is what you haven't been doing, Mr. Dyspeptic. Your brain and your stomach, remember, are twins, and you have to treat them accordingly. Why not start now and repair the damage you've done. It is never too late, you know."

"You mean at my age? And suppose you can't always have the sunshine?"

"Absolutely, yes. Science has made it possible to get the sunshine, the health and the strength that your stomach needs, all put up together in little tablets. They call them Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, the most effective tablets in the world for this very thing. One ingredient in these tablets digests 3,000 grains of food without the help of the stomach. Two tablets after each meal can do more work, quicker work and better work, in digesting a heavy meal, than the stomach can itself. The stomach need not work at all. Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets does all the work, and gives your jaded stomach a rest, the rest it needs. Meanwhile you cure yourself of brash, irritation, burning sensation, heartburn, sour stomach, acidity, fermentation, bloat, and the worst cases of dyspepsia and indigestion. You get rid of these for all time. And then, besides, you can eat all you want and whenever you want, and you will also relish mother's Christmas dinners if you will take Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after eating. That's the sunshine I was talking about. Then your face will reflect the internal change going on, you'll be more energetic, your mind will be clearer, you will have more confidence in yourself, you'll be happier, and you'll be yourself again.

"Your heart will change and you'll feel rosy. You'll enjoy your meals—and live. Let's walk down to the drug store and let me introduce you to one little package of these Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. You can get them at any drug store in the world for only 50c a package. It is worth it, Mr. Dyspeptic."

ON SHAWINIGAN BONDS

Sun Life Company Realized a Big Profit—$63,000.

Actuary of the Company Defends Dealing In These Securities Before Royal Commission—Explains the Transaction and How a Possible Overdraft Was Kept From the Knowledge of Ignorant Public.

Montreal, Oct. 19.—At the morning session of the Insurance Commission on Wednesday Mr. Macaulay defended the Sun Life Co.'s course in writing down securities on real estate before the losses had actually been realized. It was absolutely in accord with the method pursued by all banks and commercial corporations everywhere.

If you are going to write off $10,000 from real estate, said Mr. Macaulay, how can you do it except by changing the profit and loss account? There is no other way.

Mr. Langmuir asked whether such a plan might not be deceptive because it would show on its face that certain property had earned interest, whereas in fact it had not.

Mr. Macaulay would not agree to this view.

Payments to shareholders were fixed by the directors under the company's charter, and could not be criticized. In the early days of the company they discriminated against the shareholders for the benefit of the policyholders. When the company's position was improved this injustice was corrected. For the last 12 years shareholders have been receiving 15 per cent.

Shawinigan Bonds.

Mr. Macaulay then entered into an explanation of the transactions between the Sun Life and the Shawinigan Water and Power Co. In 1903 the insurance company made a loan to the Shawinigan Co. of $231,000 at six per cent. on the security of $240,000 bonds and $93,200 stock bonds. There had been two loans to the Shawinigan Co. on these bonds, a total of $350,000 in each case. The Sun Life got large blocks of bonus stock as the consideration. The loan was due in November, 1903, but the Shawinigan Co. could not market the bonds in order to raise the loan. The Sun Life did not want to close the year with an overdraft, as would have been the case, and asked the Merchants' Bank to take over part of the loan. The bank took over $290,000.

Mr. Macaulay said this was a genuine transfer, and read letters from the bank to prove it. In the following March the Sun Life paid the bank cash and took back the bonds. For extending the loan in this way $20,000 bonus stock was paid, of which the bank got $4,000. He announced that his company had made $63,000 out of this security without counting interest.

Mr. Shepley said that as the consideration of the company was higher than that of the bank the transfer was a dummy one.

Public Is Ignorant.

Asked why they did not want to show an overdraft at the end of the year, witness said it did not make any difference, except to a part of the public, which was ignorant and uninformed. He said the officers of the Insurance Department would not have cared nor the shareholders of the Sun Life.

Mr. Macaulay stated, when asked by Mr. Shepley, that he had not a dollar of interest in the Shawinigan Co., nor had the company, or the directors. There was, perhaps, one director who had a small interest. Later he said that there was not even one.

The bonus stock received from the Shawinigan Co. was entered in the books as of the value of $4 and did not show in the Government returns until 1905, when it was sold as a matter of policy. The price was 19 3-4. Witness said the stock is now worth 27.

The Commission adjourned until noon on Tuesday next.

Frederick, who went west and became a wealthy ranchman at Davis, South Dakota, determined to find his brothers and sister and succeeded after spending several thousand dollars.

Ottawa, Oct. 19.—(Globe Special.)—The date of the meeting of Parliament will probably be settled this week. It looks as though Nov. 22 would be selected, although the Government would prefer an earlier date than that if possible.

Holacaust In Birmingham, Ala., Boarding-House—Two More May Die.

Birmingham, Ala., Oct. 20.—Ten men were burned to death, two others were perhaps fatally injured, and a third was slightly hurt in a fire which destroyed the boarding-house of Mrs. E. E. Watley, on Third avenue, early yesterday.

There were 26 boarders in the house, almost all being street railway employes.

In addition, there were three other persons, Mrs. Watley and her two sons. They have been accounted for.

$200,000 Fire at 'Frisco.

San Francisco, Oct. 20.—Fire Thursday night in the freight sheds of the Southern Pacific Co., in Berry street, caused $200,000 damage. Surrounding property was saved by the fire department. Four tracks full of freight cars were consumed. It is thought that most of the cars were empty.

A Half Million Blaze.

Altoona, Pa., Oct. 20.—Fire started yesterday in the five-storey furniture building of Oliver Rothert, and before it was brought under control property to the amount of nearly half a million dollars was destroyed.

Toronto Exhibition Fire.

Toronto, Oct. 20.—It is practically assured that the new grandstand at the exhibition, when built, will be of amphitheatrical design, and will be without a gallery. The board of control paid a visit to the grounds yesterday afternoon to look over the ruins, and to consider plans for dealing with the situation. The Mayor said Architect Gowanlock will begin at once to prepare plans for the new buildings. The losses are estimated by Manager Orr to be $245,000. The grandstand cost $108,000, the stables about $3,000 each, and the transportation building cannot be replaced at less than $125,000. Insurance totals $99,000, divided among forty-seven companies.

MONUMENT TO POET.

Memory of Alex. McLachlan Is Honored at Orangeville.

Orangeville, Oct. 20.—The monument erected in the Forest Lawn Cemetery here by public subscription, in honor of Alexander McLachlan, the patriot poet, who died at Orangeville in 1896, was unveiled in the presence of a large number of people by Miss Elizabeth McLachlan, a daughter of the poet.

Addresses were delivered by the chairman, Dr. Hamilton, of Toronto; William Algie, Alton; Dr. Kennedy of Toronto; W. T. Bailey, Orangeville, and Joseph F. Clark, Port Elgin.

The monument is of Aberdeen granite, and bears the following inscription: "Alexander McLachlan, Canadian Patriot and Poet—1818 to 1896.

"Untutored child of nature wild, with instinct always true, thy voice did weave songs consecrated to truth and liberty."

Wind Swept Over Cuba.

120 Mile Gale Leaves Death and Destruction In Wake.

Over 100 Persons are Reported Dead and Many Injured—100 Houses at Miami Wrecked—35 Lighters Loaded With Valuable Merchandise, 19 of Them Belonging to the Ward Line—Buildings Shaken as By Earthquake.

Havana, Oct. 20.—A cyclone of unprecedented severity, accompanied by a terrific downpour of rain, swept over the Provinces of Havana and Pinar del Rio Wednesday night and resulted in 20 deaths in this city and the serious injury of a dozen or more persons.

The damage is estimated at $2,000,000.

The dead are all Cubans of the poorer class.

Buildings Badly Damaged.

In Havana City the buildings of the University of Havana sustained damages amounting to many thousands of dollars. A partition wall in the American legation was blown down. The office furniture was ruined and the books and records of the legation were wet through.

The light wooden structures over the sea baths at Vedado were badly wrecked.

The great unoccupied brick building covering the old United Railroad wharf near La Reela was demolished.

Many Dead and Injured.

New York, Oct. 20.—Advices received here by the Western Union from Havana state that 19 persons are known to be dead and many others were injured by the storm.

Much property was destroyed and the Prado and other parks were devastated. All traffic in the city was suspended, as a result of the storm. All American sailors and soldiers are reported to be safe.

Brooklyn Dragged Her Anchor.

The United States cruiser Brooklyn dragged her anchors at the height of the hurricane and touched bottom, but got off without damage.

The other warships, the Minneapolis, the Texas, the Denver and the Prairie rode out of the gale safely. More than one thousand tents at Camp Columbia were blown down and the barracks unroofed. One trooper had his shoulder broken.

Wind 120 Miles An Hour.

The storm began with heavy wind and rain. About 6 o'clock in the morning it rapidly increased in violence and at noon was at its height, the wind blowing 80 miles an hour. The city streets were like rivers. Stores were flooded and there was two feet of water in the cable office.

After noon the wind blew at times at the rate of 120 miles an hour.

35 Lighters Sunk.

The greatest money loss was in the harbor when 35 lighters were sunk. Many of these were loaded with valuable merchandise. Nineteen of them belonged to the Ward line of New York.

All trains to the interior were discontinued.

Pinar del Rio was the centre of the storm. Extensive damage is reported to crops in that province.

100 Miami Houses Wrecked.

A conductor who has arrived at Fort Pierce from Miami reports that one hundred houses at Miami were wrecked by the storm.

The Episcopal church and the Methodist Episcopal Church were blown down. The concrete jail is leaning.

The roof was blown off the P. & O. warehouse. The car shed was blown down.

100 Reported Dead.

A special cablegram to The Evening Telegram says: Over one hundred are dead from the worst cyclone which has ever visited Havana. Ninety-four of the fatalities are confined to natives, while 16 foreign residents are reported killed.

Buildings Shaken.

When the tempest reached its height buildings were shaken as with an earthquake, street cars were washed from their tracks, windows were blown in like paper and roofs and doors swept away.

Several of the smaller frame houses were blown from their foundations and were wrecked. These were situated in the poorer district and were the cause of so many deaths among the natives.

Weather Prophet Saved Lives.

It is estimated that the loss of life and damage would have been greater had it not been for the timely warning given by Father Love at Guncill. He is a noted weather observator of Berlin College.

He telephoned to Columbia Camp at 7.30, one hour before the storm descended, that a cyclone was coming, and his warning was immediately heeded.

Dutch Steamer Lost.

San Juan, Porto Rico, Oct. 20.—The Red line steamer Philadelphia, from La Guaira, Venezuela, for New York, arrived here yesterday 48 hours late. Her captain reports that a Dutch steamer was lost in the cyclone between Curacao and Lugauaica.

The Philadelphia encountered the cyclone upon leaving the harbor of La Guaira on Monday. She was blown ashore and slightly damaged. This and the heavy weather accounted for her delay in reaching here.

20 Miles of Railway Destroyed.

Twenty miles of the railway connecting La Guaira with Caracas has been totally destroyed by the storm, according to officers and passengers of the Philadelphia. The Philadelphia left here for New York yesterday afternoon.

Damage Along Florida Coast.

New York, Oct. 20.—Communication with Miami, Florida, has been restored by the Western Union. Miami reports that the hurricane struck the coast there at 6 o'clock Wednesday morning. The trainsheds at Miami were badly damaged. The Methodist Church and a number of houses were unroofed.

ELLIOTT KEY ENGULFED.

250 Persons Lost In Tidal Wave—Steamer Crushed, 25 Killed.

Miami, Fla., Oct. 20.—The steamer St. Lucie, Captain Bravo commanding, was sunk off the Florida coast.

One of the extension steamers arrived in port last night, bringing sixty wounded, who were taken to the hospital, and it is said there are twenty-eight dead bodies, which will be brought up to-day.

Captain Bravo says that he anchored on the leeward side of Elliott Key, twenty-five miles south of Miami, Thursday morning, and that soon after a tidal wave engulfed the island.

250 Lost In Tidal Wave.

He says there were 250 residents on the island, all of whom were lost.

The St. Lucie was crushed by the same wave, and of the hundred persons on board twenty-five were killed.

Captain Bravo was seriously injured.

A barge containing 100 persons is said to have been torn away from its moorings at Elliott Key and afterwards picked up near the Bahama Islands, fifty of her passengers being reported drowned.

It is believed now that a portion of the Florida Fish & Produce Co.'s fleet was destroyed and Manager Adams sent out one of their boats yesterday morning to look for the men and boats. On returning they reported no signs of the fleet.

GOVERNMENT HELPS THE CITY.

Windsor Gets Whip Hand Over the Ferry Company.

Windsor, Oct. 20.—It was found four months ago that the Detroit, Belle Isle & Windsor Ferry Co. was quietly trying to secure from the Dominion Government a ten-year renewal of its franchise in Windsor, which expires in two years.

Through its own carelessness Windsor had lost the control of this franchise, but the city was yesterday notified that the Government has decided to put the matter of a renewal in the city's hands, and that if the Ferry Co. does not concede all fair demands the Government will ask for tenders for a new company to supply the service.

TOUCHED WIRE IN CELLAR.

Former Ontario Man Instantly Killed In His Nebraska Home.

Cornwall, Oct. 20.—Cornwall and Glengarry friends have been notified of the death of Chas. J. Holdsworth, formerly of Summerstown, at his home in Freemont, Neb. He was instantly killed by touching a live wire in his cellar where he had gone to attend the furnace. He was 42 years of age and a son of the late William Holdsworth.

Arthur Gallinger of Aultsville has lost his right arm. He was operating a threshing mill when something was caught in the cylinder and in attempting to remove it his hand and arm were drawn in and terribly lacerated.

Italian Rioters Sentenced.

Kingston, Oct. 20.—The Italian rioters, Donifrio and D'Allo, were sentenced by Justice MacMahon to six months in Central Prison for assault and wounding.

Attempt At Bribery

QUEBEC COUNTY ELECTION.

The contest to fill the vacancy in the county of Quebec created in the Commons by the acceptance of a Judgeship by the Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick, is a lively one. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has a candidate in the field in whose favor he addressed the electors. The other three Liberals, backed by friends, denounced the manner in which Augers was selected and declared themselves candidates; but at the nomination, on the 16th inst., two of these gentlemen retired in favor of Mr. Robitaille, who is now fighting the Laurier candidate.

In retiring from the contest Mr. Martineau made the statement that, "Last night," the 15th, the day before nomination, "a friend of Mr. Amyot had called at his house and OFFERED HIS WIFE ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS for her husband, if the latter would remain in the field and split the vote with Mr. Robitaille. But he would not hear of such a thing and prefered to retire from the field and support Mr. Robitaille.

There does not appear to be any villainy to which the present Laurier election manipulators and grafters will not resort to win an election. Is there any political morality left in the country?

Lewis, one of the London bribers, who swore positively that he bribed no one, though some dozen bribed men swore positively that they received money from him to vote for Hyman, has been indicted for perjury. Mr. Robinette, his lawyer, prayed for gentle treatment of this man, on the ground that his father and mother, who are old, are very unwell. Everybody must feel for, and sympathize with the old couple, and not wonder at their illness, considering the revelations which have come to light at the London bribery revelation, but is leniency in the case of Lewis justifiable? The only way to stop these election frauds and perjuries is to punish and that, too, severely, the scoundrels engaged in them.

In the County of Quebec there is a lively fight going on between the Hon. the Postmaster-General, and Bourassa, who has entered the field and is battling in opposition to the Laurier candidate. The more these gents fight among themselves the better for the country.

It will be remembered that the present editor of The Toronto News, while editor of The Globe, wrote a book which contained well-nigh fulsome praise of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That the biographer has since then changed his views we have had many examples, none, perhaps, more striking than the one which follows, taken from the News of last evening:

"It is easy to call a man a Jesuit, and the loose and general application of the term is not to be commended. But it is true, as Mr. Graham charged at the Baptist Convention, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was guilty of gross treason to the professions and principles upon which he obtained office. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's whole public career was remarkable for resistance to the Ultramontane element in his Church, and to clerical supremacy in civil affairs. He would not have become Premier in 1896 if he had not opposed the Coercion bill of Sir Charles Tupper, and stood resolutely against Federal interference with the legislative rights of Manitoba. That this man should force constitutions upon Saskatchewan and Alberta which guarantee Separate Schools to the clerical element in the new Provinces was an astounding breach of faith, and an extraordinary surrender to influences which should not be permitted to operate in the sphere of government."

That venerable fossil, Goldwin Smith, is never happy unless arguing against the majority. And the more decided the majority are in their opinion that a certain thing is right, the more Smith labors to show that it is wrong. His latest caper is to object to the floating of the Union Jack at the schoolhouse on the ground that it may "implant jingo sentiment in the breasts of the young people;" and further, that it may antagonize our kindred to the south. For the same reasons the worthy professor stood out against the records of Canadian heroism in the school books. Yet, as a contemporary points out, the flag we live under is a study in itself and a valuable part of education. The history of Great Britain is deeply interwoven with the bars that form the Union Jack. Moreover, it would be the part of cowardice to haul it down and substitute a foreign flag to celebrate a foreign holiday, in fear of giving offence or to conciliate good opinion. That this was done at Winnipeg gave Premier Roblin full and fair warrant for the regulation which requires that the British flag shall be hoisted over the schools, not only for its educational value, but also as a notification to all concerned that that part of the Dominion has not changed its nationality, just because certain foreign peoples have chosen to come in as settlers for their own and, incidentally, the general advantage.

Harry Brown May Turn Professional

Harry Brown, the dashing hockey player who for years scintillated on Belleville's line-up, and who, last winter gained many laurels in Smith's Falls and Ottawa, is in the city, looking husky and strong. The fact that he may shortly turn professional will not greatly surprise his friends in this city. The inducements nowadays are very tempting. Harry is at present awaiting a contract from the management of the "Soo" St. Marie hockey team, which, if signed by him, will bind him to play cover point for that aggregation at a weekly stipend of $35. Thirty-five bones a week is not to be sneezed at. The "Soo" team this winter, Mr. Brown says, will be a fast aggregation, containing several former Smith's Falls players. The other teams in the league will have to hustle to head 'em off. That Harry will make good in professional company those who have seen him play will be sure of. Success to him.

SPORTING NOTES.

It is said that Winchester, Belleville's former goal-keeper, and laterly with Pittsburg, will this winter play with the Canadian Soo.

The South Africans won the fourth match of their English tour, defeating Durham by 22 to 4. Durham's dropped goal was the only tally against the "Springboks" in the four matches.

The notion that tea is injurious to persons of weak nerves is a false idea, as has been proven by the eminent scientist, Jonathan Hutchinson. Tea is in reality a nerve nutrient and is extremely beneficial to weak nerves, especially when you use pure tea direct from the gardens packed in sealed lead packages, such as "SALADA" Tea, which received the Highest Award and Gold Medal at the St. Louis Exposition in 1904.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance. With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

Colonization Roads

WHAT IS BEING DONE TO MAKE TRAVELLING MORE PLEASANT IN THE NORTHERN PART OF THE COUNTY.

Last week, says the Bancroft Times, we took a trip in company with Mr. T. C. McConnell, Colonization Road Inspector, over some of the roads in this district on which Government grants have been expended. The plan which was conceived by Mr. J. W. Pearce, M. P. P., of building a "belt line," with feeders, has been pretty well carried out. This "belt line" runs from L'Amable Station around by Fort Stewart, Armstrong's Mills, Hybla, Bird's Creek, Bancroft, and returns to the starting point, and a drive over it at the present time is somewhat of a revelation to one accustomed to travelling the same road a couple of years ago. That the work was done under the supervision of men who thoroughly understood the art of road-making is quite apparent. To keep the water away from the road-bed should be the aim of every roadmaker, and this idea has been well carried out, good ditches, with culverts, wherever necessary, and a well-rounded grade round for everything.

Six new bridges have been built this year, and if the season is favorable two more will be completed. These bridges are all built after the same model—box piers with needle-beam truss, and the timber used in their construction is all sound cedar. They are capable of carrying almost any weight. A coat of coal tar is applied, which will help very materially in preserving the timber.

The new road on the west side of the river, which cuts off a bad hill and does away with Kennedy's bridge, thus relieving the townships of Faraday and Dungannon of a good deal of responsibility, is also part of this year's work. Two other bridges have also been abandoned where new roads have been opened up. What these roads need now to make the work permanent is a dressing of crushed stone, and a stone crusher should be provided for this part of the county. We have the rock, and we would like to see some use made of it.

Last year about thirty-five miles of road were built and improved, and ninety-three culverts put in, ten of which were stone. If the good work is kept up for a few years longer the roads in this part of the county will compare very favorably with those in the front.

To-day's Market

The market to-day was one of the largest held here for some time. Although considerable farm produce was offered for sale, the prices were by no means lower. Eggs and butter still retain a high price, the former selling at 23 cents to 25 cents per dozen, and the latter at 28c to 30c per pound. Dressed poultry was offered for sale in considerable quantities, and was fairly reasonable in price.

Our quotations are as follows;—

Eggs—23c to 25c dozen.
Hay—$8 to $9 per ton.
Fall Wheat—68c to 70c.
Spring Wheat—75c.
Barley—45 to 48c.

Charcoal Kills Bad Breath.

BAD ODOR OF INDIGESTION SMOKING, DRINKING OR EATING CAN BE INSTANTLY STOPPED.

Sample Package Mailed Free.

Other people notice your bad breath where you would not notice it at all. It is nauseating to other people to stand before them and while you are talking give them a whiff or two of your bad breath. It usually comes from food fermenting on your stomach. Sometimes you have it in the morning,—that awful sour, bilious, bad breath. You can stop that at once by swallowing one or two Stuart Charcoal Lozengers, the most powerful gas and odor absorbers ever prepared.

Sometimes your meals will reveal themselves in your breath to those who talk with you. "You've had onions," or "You've been eating cabbage," and all of a sudden you belch in the face of your friend. Charcoal is a wonderful absorber of odors, as every one knows. That is why Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are so quick to stop all gases and odors of odorous foods, or gas from indigestion.

Don't use breath perfumes. They never conceal the odor, and never absorb the gas that causes the odor. Besides, the very fact of using them reveals the reason for their use. Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges in the first place stop for good all sour brash and belching of gas, and make your breath pure, fresh and sweet, just after you've eaten. Then no one will turn his face away from you when you breathe or talk; your breath will be pure and fresh, and besides your food will taste so much better to you at your next meal. Just try it.

Charcoal does other wonderful things, too. It carries away from your stomach and intestines all the impurities there massed together and which causes the bad breath. Charcoal is a purifier as well as an absorber.

Charcoal is now by far the best, most easy and mild laxative known. A whole boxful will do no harm; in fact the more you take the better. Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made of pure willow charcoal and mixed with just a faint flavor of honey to make them palatable for you, but not too sweet. You just chew them like candy. They are absolutely harmless.

Get a new, pure, sweet breath, freshen your stomach for your next meal, and keep the intestines in good working order. These two things are the secret of good health and long life. You can get all the charcoal necessary to do these wonderful but simple things by getting Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges. We want you to test these little wonder workers yourself before you buy them. So send us your full name and address for a free sample of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges. Then after you have tried the sample, and been convinced, go to your druggist and get a 25c box of them. You'll feel better all over, more comfortable, and "cleaner" inside.

Send us your name and address today and we will at once send you by mail a sample package, free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 60 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

FOUR MAGAZINES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

CO-OPERATION IN ADVERTISING MAKES IT POSSIBLE.

Half price offers are but combinations of advertising. In a word, four magazines band together, use the same publicity and share the expenses. Four magazines working together reduce the cost of publicity about one-fourth of what it would be if taken up alone. The receipts are approximately the same as if the publicity were carried on independently. And who receives the benefits from this publicity club? The patron of the magazines, inasmuch as he secures a reduction in the subscription price made possible by economy. And thus the home can now secure three, four and five periodicals, which present-day needs require, for little more than the old-time price of a single magazine, that once was the solitary visitor to the family circle.

For instance, Combination No. 2, advertised by the Central Magazine Agency in our columns, offers The Cosmopolitan Magazine, $1.00; The Harper's Bazar, $1.00; The Home Magazine, $1.00, and The Reader Magazine, $3.00—total value, $6.00—all four for $2.00, one-half price, a saving of fifty per cent.

Another good offer is The Delineator, McClure's Magazine, The World's Work and The Home Magazine. These four may be had for just $3.50.

One of the best bargains ever offered is The Cosmopolitan Magazine, The World To-day and The Home Magazine, all three for one year for just $2.00.

For $2.00 you can secure a year's subscription to The Cosmopolitan The World To-day and The Home Magazine.

For $2.50 you can have The Cosmopolitan, $1.00; Home Magazine, $1.00; The Reader Magazine, $3.00, at one-half price, $2.50. All three for less than the price of one.

The best bargain of the year, however, is The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, Harper's Bazar and The Reader Magazine, total value, $6.00—all for half price, $3.00. This is positively the best bargain of the year.

Before subscribing to any magazines our readers should write the Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind., for prices. Further than this if you have spare time and want to earn Christmas money, the Central Magazine Agency will pay you a liberal commission on these great magazine combinations. You will be surprised to find how easy it is to make from $10.00 to $100.00 a week in securing orders from your neighbors. You can save them from 40 to 50 per cent. on their year's magazines and make a handsome commission for yourself.

To any newsdealer, druggist or agent who will act as our agent we will run their name and address at the bottom of our large display advertising. Our commission to agents or newsdealers is 35 cents an order.

Write to-day for our special offer or send your order for any of the combinations mentioned above. Remember, The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, The Reader Magazine and Harper's Bazar—all four for $3.00—total value, $6.00. You save 50 per cent. Ancient Single Tax.

Vauban, the great French engineer, seems, according to his biographers, to have been the father or perhaps the grandfather of single tax. He published in the year of his death a volume in which he contended that one tax on land should be made to cover all the expenses of the state. The book was promptly suppressed by the royal council.

The Pandora Thermometer

The thermometer on the Pandora range oven means precisely in accuracy to the cook what the square and compass mean to the draftsman. Without the square and compass the draftsman would have to work entirely by guess, just as you do without an accurate and reliable thermometer on your oven.

The Pandora thermometer reduces cooking to an exact science. You know precisely how much heat you have and what it will do in a given time. It is one of the small things which makes the Pandora so much different and better than common ranges.

TOLL TAKEN OF LIFE.

(St. Louis Globe-Democrat.)

What toll do you take of life, of life
'Twixt the cradle, man, and the grave,
And what is the gain of your toil and strife?
And Midas this answer gave;
"I gather the fruits of a million's toil,
I revel in seas of gold,
I reap the harvests from leagues of soil,
But, alas! I am growing old!

"And when I consider the things I have won,
The things that I call my own,
I seem to feel that my work ill done,
For these I have gained alone;
A palace—and shelter all men claim—
Purple, and linen and gold,
Fine raiment mine, but no better than thine
To guard the body from cold.

"Three meals a day, and a friendly roof,
And garments to wrap me in,
These only mine, by their use's proof,
The rest is the price of sin,
Three meals a day and the clothes I wear,
And a roof to shelter me,
This is the gain of life's toil and pain,
As all too late I see.

"Though men shall say when I come to die;
'Such and such was he worth,'
But I read my title, and sadly sigh,
To six poor feet of earth.
The things I have won for the deeds I have done—
Shelter, clothing, and bread,
Whatever your name or station or fame,
You have no less, no more than the same,
And the same last narrow bed."

The virtual sale of immense iron deposits by Mr. J. J. Hill to the United States Steel Corporation is of some interest to Canadians. Extensive as they are, these deposits will be exhausted within measurable time, and as the amount of steel manufactured becomes greater year by year Canadian iron deposits will constantly increase in value. This is a reason for retaining them instead of selling them to be held by some great steel syndicate for its own convenience.

Could Scarcely Walk.

A RHEUMATIC SUFFERER CURED BY DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS.

Rheumatism is rooted in the blood—that is a medical fact every poor rheumatic sufferer should know. Liniments and outward applications cannot possibly cure rheumatism. They are a waste of money, and while the sufferer is using them the disease is steadily growing worse—is slowly but surely taking a firmer grasp upon the entire system. Rheumatism must be treated through the blood. That is the only way in which the poisonous acid can be driven out. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills actually make new blood and thus always cure rheumatism. Every dose of these pills helps to make new rich, red blood which sweeps the poisonous acid from the system, loosens the aching joints and muscles and gives the rheumatic new health free from pain. Among those who can bear witness to the truth of these statements is Miss Dorsina Langlois, of St. Jerome, Que., for weary months she suffered from rheumatism and had began to think she was incurable. "I could not straighten up" says Miss Langlois, "My limbs were almost useless, so stiff were they. For many months I endured such pains as only rheumatic sufferers can understand. Although only thirteen years of age the suffering I endured actually made me look like an old woman. I used liniments and tried several medicines but got not the slightest help until almost by chance my attention was directed to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I began taking them and in the course of a few weeks I could see they were helping me. Little by little the pain began to go, and the stiffness to leave my joints. I continued taking the pills for several months when every symptom of the trouble had disappeared. I have not felt a twinge of rheumatism since, and I bless the day Dr. Williams' Pink Pills came to my notice."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills never fail to cure rheumatism because they go right to the root of the trouble in the blood. That is why these pills cure all the common ailments due to poor and watery blood, such as anaemia headaches and backaches, indigestion, neuralgia, St. Vitus' dance, general weakness, and the distressing irregularities that afflict women and growing girls. If you need a medicine you will save money by taking Dr. Williams Pink Pills at once. See that the full name Dr. Williams Pink Pills for Pale People is printed on the wrapper around every box. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Whether you believe it or not this incontrovertible fact remains. These tablets will change weak and diseased organs into strong, healthy organs; fast with some, more slowly with others, but sure and absolutely certain with all who persist in their use, except the few beyond the help of medicine.

Disease, even chronic, will then disappear as these organs are restored to their normal conditions.

These tablets are now recognized beyond doubt or question as best adapted to the special needs of women.

ting in through the window. Steel slipped well into the shadow, but not before an idea had come to him. He removed the roll-up Rembrandt from the table and slipped it behind a row of books in the book-case. Then he looked up again at the crooked thumb.

He would recognize that thumb anywhere. It was flat-like the head of a snake, and the nail was no larger than a pea—a thumb that had evidently been cruelly smashed at one time. The owner of the thumb might have been a common burglar, but in the light of recent events David was not inclined to think so. At any rate he felt disposed to give his theory every chance. He saw a long, fustian-clad arm follow the scarred thumb, and a hand grope all over the table.

"Curse me," a foggy voice whispered, hoarsely. "It ain't here. And the bloke told me——"

The voice said no more, for David grabbed at the arm and caught the wrist in a vice-like grip. Instantly another arm shot over the window and an ugly piece of iron piping was swung perilously near Steel's head. Unfortunately, he could see no face. As he jumped back to avoid a blow his grasp relaxed, there was a dull thud outside, followed by the tearing scratch of boots against a wall and the hollow clatter of flying feet. All David could do was to close the window and regret that his impetuosity had not been more judiciously restrained.

"Now, what particular thing was he after?" he asked himself. "But I had better defer any further speculations on the matter till the morning. After the fright he had my friend won't come back again. And I'm just as tired as a dog."

But there were other things the next day to occupy David's attention besides the visit of his nocturnal friend. He had found out enough the previous evening to encourage him to go farther. And surely Miss Ruth Gates could not refuse to give him further information.

He started out to call at 219, Brunswick Square, as soon as he deemed it excusable to do so. Miss Gates was out, the solemn butler said, but she might be found in the square gardens. David came upon her presently with a book in her lap and herself under a shady tree. She was not reading, her eyes were far away. As she gave David a warm greeting there was a tender bloom on her lovely face.

"Oh, yes., I got home quite right," she said. "No suspicion was aroused at all. And you?"

"I had a night thrilling enough for yellow covers, as Artemus Ward says. I came here this morning to throw myself on your mercy, Miss Gates. Were I disposed to do so, I have information enough to force your hand. But I prefer to hear everything from your lips."

"Did Enid tell you anything?" Ruth faltered.

"Well, she allowed me to know a great deal. In the first place, I know that you had a great hand in bringing me to 218 the other night. I know that it was you who suggested that idea, and it was you who facilitated the use of Mr. Gates's telephone. How the thing was stage-managed matters very little at present. It turns out now that your friend and Dr. Bell and myself have a common enemy."

Ruth looked up swiftly. There was something like fear in her eyes.

"Have—have you discovered the name of that enemy?" she asked.

"Yes, I know now that our foe is Mr. Reginald Henson."

"A man who is highly respected. A man who stands wonderfully high in public estimation. There are thousands and thousands of people who look upon him as a great and estimable creature. He gives largely in charities, he devotes a good deal of his time to the poor. My uncle, who is a good man, if you like, declares that Reginald Henson is absolutely indispensable to him. At the next election that man is certain to be returned to Parliament to represent an important northern constituency. If you told my uncle anything about him, he would laugh at you."

"I have not the slightest intention of approaching your uncle on this matter at present."

"Because you could prove nothing. Nobody can prove anything."

"But Christiana Henson may in time."

Once more Ruth flashed a startled look at her companion.

"So you have discovered something about that?" she whispered.

"I have discovered everything about it. Legally speaking, the young lady is dead. She died last night, as Dr. Walker will testify. She passed away in the formula presented by me the night that I met her in the darkness at 218, Brunswick Square. Now, will you be so good as to tell me how those girls got hold of my synopsis?"

"That came about quite naturally. Your synopsis and proof in an open envelope were accidentally slipped into a large circular envelope used by a firm of seed merchants and addressed to Longdean Grange, sent out no doubt amongst thousands of others. Chris saw it, and, prompted by curiosity, read it. Out of that our little plot was gradually evolved. You see, I was at school with those two girls, and they have few secrets from me. Naturally, I suggested the scheme because I see a great deal of Reginald Henson. He comes here; he also comes very frequently to our house in Prince's Gate. And yet I am sorry, from the bottom of my heart, that I ever touched the thing, for your sake."

The last words were spoken with a glance that set David's pulses beating. He took Ruth's half-extended hand in his, and it was not withdrawn.

"Don't worry about me," he said. "I shall come out all right in the end. Still, I shall look eagerly forward to any assistance that you can afford me. For instance, what hold has Henson got on his relatives?"

"That I cannot tell you," Ruth cried. "You must not ask me. But we were acting for the best; our great object was to keep you out of danger."

"There is no danger to me if I can only clear myself," Steel replied. "If, you could only tell me where those bank-notes came from! When I think of that part of the business I am filled with shame. And yet if you only knew how fond I am of my home. . . . At the same time, when I found that I was called upon to help ladies in distress I should have refused all offers of reward. If I had done so I should have had no need of your pity. And yet—and yet it is very sweet to me."

He pressed the hand in his, and the pressure was returned. David forgot all about his troubles for the time; and it was very cool and pleasant and quiet there.

"I am afraid that those notes were forced upon us," she said. "Though I frankly believe that the enemy does not know what we have learnt to do from you. And as to the cigar-case; would it not be easy to settle that matter by asking a few questions?"

"My dear young lady, I have done so. And the more questions I ask the worse it is for me. The cigar-case I claimed came from Walen's, beyond all question, and was purchased by the mysterious individual now in the hospital. I understood that the cigar-case was the very one I admired at Lockhart's some time ago, and——"

"If you inquire at Lockhart's you will find such to be the case."

David looked up with a puzzled expression. Ruth spoke so seriously, and with such an air of firm conviction, that he was absolutely staggered.

"So I did," he said. "And was informed in the most positive way by the junior partner that the case I admired had been purchased by an American called Smith and sent to the Metropole after he had forwarded dollar-notes for it. Surely you don't suppose that a firm like Lockhart's would be guilty of anything——"

Ruth rose to her feet, her face pale and resolute.

"This must be looked to," she said. "The cigar-case sent to you on that particular night was purchased at Lockhart's by myself and paid for with my own money!"

CHAPTER XIX.

The blinds were all down at Longdean Grange, a new desolation seemed to be added to the gloom of the place. Out in the village it had by some means become known that there was somebody dead in the house, either madam herself or one of those beautiful young ladies whom nobody had ever seen. Children loitering about the great lodge-gates regarded Williams with respectful awe and Dr. Walker with curiosity. The doctor was the link connecting the Grange with the outside world.

To add to the gloom of it all the bell over the stables clanged mournfully. The noise made Walker quite nervous as he walked up the drive by Williams's side. Not for a pension would he have dared approach the house alone. Williams, in the seediest and most dilapidated rusty black, had a face of deepest melancholy.

"But why that confound—— Why do they ring that bell?" Walker asked, irritably.

"Madam ordered it, sir," Williams replied. "She's queerer than ever, is mistress. She don't say much, but Miss Christiana's death is a great shock to her. She ordered the bell to be tolled, and she carried on awful when Miss Enid tried to stop it."

Walker murmured vaguely something doubtless representing sympathy.

"And my other patient, Williams?" he asked. "How is he getting along? Really, you ought to keep those dogs under better control. It's a dreadful business altogether. Fancy a man of Mr. Henson's high character and gentle disposition being attacked by a savage dog in the very house! I hope the hound is securely kennelled."

"Well, he isn't, sir," Williams said, with just the glint of a grin on his dry features. "And it wasn't altogether Rollo's fault. That dog was so devoted to Miss Christiana as you never see. And he got to know as the poor young lady was dying. So he creeps into the house and lies before her bedroom door, and when Mr. Henson comes along the dog takes it in his 'ead as he wants to go in there. And now Rollo's got inside, and nobody except Miss Enid dare go near. I pity that there undertaker when he comes."

Walker shuddered slightly. Longdean Grange was a fearful place for the nerves. Nothing of the routine or the decorous ever happened there. The fees were high and the remuneration prompt, or Walker would have handed over his patient cheerfully to somebody else. Not for a moment did he imagine that Williams was laughing at him. Well, he need not see the body, which was a comfort. With a perfectly easy conscience he could give a certificate of death. And if only somebody would stop that hideous bell! Someone was singing quietly in the drawing-room, and the music seemed to be strangely bizarre and out of place.

Inside it seemed like a veritable house of the dead—the shadow of tragedy loomed everywhere. The dust rose in clouds from the floor as the servants passed to and fro. They were all clad in black, and shuffled uneasily, as if conscious that their clothes did not belong to them. Enid came out into the hall to meet the doctor. Her face seemed terribly white and drawn; there was something in her eyes that suggested anxiety more than grief.

"I suppose you have come principally to see Mr. Henson?" she said. "But my sister——"

"No occasion to intrude upon your grief for a moment, Miss Henson," Walker said, quietly. "As I have told you before, there was very little hope for your sister from the first. It was a melancholy satisfaction to me to find my diagnosis confirmed in every detail by so eminent an authority as Dr. Walkerly Bell. I will give you a certificate with pleasure—at once."

"You would like to see my sister?" Enid suggested.

The quivering anxiety was in her eyes again, the strained look on her face. Walker was discreetly silent as to what he had heard about that bloodhound, but he had by no means forgotten it.

"Not the least occasion, I assure you," he said, fervently. "Your sister had practically passed away when I last saw her. There are times when—er—you see—but really there is no necessity."

A Thankful Mother.

"I thank you with all my heart for what Baby's Own Tablets have done for my little girl," says Mrs. Antoine Charette, Jr., of St. Boniface, Que. "When I began giving her the Tablets she seemed to be pining away, but after using less than a box she was rapidly gaining and she is now a fine, fat, healthy little one, and I write you this as the acknowledgment of a mother who will never forget what Baby's Own Tablets have done for her child." Letters like this must bring hope and comfort to all mothers who have feeble or sickly children. Baby's Own Tablets will cure all the minor ailments and can be given just as safely to a new born baby as to a well grown child. If you cannot get these Tablets from your dealer write The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont., and get them at 25c a box.

Talks on Orange Meat

(THE PURE FOOD)

Oven Perfection.

If you are a woman, you would revel in the huge ovens that cook Orange Meat. Much of the crisp deliciousness of Orange Meat is due to their matchless baking.

After the wheat has been cleaned, steam cooked, malted and flaked—the moist flakes are conveyed by automatic carriers to the ovens.

Endless steel screens carry the flakes back and forth, toasting each flake to a rich, golden brown—the final stage in our peerless process of converting a grain of wheat into the most perfect food known to science.

As the major part of every meal for thin people—dyspeptics—"bloodless" folk—those whose systems are "all run down"—and especially for children—Orange Meat has a place that nothing else can satisfy.

A lady in Walkerton says:—"Orange Meat is very wholesome. My brother at 81 years old, has taken a great liking to it, and I am glad, as it seems such a light wholesome food. I would recommend to those afflicted with stomach trouble."

At all grocers in 15c. and 25c. packages. Every 15c. package contains a coupon, good for premiums. 25c. or "Jumbo" package contains 2½ times the quantity of 15c. size. Write "Orange Meat, Kingston," for new premium catalogue.

"Grand Peninsular"

The Ideal Kitchen Range

The "Grand Peninsular" is my ideal of what a perfect cast-iron range should be.

It is the most reliable cooker of its kind—because the oven is built exactly like the oven of an expensive steel range.

Steel radiates heat quicker than cast-iron. Instead of using only a steel BOTTOM—I make the ENTIRE OVEN—top, bottom and sides—of patent Levelled Steel Plate.

That's one reason why the "Grand Peninsular" is such a quick, even cooker—and saves so much fuel.

Then I do away with all guess work about the baking, by putting a thermometer on the oven door. The oven is perfectly ventilated—the air kept fresh and dry—thus preventing soggy baking. I make the Grate Bars large and strong and easily removable.

All the ornamentation—the nickeled parts—can be lifted off the range when cleaning, without loosening a single bolt. You can see Peninsular Ranges at your local dealer's store. 40

$10,000 BAIL FOR GUROFSKY.

Italian Is Getting Along Well—Pleaded Not Guilty.

Toronto, Oct. 20.—Joseph Gurofsky was arraigned in the Police Court yesterday on the charge of "shooting with intent" Dealde Trevani. Mr. Robinette, his counsel, said not guilty for the accused and declined to elect. A remand was made for a week.

Mr. Corley said the offence was too serious to consider a cash bail of even $10,000. Mr. Robinette later saw the Attorney-General, who fixed the bail at that amount, and Gurofsky was given his liberty at 5 o'clock.

Trevani is getting on well at St. Michael's Hospital. A charge of wounding Louis Gurofsky has been laid against him.

For carrying and pointing a revolver John Goss, an Italian, was fined $20 and costs by Magistrate Denison.

SIXTY HOGS INFECTED.

Disheartening Discovery Just When Regulations Were Relaxing.

Chatham, Oct. 20.—News comes to the city that on Wednesday over sixty hogs were destroyed by Dr. Perdue on the farm of William Thompson, about three miles south of Blenheim, on account of the animals being infected with hog cholera.

An autopsy held on a number of the hogs revealed lesions of the disease, both in the acute and chronic form.

A few days ago the announcement was made that the regulations governing the shipments of hogs from this county, among others in this section, had been withdrawn and the situation now is a serious one.

Funeral of Mrs. Jeff Davis.

Richmond, Va., Oct. 20.—The train bearing the body of Mrs. Jefferson Davis arrived here yesterday and was met by Lieut.-Governor Ellyson and details from Lee and Pickett camps of Confederate Veterans, who escorted the body to St. Paul's Church. The funeral took place at 3 o'clock.

Bank of England Rate Raised.

London, Oct. 20.—The Bank of England raised its rate of discount to 6 per cent. yesterday morning. The multiplicity of the demands for gold, it is pointed out, emphasized the necessity of protecting the already depleted reserves of the Bank of England.

Accidental Death.

Metcalf, Oct. 20.—An inquest was held here yesterday by Dr. Baptie, county coroner, and the following verdict was rendered:

"As that on the 15th day of October, 1906, in the 5th concession Osgood, on or about lot 31, Harry Cummings came to his death by a bullet wound in the left breast, caused by a gunshot accidentally discharged while in his own hands after being handed to him by a comrade while out hunting."

Magyar Must Hang.

Regina, Sask., Oct. 20.—Magyar, the Hungarian, who was convicted of murdering his employer, a farmer, this spring, was refused a new trial by the court yesterday, and will hang on Nov. 29. The Hungarians of Winnipeg got up a big petition for a new trial, claiming that he killed the farmer in self-defence. The court failed to see it in that light.

THE PARABLE OF THE TALENTS —GOLDEN TEXT IS: "A FAITHFUL MAN SHALL ABOUND WITH BLESSING."

HISTORICAL SETTING.

Time—Tuesday afternoon, April 4, A.D. 30. Immediately following the last lesson.

Place.—On the slopes of Mt. Olivet, overlooking Jerusalem.

Place in the Life of Christ.—The close of the last day of his public teaching. Preparation of his disciples for their great work.

14. For The Kingdom of heaven This is not in the original, but is naturally supplied from v. 1, since the same subject is continued under another illustration. Is as a man travelling into a far country. He was going abroad, and therefore had to leave his affairs in competent hands. "It frequently happens in the Orient that men of wealth and influence are hastily summoned to go to some distant part of the empire."

The householder represents Jesus Christ, who was about to leave his disciples and go to heaven, which was a far country in the sense that his servants could not have visible communication with him. Who called his own servants. These upper servants, or slaves, were to a large landholder what the under officers of a government are to the king. The slaves of the Greeks and Romans were often men of varied mental attainments, and considerable manual skill. Such "were allowed to engage freely in business, paying, as it was frequently arranged, a fixed yearly sum to their master; or, as here, they had money given to them wherewith to trade on his account, or with which to enlarge their business, and to bring him in a share of their profits."

15. And unto one he gave five talents. The talent consisted of 3,000 shekels (each equals four silver pennies.) The fact is that there were two kinds of shekels used in trade, called the heavy shekel and the light (just as there are now different values to shillings, four different kinds of quarts, two weights of a ton.) The heavy weight talent was worth about $2,000, the light weight about $1,000.

The talents represent the powers and means God has entrusted to his people for carrying on his work. They are the "gifts" Paul enumerates in 1 Cor. 12. Among these talents are the Gospel itself, the truths Christ preached, training, energy, education, skill Christian experience, health, wealth, time, opportunities, power of preaching and teaching, all the gifts and endowments of the Holy Spirit. Dr. Bushnell says that the capacity of religion — of knowing God, of love, of faith, of being illuminated and guided by God—is the highest talent we have. To every man according to his several ability. "The natural gifts are as the vessel, which may be large or small, and which received according to its capacity; but which in each case is filled." As distinguished from the pounds in Luke, where each servant received the same amount, a mina, one sixtieth as much as a talent. The talents represent those gifts of God which differ in different persons, as talent, genius, wealth, general opportunities, varied abilities, and tastes. While the pounds denote something which is the same to all, so that on one at the first can have more than another, and yet this something is of such a sort that it can be very differently employed, or increased by each one, not so much according to his ability as according to his faithfulness or industry.

16. The straightway of the last verse belongs at the beginning of this—straightway he went. It thus teaches the great lesson of urgency and promptitude. It says to us, The demands of the kingdom are very pressing: to be prompt in action is a cardinal virtue in the kingdom. He that had received the five talents, $5,000 or $10,000. Traded with the same. Literally, worked; then in a technical sense, engaged in business, and so traded. The men who conduct large business operations have to work.

19. After a long time. Long in the history of the whole church, and long enough in the case of individuals to allow them to make good use of the trust. The Jews had been long entrusted with the affairs of the kingdom of heaven. To the apostles it seemed long before the Lord returned; and for centuries the people of God have been waiting for the final coming. And reckoneth with them, has a settlement. They are to report when they have done with the talents entrusted to them. The settlement may occur at any crisis, at death, at the day of judgment.

20. He that had received five talents . . . brought other five talents. He had doubled his spiritual capital. He was twice the man he was before. He had twice as much of the same things as was first entrusted to him.

21. His Lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant. He had his Lord's approval. Faithfulness, not success, nor the amount gained, was rewarded. God will say, Well done only to those who have done well. There are no empty compliments in the day of judgment.

22. He also that had received two talents . . . gained two other talents. He was as faithful and as successful as the one who had received five talents. He would soon be equal to any one who had received five talents, but had not made so good a use of them. All depends on the ratio of faithfulness. The progress is by geometrical progression. Even he who had received but one talent could have surpassed in a short time one who used five with less faithfulness. What an inspiration to use to the best of our ability all that God has entrusted to us! A modest man of moderate ability said that he could not expect God's Well done, but he did expect that he would say, Well tried; well attempted.

23. Well done, good and faithful servant. He had the same rewards as the man with five talents, for he was equally faithful. The rewards were according to his ability. He had all he could use or enjoy. His cup, small or large, was full and running over.

24. Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man. That is, hard-hearted; insensible to the feelings of others in all matters relating to money. Seeking gain for himself at any cost to others. Reaping where thou hast not sown. Unjustly gathering for himself the fruits of other men's labors. Gathering where thou hast not strewed, or "scattered." Gathering up the wheat from the threshing-floor, where others had used the winnowing fan.

This representation of the worst kind of landlord is set forth in the parable in order to show by contrast that if it was mean and unworthy to misuse the property of such a man, how infinitely worse it was to so treat the gifts entrusted by One who is holy and just.

25. And I was afraid. To risk the money, lest he should lose it, and incur his Master's displeasure. Hid thy talent in the earth. A very common plan for safe keeping, in a land where there were no banks or safe-deposit vaults.

26. Thou wicked and slothful. "Idle, heartless, without spirit or energy." Whatever his excuses, his real reasons are found in this sentence. He was really dishonest, though he imagined himself honest. His excuses were vain because they were excuses and not reasons. Thou knewest, i.e., accepting your statement. I will judge you by your own words (Luke 19: 22.) What you plead as an excuse is the very reason why you should have acted differently.

27. Thou oughtest, therefore, if you believed I am such a man as you say, to have put my money, which was mine, not yours, to the exchangers, "bankers." Received mine own with usury, i.e., pay for the use of the money. It should be "interest," as in R.V., not usury. Originally the words meant the same, but now usury means exorbitant or illegal interest. In the original the word for usury means offspring. Is is the product or offspring of capital. Fair interest is quite as much a benefit to the borrower as to the lender.

28. Take therefore the talent from him, because it did him no good, nor others. And give it unto him which hath ten talents, the one with the largest ability to use it.

29. For unto every one that hath, in the sense that the men of two and five talents had or possessed, by the hold which faithful use gives. That man has capital, not who merely holds it in his name or safe, but who knows its powers and capabilities, and how to make it accomplish its purposes. The man with the one talent buried it; he did not have it. Shall be given, and he shall have abundance. This is illustrated in worldly and intellectual affairs every day. From him that hath not, has not made true use of, and, therefore, does not really possess, shall be taken away even that which he hath.

30. Cast . . . into outer darkness. There was no other place for him. His nature was contrary to the light. He had no part in the household of the saints, for he was not a saint. His punishment is the natural result of his crime. Weeping and gnashing of teeth, expressing the terrific pain and loss, which was all the greater because he brought it on himself. His Lord had given him every opportunity, and done all things that were possible, but he had refused them. This will apply to the Jews at the time of Christ and the years following. But still more to those who neglect the gospel, and refuse to use the great privileges and opportunities God has given them.

The Newfoundland Case

(London Free Press.)

The Campbell-Bannerman Government seems to have repeated in Newfoundland the blunder of Natal. It attempted to stay the hand of the colonial administration there in dealing with the native rebels. To conciliate the radical element at home, the execution of these outlaws was ordered to be suspended. This interference with the course of justice in a self-governing colony was so strongly resented that the Government resigned, creating a crisis which was only allayed by the home Government's changing front, and allowing the executions to proceed.

Whether a similar expression of resentment will follow in the island colony remains to be seen. It is up to Premier Sir Robert Bond to take the initiative. Some hint is made public that the Premier is not averse to the present attitude of affairs as favoring his return to power under cover of the storm which his own acts have helped to create.

The gravity of the situation is fairly gauged by those London journals which speak of things as they appear on the surface. But the moderation of the London Standard serves to confirm in a measure the suspicion which has gained publicity that Sir Robert is in reality neither surprised nor very much displeased with what has been done. That paper says that the modus vivendi was the only practical thing for the time-being, but adds that any transaction of the kind should be conducted with the colonial Government directly represented in the negotiations.

To the colonial world in general the point is not whether the local Government has been playing fast and loose with a view to political ends, but the broad principle of arbitrary interference with the laws passed by an autonomous colonial legislature. Laws put upon the Newfoundland statute book forbid the shipping of native fishermen in foreign vessels, and the use of purse seines in the herring fishery. The action of the Campbell-Bannerman Government sets these laws aside in the modus vivendi just concluded with the United States.

The ancient colony has enjoyed responsible Government for over half a century. It is in the same position regarding the management of its own affairs as Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Natal or Cape Colony.

What has happened there might as well happen to Canada as regards any law enacted by the Parliament at Ottawa covering a question in dispute with the United States.

It is an explicit contradiction of the position urged by Mr. Under-Secretary Churchill in his message to Canadians. In his letter he gave assurance that the Liberal party could be trusted equally with a Conservative party in doing justice to "the colonies." It is more than probable, it is a certainty that the heavy hand was laid upon Natal at the personal instance of the Under-Secretary himself. The visitation upon Newfoundland must have been by his active consent if not his direct inspiration.

Newfoundland is a small colony, with a population of about 200,000. Mr. Churchill may think it a safe part of the colonial empire in which to teach the lesson of "a little wholesome neglect." As regards Canada or any of the larger outlying portions of the empire he dare not so practice.

Squadrons of "Dreadnoughts."

(Engineering.)

The prospects, says Engineering, are that in 1908 no continental nation will have in fighting condition one single ship of the Dreadnought type, whereas, if the British Admiralty continue the rate of construction attained with the ship to be tried next week, they will then have one squadron made up of six Dreadnoughts, and, in addition, a squadron composed of eight ships of the King Edward VII. class, and two Lord Nelsons. The first squadron will have sixty 12-in. guns, with the enormous advantage of a short and easily-manipulated fighting line, while the second squadron will have forty 12-in. guns and fifty-two 9.2-in guns. Both will be enormously superior to any squadron of an equal number of ships of any other navy. By 1908, too, the British nation will know whether foreign nations accept the olive branch which it has held out in this year's naval policy, by a relaxation of naval expenditure, without any diminution of determination to ultimately maintain mastery of the sea. If this desire for limiting armaments is not reciprocated, then, continues Engineering, there will be equal unanimity in continuing building operations to maintain our supremacy at all costs. There should be no mistake about this view. The Sea Lords, who, after all, have the confidence of the nation, will not waver as to the vital principle of supremacy. Foreign nations, and notably the German people, may realize that their continuance in the development of their naval programme—involving as it does in their case not only an enormous sum for ships, but something like 10 millions sterling for the widening of the Kiel Canal—cannot win even the mastery of the German Ocean—the ambition of the "Admiral" of the Atlantic."

York

Sparkling Water ("SPARKS") is ideally pure spring water charged with purified carbonic gas. Its constant use as a beverage will surely give you a better digestion, a stronger stomach, and healthier blood. No water you ever drank is quite so refreshing, so zestful, so wholesome.

York Sparks quite lacks the salty taste common to imported charged waters; it does not change flavor in the slightest when mixed with spirits, but improves their taste while diluting their strength.

FOOTBALL.

How Hez. Tompkins Became a Convert.

Hezekiah Tompkins, shrewd and sedate,
With a smile that was crafty, and a well fashioned pate,

He adjusted the tariff now and then,
Put down the trusts with voice and pen,
And uplifted humanity time and again.

He hit women's rights such a vigorous slap
That the women denounced him an ill-tempered chap—
"Considerin' the source," he "cared not a rap."

He whipped the Russians with the war a week old,
"Them Japs air too slippery," said he, 'an' too bold;
They'll lay out the Cossacks still an' cold."

But of all the topics to which "Hez" rose supreme,
And made the old eagle rear up and scream,
There was none like football when that was his theme.

"It's a game just fur savages, nuthin' more," he'd declare,
With his lean, sinewy arms a sawing the air;
"I swan, 'taint sport, fur 'taint square nur fair.

"See 'em runnin' an' clawin' an' breakin' their bones,
Hear 'em shoutin', an' swearin', an' mark ye, the groans;
Hear the cries o' the injured their pitiful groans."

Then "Hez" would look 'round with his keen, flashing eye,
As if all creation he meant to defy,
And summon a thunderbolt down from the sky.

It was true that he never had seen a game played,
But a trifle like that needn't make one afraid—
If a spade is a spade—why, call it a spade!

Chance took him one day to a neighboring town,
Where two football teams of much renown
Were gathered to play on Miller's Down.

The rollicking crowd and the streets all gay,
With their bright hued flags in fluttering array,
Made "Hez" perk up and feel like play.

The fun and frolic which prevailed in the place
Reflected themselves on the young man's face,
And—well, the orator fell from grace.

He argued the question pro and con,
But as the crowd move off followed doggedly on,
'Till he found himself on the flank of the town.

"At least," he reasoned, "I've a good excuse,
Your Uncle Hez' ain't all a goose;
I'll find some facts as will be of use."

On a rough pine seat, high up from the ground,
"Hez" took his place and looked around
Sheepish like — for fear he'd be found.

The game began with a lofty kick,
That "Hez" admitted was "rather slick,"
And, considering the ball, a bit of a trick.

The shouts and the cheers and the volume of noise
Might have jarred on a man of lesser poise,
But to "Hez" 'twas only the racket o' boys.'

As the ball was caught from a forward pass
In a jiffy a squirming, sprawling mass
Had flattened the catcher on the grass.

"That's it!" yelled "Hez," with face aglow,
"Jes' look at that chap who's down below,
Who says he gets any kind of a show?"

But barely stopped by this little clash,
The players were up again like a flash
And over the field in a rapid dash.

"Jerusha!" said "Hez," "that feller's got grit;
I thought his collarbone must a' been split
So all fired far it never would knit."

Suddenly there rose a mighty shout,
As a sturdy lad, nimble and stout,
Broke through the line as it opened out.

With ball in hand he passed one back,
Then cleared another by clever tack,
Pursued full tilt by the frantic pack.

O'er the terraced seats there rose a roar
Like the fall of the waves on a wind swept shore,
"Go it!" they shouted; "Go on, you'll score!"

And Hezekiah Tompkins stood in his seat
No longer sedate, no longer discreet,
But shouting-like mad and stamping his feet.

"Run like the mischief, you redheaded brat!
Push 'em away from you, knock 'em down flat!
Look out for that pocket — keep out o' that!

"Now step to one side there, he's arter your legs:
Steady, boy, steady; you're still on your pegs.
Say, son, you're runnin' like treadin' on eggs.

"Only one more ahead of you. Jump, now, jump!
He's cleared him, by hokey, and all in a lump.
Let the brass horn blow and the big drum thump!"

The cheering subsided, and "Hez," cheeks aflame,
Devoid of remorse, bereft of shame,
Sat back to await the end of the game.

His tie was unknotted, disheveled his hair;
Without a regret he was, free from care
And recklessly glad that he happened there.

But Hezekiah Tompkins, shrewd and sedate,
With his way that's still crafty and his well balanced pate,
Shuns football now in the village debate.

Don't you think you had better try
To wear a smile and sing a song?
It's a good old world after all,
Provided you take Rocky Mountain Tea,
In the spring and fall.

The Nerve Centres

are capable of generating a certain amount of motive force, or nerve impulse, and no more. Whenever the call upon the centres exceed their ability to respond, the result is a disturbance somewhere. A large amount of motive force is utilized in the function of vision, even when it is performed under the easiest possible circumstances, but when there are defects in the eye and its appendages there is still greater demand for nerve force to bring about good vision. Each nerve centre is intimately connected and in delicate sympathy with all other centres of the nervous system. Of all the centres in the nervous system, which are the largest, most sensitive and most constantly in use? They are the nerve centres of SIGHT, which occupy one-third of the whole gray-matter area of the brain. Our "Repression" Glasses reverse the strain on these nerve centres.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE MARKS BROS.

"A Double Life" was the drama presented at the opera house last evening by the Marks Bros.' company, and, despite the inclement weather, the attendance was fair. In the play the various characters were well portrayed by the members of the company who took part. The specialties, as usual, were entertaining and thoroughly enjoyed. This evening the company's engagement will end, when they will present "Life in New York."

"HELLO, BILL!"

Simply phenomenal has been the success of the popular American comedian, Mr. George F. Hall, in his new musical comedy, "Hello, Bill!" which comes to the Carman on Monday next. He has been accorded a reception at every city he has appeared in, and his tour has been one continual round of crowded houses. This demonstrates beyond a shadow of a doubt that he is a welcome favorite in musical comedy, and his many friends will rejoice with him over his success. The vehicle selected for Mr. Hall is one of the bright musical comedies, so popular at the present time and was written especially for him by that rising young author, Mr. Matt Ott, and offers the members of the company an opportunity to appear in roles of a congenial sort. The musical numbers are all new and up-to-date, and the chorus is composed of pretty girls who know how to sing and dance.

"THE DUCHESS OF DEVONSHIRE."

The next attraction of merit at the Carman, on Thursday, Oct. 25, is Miss Roselle Knott in her new play "The Duchess of Devonshire," written expressly for her by Mrs. Charles A. Doremus, author of "By Right of Sword," "The Fortunes of the King," etc. It has always been the ambition of Mrs. Doremus to write a play for Miss Knott, that would not only offer scope for her great histrionic powers, but find a character that could be vitalized by her friend's beauty and graceful winning personality. As the Duchess of Devonshire was known not only as a great beauty but a woman of great personal charm as well, Mrs. Doremus feels satisfied she has found a character in history to which Miss Knott will do ample justice.

Murney, 7 and 8	11,845	9,725
	$167,079	$137,227
Decrease		$29,852.00

From the above statement it will be found—

That the city, as shown by the assessment, has made a healthy growth.

That the real estate has increased in value nearly $70,000, chiefly the result of new buildings, many of which are still in course of construction.

That the business assessment shows a small advance of $1,668.00, which really means a larger increase than represented by the figures, as the 1906 amendment to the Assessment Act reduced the minimum tax of $250.00 on small business concerns to $100.00, thereby reducing the assessment correspondingly.

That the income assessment shows a decrease of $29,852. This falling off is entirely owing to the 1906 amendment, which increased the exemptions on earnings to $1000 for householders and $600.00 for non-householders, whereas it was only $700 and $400 respectively before the change.

POPULATION.

It is satisfactory to be able to state that while the population increased by 255 during 1905, as shown by the assessment of last year, it has this year shown a still better growth, the increase for 1906 being 330.

The scarcity of vacant houses, the decided increase in rents and the amount of building under way and contracted for, goes to prove the enhanced value of real estate, and is the best evidence we could have of the city's advancement.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

H. PARKER THOMAS,
Assessor.

At Sign of the Scales.

AN INDIAN CASE.

The attention of the court was occupied this morning in hearing a case from the Indian Reserve. Mrs. Peter Bardy charged Levi Maracle with threatening to do her harm and a counter charge of assault was preferred against Mrs. Bardy by Maracle. The evidence in the charges was somewhat conflicting. Mr. Carnew appeared for Mrs. Bardy, and Mr. Denmark for Maracle.

As a result of the investigation Maracle was bound over to keep the peace and sureties were secured. He also had to pay $2.50 as costs of the proceedings.

Why Cheese Factory Was Dynamited.

It is thought that the dynamiting of Marble Spring cheese factory, at Bridgewater, was done to frighten the cheesemaker, Mr. Bert Booth, whose dog was poisoned the same night and died the next morning. The damage done was not serious. Two men, alleged enemies of the cheesemaker, are suspected, and a provincial detective may be set to work on the case.

Masonry's High Aims.

The Masonic Sun, published in Toronto, has the following among its "Excerpts from reports of the District Deputies":

"While the rulers of the Craft continue to impress upon the brethren the dignity and high importance of Freemasonry, while the brethren keep our lodges properly and discriminately tyled, so that each new candidate will be not merely strengthened by, but be a strength to Masonry, and one whom we may delight to meet and greet as friend and brother in all relations of life, while we strive only in that one permissible emulation of Masonry, namely, "who best may work who best agree," we will indeed build perhaps better than we know, and will be factors in the development of that grandest human organization to which we month by month and year by year pledge our undivided and continued allegiance." R. W. Bro. W. N. Ponton, Prince Edward District No. 13.

It is enough that a woman should be well and strong to be charming and beautiful, in order to be this she must take Hollister's Rocky Mountain Tea, one of the greatest beautifiers known. Tea or tablets, 35 cents.

Says Rates are Under Government Control

MR. WHITNEY SPEAKS WITH NO UNCERTAIN SOUND ON QUESTION OF ELECTRIC POWER.

It seems hard to make some people understand that the Hydro-Electric Power Commission will have the fixing of all rates for electric power in future, yet we have the word of no less a personage than Hon. Mr. Whitney himself that such will be the case. The Toronto World, on September 12th, printed the following, which fully explains the Government's policy on the power question, and particularly in regard to Healey Falls power:

"Premier Whitney was in consultation yesterday with Attorney-General J. J. Foy, Col. Matheson, Hon. W. J. Hanna, Dr. Pyne, J. P. Downey and Deputy Minister A. H. U. Colquhoun respecting the Healey Falls matter. The following statement was given out yesterday afternoon by the Premier:

"I believe the public mind is grasping the true phase of the question. There can be no surer safeguard than that the rates are under the control of the Government, and you must remember that the Government has never declared its intention to take hold and develop power.

"I think the whole matter will be satisfactorily cleared up in a day or so."

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from to drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

Net Fishing In Bay Of Quinte

DEPUTATION YESTERDAY ASKED DR REAUME THAT RESTRICTIONS BE RESCINDED.

A deputation from the Bay of Quinte district yesterday morning waited on Hon. Dr. Reaume, at Toronto, and asked that the restrictions on net fishing in the Bay of Quinte be rescinded.

Mr. Black of this city, was one of the deputation, and he told The Intelligencer this morning that Hon. Dr. Reaume, after hearing what the members of the deputation had to say, told them "to go ahead and fish with nets." Mr. Black did not, however, hear the Hon. Minister say this personally, as he left the room after he had stated his view of the matter. Some other members of the deputation, however, who had stayed till the finish, told him that it was all right, and Hon. Dr. Reaume had made the remarks quoted above.

The Toronto Telegram's report, however, does not go quite so far as the members of the Bay of Quinte deputation. The Telegram thus reports the interview:

"Hon. Dr. Reaume listened to a deputation this morning from the Bay of Quinte district. The interviewers were headed by Mr. T. G. Carscallen, M.P.P. for Lennox, and they came asking that the Government rescind the restrictions on both commercial and sporting fishing in the bay. Up to last season both kinds of fishing were allowed, but on reports of the overseers that the waters were being depleted of fish, especially of bass, the department cut off the privileges in the hope of restocking. The Minister told the deputation he would think the matter over."

CAN FISH WITH NETS FOR BALANCE OF THIS YEAR.

Toronto, Oct. 20.—Hon. Dr. Reaume, who yesterday received a deputation from the Bay of Quinte district, which asked that restrictions on net fishing be removed, has decided to allow the fishing for the balance of the season, in view of the fact that many fishermen had made preparations on the strength of promises which had been given by the Department of Fisheries while he was away. The privilege, however, will be for the balance of the season only, and future action will be decided upon later.

About $4000 worth of apples were destroyed.

The building was insured for one thousand dollars, but the contents were not insured.

The Oven That Ends Guesswork

Before you put the roast in an Imperial Oxford oven, let the draft bring the heat to the right point. You'll know when it gets there if you'll look at the oven thermometer. After the roast goes in, you can know (not guess) it will be cooked right in a certain definite time. There's no ups-and-downs to the oven-heat in a range built as this one is,—the diffusive oven-flue takes all the guess work out of cooking, all the drudgery out of oven-use

That Rack That Ends Bother

When the roast needs basting, pull forth the Imperial Oxford draw-out oven rack,—roast and all—slide it right out where you can get at it. Needn't reach in and scorch your fingers nor sear your wrists,—baste it in comfort. That one thing alone—the draw-out rack—ought to make you like this range above all ranges. And that's only one of the twelve better things about this range. Come and look.

REMANDED FOR A WEEK

Ontario Bank Officials Arraigned in Court.

Charles McGill, Ex-General Manager, Does Not Elect or Plead, But Mr. Cockburn Pleads "Not Guilty"—Attitude Between the Two Was of the Most Frigid Character—Charges as Read by the Magistrate.

Toronto, Oct. 20.—The preliminaries in the criminal proceedings arising out of the collapse of the Ontario Bank only occupied the attention of the Police Court for about ten minutes yesterday morning. Both Chas. McGill and G. R. R. Cockburn were remanded for one week.

Mr Cockburn, who is charged with signing the statements Mr. McGill is charged with preparing, stood near his follow-defendant in court yesterday, but they did not speak as they passed by. The temperature between them was several degrees below normal.

McGill Did Not Plead Or Elect.

The first defendant called was the late general manager. Col. Denison read the indictment, which alleged that the defendant, "being the general manager of the Ontario Bank, a body corporate, did make statements and returns to the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General, known by him, Charles McGill, to be false, in material particulars, to wit, in the information returned and shown under the heading of "current loans in Canada," the amounts there shown being in excess of the true amount of about one million dollars, with intent to deceive the shareholders and creditors of the said bank."

Mr. E. F. B. Johnston asked for a week's remand. "I do not know the particulars," he said, "and desire time to examine into the case." Mr. James Bicknell, who assisted Crown Attorney Corley, added that the prosecution was not yet ready. The magistrate set October 26th as the date for the next appearance of the defendant.

Mr. Cockburn Pleads "Not Guilty."

"What about Mr. Cockburn," enquired his Worship.

The president of the defunct bank had been sitting at the lawyers' table with his counsel, Mr. Frank Arnoldi, K.C., and immediately rose, while Col. Denison read the charge that he "wilfully made false monthly returns to the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General under the provisions of 'the Bank Act, 1890.'"

"We are ready to go on to-day," said Mr. Arnoldi, "if the Crown is prepared."

Mr. Bicknell replied that the case would have to stand over with the other, and the counsel for the defence announced, "Well, Mr. Cockburn pleads not guilty."

Mr. Cockburn left immediately in company with his counsel; the magistrate renewed Charles McGill's bail of $50,000.

James Bicknell, K.C., represented the Bankers' Association during the proceedings. Crown Attorney Corley and County Crown Attorney Drayton represented the Crown.

MISTAKEN FOR MAYOR

Lumberman Gets Bad Beating at Masson Station, Que.

Supposition Is That Frank Kingsbury Was Attacked by Strikers Who Mistook Him For Mayor Vallilee, MacLaren's Manager, Whom Buckingham Strikers Regard With Great Enmity—Strikers Shot First.

Buckingham, Que., Oct. 20.—Detective Picard, who was wounded in last week's strike riot here, was the principal witness at the inquest yesterday morning. He said that he was shot by Hilaire Charette, one of the prominent rioters.

F. Smith, another witness, swore he saw Alexander Maclaren firing a revolver, but that was not until after the strikers had begun to fire. He saw rifles brought to the scene of the riot in a buggy and distributed among the strikers. The strikers began the firing, he stated.

Bailiff Cummings was the first man stretched out. He was hit with a club. Chief of Police Kiernan stated on Wednesday that Cummings fell back into his arms when he was hit, but Smith yesterday swore Cummings fell on the ground.

Some of the evidence is very contradictory. The inquest was adjourned owing to Picard feeling faint.

Louis Renaud, one of the witnesses, swore that the police fired fifteen to twenty shots before the strikers opened fire, while other evidence had gone to show the reverse.

Albert Maclaren, one of the proprietors of the mill, could not say who fired first.

Mistaken For Mayor, Is Beaten.

The finding of Frank Kingsbury in an unconscious state near Masson Station Thursday night created considerable alarm among Buckingham people, and the impression went abroad that strike hostilities were not yet ended.

The supposition is that Kingsbury was mistaken for Mayor Vallilee, manager of the Maclaren Co., on account of his driving outfit, and was attacked by strikers, who have greater enmity for the manager than they have for the Maclarens.

Kingsbury is employed as a yardman for W. H. Kelly, a Buckingham lumber manufacturer. He went to meet his employer, who was coming from Ottawa by train. When Mr. Kelly reached Masson he found his horse and buggy waiting alone. He looked around for the driver, and soon discovered Kingsbury lying on the road in a helpless state.

Kingsbury was cut about the head in several places, and was unable to tell what had happened. Kelly could not gather from him whether or not there had been a runaway, but that seemed unlikely.

Even after several hours, he was unable to explain the curious incident, saying that he remembered nothing from the time he drove down the hill.

At Woodstock College there 159 students, and at Moulton College, Toronto, 155, making a total of 501 for the university. The library now had 15,200 volumes.

ASTONISHED THE DOCTOR

Physician said She Might Drop Dead at any time.

MRS. ROBERT EATON

"The Doctor told me I had heart disease and was liable to drop on the street at any time," says Mrs. Robert Eaton, of Dufferin, Ont. "I was afraid to draw my breath, it pained me so. I was nervous, short of breath, had dizziness, loss of appetite, smothering and sinking spells, and I could not sleep.

"Sometimes I would have to lie down to keep from falling. My hands and feet would seem to go to sleep and a sort of numbness would come all over me.

"I began using Dr. Leonhardt's Anti-Pill. From the start I improved. I feel much stronger, look better, and altogether Anti-Pill has made a new woman of me.

Boils and Pimples

Red Rash, Eczema, in fact any skin disease, disfigures the complexion because the bowels are constipated—or because the kidneys do not rid the system of waste—or because the skin itself is unhealthy.

Ointments, salves and soaps are useless. Because the trouble is with the blood.

Owing to defective action of bowels, kidneys or skin, the blood becomes laden with impurities. It is these impurities—deposited by the blood—that make boils, pimples, and painful, disfiguring skin diseases. It is because the trouble is with the bowels, kidneys or skin, that FRUIT-A-TIVES cure these diseases

Fruit-a-tives

SAYS PETER RYAN KNEW

Reserve Bids in the Miller-Beck Timber Deal.

Aubrey White, Deputy Minister of Crown Lands, Contradicts the Evidence of Mr. Ryan—Treated Ryan as a Government Official and Discussed tha Reserved Bids With Him —Mr. Beck's List Corresponded.

Toronto, Oct. 22.—Aubrey White, deputy Minister of Crown Lands, gave evidence on Saturday morning in the Miller-Beck timber deal, which was contrary to the testimony given by Peter Ryan. Justice MacMahon heard the evidence, with E. F. B. Johnston, K. C., examining on behalf of Ryan, and James Bicknell, K. C., for Beck.

The suit began over timber lands bought at the Government auction by Beck, when Peter Ryan was auctioneer. Beck swore that Peter Ryan had given him the Government's reserve prices on the different berths. Ryan denied this, and further said that he had no information previous to the auction as to the reserve prices. Mr. Beck showed a list of prices which he stated Ryan had given him.

Aubrey White testified that he had treated Ryan as a Government official and had discussed the reserved bids with him. In answer to questions from Mr. Bicknell, Mr. White stated that Mr. Ryan had the book with the reserved bids the day before the sale. He further stated that he had compared Mr. Beck's list of figures with the list of reserved bids in his books, and they corresponded.

To Mr. Johnston he stated that the prices received for the berths in question were higher than had before been received.

Judgment was reserved.

ONTARIO BANK AFFAIRS.

Justice Mabee Declines to Grant a Winding-Up Order.

Toronto, Oct. 22.—Franklin Bates Polson, owner of 120 shares of Ontario Bank stock, applied through his attorney, James Bicknell, of Bicknell and Bain, for a winding-up order for the bank on Saturday before Justice Mabee at Osgoode Hall.

J. H. Moss opposed the motion on the grounds of an affidavit made by W. E. Stavert, curator of the bank, to the effect that "a winding-up order would result in the most serious loss to the shareholders of the bank, both by reason of depreciation of the assets through forced liquidation, and by reason of the great additional cost which would be thereby thrown upon the estate."

Justice Mabee concurred in this view and adjourned the motion sine die, giving either party the privilege of reviving it on 24 hours' notice.

Crushed By the Waves.

Str. Jennie Saves 49 Out of 150 Men On Houseboat in Gale.

Harrowing Tale of Death and Destruction Told By Survivor of Key West Storm—Thirty Or Forty Men Crushed to Death In Collapse Of Houseboat —Another Houseboat With 150 Men May Have Shared Same Fate.

Key West, Fla., Oct. 22.—Survivors from one of the houseboats of the Florida east coast railway extension along the Keys tell a harrowing tale of death and destruction caused by the storm of Thursday.

Crushed by the Waves.

W. P. Dusenbery, civil engineer in charge of the work on Long Key, who wonderfully escaped death, arrived here on the Austrian steamer Jennie, among other survivors rescued.

He said houseboat No. 4, on which were 150 men, was struck by the storm early Thursday morning, and was driven out into the gulf. The houseboat soon began to break up, and as the great waves hit her, men, singly and in twos and threes, were washed into the sea and drowned. Some went below for protection, but when the top of the boat was carried away the waves rushed in and the boat soon went to pieces. Thirty or forty of the men were crushed to death in the collapse.

Men Cling to Timbers.

The others grabbed timbers to save them from drowning. Mr. Dusenbery was in the hold, but succeeded in getting a log, and floated until Friday night. To one piece of timber sixteen men were clinging; nine were hanging to another. The sides of the houseboat were crowded with men. It turned over three times, each time reducing the number.

The Jennie sighted the wreckage, and succeeded in rescuing the forty-nine men who were brought here. Three other steamers, with searchlights, were picking up dead and alive men when the Jennie left the scene.

There was another houseboat with 150 men on board on Long Key, which Mr. Dusenbery thinks was also swept to sea.

Picked Up at Sea. 6

Miami, Fla., Oct. 22.—The steamer Virginia, with 21 bodies from the ill-fated steamer St. Lucie, arrived here Saturday from Elliott's Key.

A partial list of the survivors of the wreck contains the names of John Feeney, Buffalo, and Joseph Jury, Burlington, Vt.

A wireless message was received Saturday night from the Standard Oil steamer Lucas, 200 miles out at sea, announcing that she picked up at sea Friday morning, 25 miles from Flowery Creek lighthouse, seven men, all of whom were employes of the Florida Fish & Produce Co. Their boat broke loose, and they were carried out to sea, where the Lucas rescued them after a thrilling experience.

Lost Off Vessels.

Jacksonville, Fla., Oct. 22.—A special to The Metropolis from Miami, Fla., says.

The Miami steamer St. Lucie was crushed by the high waves in Thursday's hurricane, and out of 100 persons on board 25 were lost. The steamer Peerless also lost about the same number, they being blown off the vessel. The launch Elmora was capsized, and is thought to be a total loss.

NEAR VALENCIA WRECK.

The Daisy After Battle with Storm Disappears.

Victoria, B. C., Oct. 22.—The marine graveyard of the North Pacific has won another headstone, the schooner Daisy, hailing from one of the Puget Sound ports, being reported to have foundered off Pachena (not far from where the Valencia met her doom), with all hands on board.

E. E. Hardwick, arriving from Close yesterday, states that last Saturday afternoon he and others sighted a small fishing schooner battling with the wind and waves some distance off the coast. There were several occupants.

As the wind was blowing hard, and a tremendous sea running, Mr. Hardwick and those watching with him followed the movements of the schooner with anxiety, feeling sure that she could not live long under such difficulties. The next day D. Logan found a plank, apparently from a sailboat, upon which was printed the name "Daisy."

Both have reached the conclusion that the fishermen manning the schooner Daisy came to their death by drowning in the recent storm.

180 ARE DROWNED.

Russian Coasting Steamer Struck a Floating Mine and Foundered.

London, Oct. 22.—A despatch received here from Vladivostock by Lloyd's agency says the Russian wooden coasting steamer Warjagin struck a floating mine and foundered on Oct. 20.

A portion of her passengers and crew were saved, but the remainder, numbering 180 persons, were drowned.

THREE BROTHERS DROWN.

Gale Upset Skiff and They Never Reached Home.

Hubbard's, N. S., Oct. 22.—Three brothers, sons of Freeman Young of Dover, were drowned on their way in a sailboat from Ingram Port to Dover.

The boys, the oldest of whom was about 18, had been given money last Tuesday morning to go to the lumber mills at Ingram Port for a load of firewood.

They reached here, got their load, which not only filled the sailboat, but also a dory they had in tow. They sailed for home on Tuesday evening, but never reached there. Driftwood and oars were washed ashore at Seabright, and it is supposed that these came from their boat, which, doubtless, was capsized off that point in the gale that blew so fiercely.

Falls Off Scow, Drowns.

Kingston, Oct. 22.—John Nobes, carpenter, was knocked off a scow Saturday night, while going to the Thousand Islands Park with lumber. His two companions could not find him owing to the darkness, and the old man perished. His body was washed ashore at Wolfe Island and discovered yesterday morning.

Indian Ferryman Drowned.

Cornwall, Oct. 22.—Peter Mitchell, a Cornwall Island Indian, was drowned at International Park, Massena Point, just across the river from here, Saturday night. He had been ferrying parties from the Point to Cornwall, and fell out of his boat. The body was recovered yesterday morning.

Falls From Scow and Drowns.

Port Burwell, Que., Oct. 22.—Early Saturday, Bruce McKinnon of this place, who has been employed by the Manley Co. as scowman on the dredge St. Lawrence, fell off the scow and was drowned before help arrived. He could not swim.

Bavarian Fast.

Quebec, Oct. 22.—Attempts to float the steamer Bavarian have been abandoned.

Canadians in the United States.

The Western British - American made the recent visit of James J. Hill to Chicago the text for an interesting article on Canadians in the U.S. Mr. Hill had just completed his four hundred million dollar mining deal. The British-American said;

"Mr. Hill's presence in Chicago, together with the publication the day before of the facts regarding the astounding price at which he had sold his iron ore to the U. S. Steel Corporation made him for the time one of the most talked about personages and outstanding figures in the commercial world in America.

"The fact that Mr. Hill is a Canadian by birth and grew to young manhood before leaving his Ontario home for the West should give every Canadian-born citizen in this country a thrill of pride. Mr. Hill is an evidence of what a Canadian can do. This country is full of Canadian-born citizens who have proved in a hundred ways the quality of their make-up. Physically, mentally, morally they have been a blessing to this land. As professors in our colleges, as ministers in our churches, as teachers, as bankers, merchants, captains of industry they have made their mark indelibly on things here, and their influence has almost invariably been for good, not evil.

"Only the past week Henry J. Morgan, of Ottawa, thought it necessary to write to an Ottawa publication contradicting an assertion of a Toronto writer that the people of the United States were not friendly to Canada. Of course they are friendly. They have no better citizens in all this republic than former Canadians, and they know it. Why should they not be friendly—unless it might be because of a little feeling of huffiness because Canadians take so many of the good places of the country from them?

"Canadians, as we have said, have been to the fore in many lines, particularly in educational affairs, but James J. Hill has come to the front in a line Americans have been led to regard as peculiarly their own—railroading. No greater master of railroading exists in America than Mr. Hill, and what a position he holds! The general who loves to plan campaigns and to carry them out in the field has no greater work on hand than Mr. Hill To construct a railroad, to equip it, to nurse and feed the industries along its lines, to lay far reaching plans which develop and attract trade, to anticipate the expansions of business and to keep every wheel of the rolling stock busy and earning money, is to occupy a position of power such as the greatest business man alive might envy if its responsibility did not frighten him. And it would not frighten him if he were of the calibre of Jim Hill."

TIMELY TOPICS.

The leaves came down in a shower lately. Some of the trees are sailing under bare poles already.

• • •

Rather gives one the shivers, doesn't it, when he sees the bare trees and reflects that winter is only just round the corner. But cheer up. Get a good edge on your snow shovel and you'll be all right.

• • •

The Belleville police are great believers in exercise. That must be why they keep the young fellows moving on Front St. There are not nearly so many corner statues nowadays as there used to be. Good for the cops.

I went down in the mud.

(From Front St. After the Fall, a descriptive poem, by the man on the next block.)

We fail to hear, these days, any roars about empty cisterns. Some farmers are already complaining of too much rain.

• • •

The following story, which has the merit of being true, shows how one Belleville youngster combines originality with slang: Reading in a Sunday school paper, a member of the family read aloud the Biblical verse: "Even the hairs of our head are numbered." Glancing at his father, whose pate is rather bare, the bad boy of the family said;—"Dad, your hairs must have been numbered twenty-three."

Even peaceful Belleville must furnish its quota to the every day list of awful casualties with which the newspapers of to-day are filled.

Swift and terrible was the death which came to poor Rien and Bowler. The sympathy of all people will be extended to the sorrowing relatives.

WINDSOR TABLE SALT won't cake. It is PURE—clean, dry crystals that dissolve instantly. Perfect for the table.

To the good ladies of the Methodist Missionary body, who this week will honor our city with their presence, the Intelligencer, in the name of the citizens of Belleville, extends a hearty welcome. The divine command, "Go ye into the world and teach all nations" could not be obeyed but for the self-sacrificing work of the women, who, in every land and in every clime, are the backbone of all religious things. All honor to the faithful ladies. May the session which begins tomorrow in this city be a profitable one, and the visit of the ladies pleasant.

THEY WERE "TIGHT WADS."

(Hamilton Spectator.)

Tay Pay got about 75 cents each out of his Toronto audience. A mighty poor modern American musical farce could do better than that in the same town.

• • •

The Toronto Telegram thus waxes sarcastic;

"The future of Canada was the theme of Earl Grey's remarks to the Canadian Club at Vancouver.

"How did his Excellency ever happen to think of it?

"The subject has never been heard of before in these parts.

"Canada has yearned and cherished a Long-Felt Want for an orator with the originality that discovers and the courage that discusses the novel subject of Earl Grey's eloquence at Vancouver."

Come to think of it, we believe The Telegram is mistaken. We HAVE heard one or two more or less brilliant orators tear off a few remarks about the future of Canada. Haven't you?

A Toronto paper contributes the following roast on Rugby football, which perhaps, is much nearer the truth than some of the things you read in this editorial columns;

"Yes, Rugby is a great game, but you have to be crazy to play it. It is not for weaklings. Arrayed in his padded togs and knee-caps, and shoulder protectors, and padded hood; with his clothes six inches thick and his shoes weighing more than dancing pumps by a great deal, these modern gladiators are ready to furnish a Roman Holiday" any day, and ask for nothing in return but the glory.

"And the public at large sits and wishes it was all over. The shivering mass, with the cold wind going to the bone shakes enough to give the stand a rocking motion, they stick it out, and most of them know as much about football as the stand itself. You have to be crazy to play, and next door crazy to look at it."

The London Saturday Review raps Sir Wilfrid Laurier over the knuckles rather handsomely for some remarks that loose-tongued person made at the T. P. O'Connor meeting at Ottawa. This is not the first time Sir Wilfrid has exemplified the truth of the homely old proverb; "Any fool can talk, but it takes a wise man to know when to keep still." The Saturday Review says;

"We are surprised so clever a man as Laurier should not see the absurdity and impropriety of his position. The domestic politics of Great Britain are no business of the Government of the Dominion. Individual Canadians may think and say what they like about Home Rule; their opinions cannot be valuable because they cannot be cognizant of the facts, but they would be the harmless utterances of a private person. The Premier of the Dominion, however, speaking at a public meeting, is held to represent the sentiments of the Dominion."

A gentleman shows us a letter which the postmark shows to have arrived in Belleville on the 15th. Enquiry, he says, was made every day at the wicket, but the latter was not delivered till to-day. The letter contained money, for which the party to whom it was addressed was anxiously waiting. Such incidents as this point conclusively to the fact that something should be speedily done to better conditions in the local post office.

THE NEXT MOVE.

(Mail and Empire.)

Sinclair, the Prince Albert returning officer who was tried for allowing the ballot-boxes to be stuffed, and for appointing the men who did the work, has been acquitted by the judge on the ground that he was being prosecuted under the wrong statute! It only remains now for the Laurier Government to give this man a remunerative berth.

RUBBER

When you buy rubber it pays to get it. There are few things in which quality counts for more than in rubber goods.

The demands of our trade require us to carry more than one quality of rubber goods, but each quality is sold for what it is, and is sold at an honest price. We carry practically everything in the line of Syringes, Hot-water Bottles, Sick-room Supplies, etc.

Belleville District Epworth League.

The twelfth annual convention of the Belleville District Epworth League was held in the Methodist Church, Corbyville, on Oct. 19, 1906.

Owing to a steady downpour of rain the attendance was small, but those present all united in saying that it was a very helpful convention though all those were not present on the programme.

Rev. S. F. Dixon, B.A., Conference Epworth League President, was present and gave two helpful addresses on "Summer Schools," and "Conference League work."

Mr. J. G. Goddard explained the aim and conduct of the "Who Am I?" exhibit, kindly loaned by Dr. Stephenson, Toronto. It was decided to purchase this library and pass it from league to league on the district.

Prof. Doxsee read a letter of greeting from their missionary, Dr. Wrinch, Hazelton, B. C., in which he said that he hoped that this year the work on the mission would be self-supporting.

SPORTING NOTES.

The Tecumsehs were soundly walloped in Ottawa Saturday, the Caps winning the deciding lacrosse match by 10 to 2, making a total of 14 to 3 on the round. The Toronto crowd have been in and outers all season, but at the last they showed up like rank quitters.

Hamilton Tigers, at Rugby, beat Toronto Victorias 48 to 1 on Saturday. All coons seem to look alike to the Tigers

In the Quebec Rugby Union, on Saturday, Montreal beat Westmount 46 to 0. It must have been an awful slaughter.

"Buck" Ewing, the famous catcher of the old New York Nationals, is dead. In his prime he was considered by many the best ball player living. The man who could steal second on "Buck" Ewing needed wings, and as a baseball general he was par excellence.

A Winnipeg despatch says: "The Proncho, 2.00 3-4, the pacing queen of the world, will not be seen on the track again this year. Perfectly recovered from her recent most mysterious trouble, she is now in winter quarters at Palatine, Ill. She retired for the season with a clean sheet, not having lost a single heat during the year.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

"HELLO BILL" TO-NIGHT.

The costumes in "Hello Bill," which comes to the Carman to-night, are beautiful and are said to have cost a small fortune. Mr. Hall, the clever star, will play a light comedy character, a distinct departure from the type of character portrayed by him in years past. His versatility will be ably demonstrated and his songs will be all new. Manager Frank W. Nason has surrounded him with a company numbering some 24 people, and an organization that is well-nigh flawless is the result. Mr. Nason has brought us many of his attractions in the past and none of them has been other than good. Theatre-goers should crowd the Carman to-night.

THE DUCHESS OF DEVONSHIRE.

The play "The Duchess of Devonshire," which comes to the Carman next Thursday night, affords great opportunity for lavishness in scenery, settings, properties and costumes, and every advantage of the many openings along the line has been taken by Mr. Ernest Shipman, by whom the play is being produced, with the result that it is one of the most gorgeously equipped in the country. From a standpoint of scenic investiture it is well worth seeing, but when the company producing it is taken into consideration and thought over, he who misses an opportunity to see it must have very urgent business to attend to on the night of its presentation.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

Mr. P. J. Wims has closed his branch store at Campbellford and will devote all his time to his business in this city.

Mr David Farrell, of Sine, was severely injured on Tuesday last. He was driving a load of cheese to Stirling when the whiffletrees broke and the horses became unmanagable. The doctors have slight hope of recovery. He is a son of Mr. William Farrell.

Walking in Dr. Reed Cushion shoes is like walking on a padded carpet. They are made for Men and Women. For sale only at Gorman's.

Madoc Methodist Church are having difficulty in securing a minister. There is a shortage of seventeen ministers in Bay of Quinte Conference.

How many women have said I paid a good price for those shoes and have only worn them a few weeks, and look how they are out of shape and are sloppy, and feel uncomfortable. I am going to "Gorman's" and buy a pair of "Hagar" shoes. They always keep their shape and wear the best, and are newest in style.

THE BAPTISTS

ENCOURAGING REPORT FROM PUBLICATIONS AT THE PETERBORO CONVENTION —FINANCIAL STATEMENT SATISFACTORY.

Peterboro, Oct. 19. — To-day was educational day at the Baptist convention. Rev. J. C. Sycamon, of Hamilton, presented an encouraging report from the Canadian Baptist department, which now has 6,130 subscribers. In the book room the purchases for the year amounted to $16,700, and the cash sales $10,958,71. The total increase of sales over last year was $2,776,29. One hundred churches are using the new hymn book. The net result of the year's business of the Standard Publishing Company showed a profit of $2,366,94. The matter of the publication of a Sunday school paper was being carefully considered.

G. A. Roberts, of Toronto, criticized the report of the book room. Mr. Warren, business manager, and others took part in the discussion. Rev L. S. Hughson seconded the report, which was adopted. The following were elected as a new Publication Board; Rev. L. S. Hughson, Windsor; Rev. P. K. Dayfoot, Simcoe, and Bro. D. Bentley, Montreal.

Rev. J. B. Brown, of Sherbrooke, presented the seventieth annual report of the Grand Ligne Mission Board The work had been marvellously sustained during all these years. The report referred to the work at Feller Institute as having 203 resident boarders.

At Grand Ligne church, 25 candidates had been baptised and the total revenue of this church was $759.30. In numerous other places the report showed the greatest encouragement for the continuance of the work. The financial statement showed receipts of $21,414,61, made up as follows: Quebec, $2,985,87; Ontario, $8,923,69; United States, $2,791,93; Great Britain, $817.73; Maritime Provinces, $1,574.68; from the West, $385.45; legacies, $3,547.01. The debit balance is $2,564.57. The cash on hand amounts to $4,097.56.

CHURCH CHIMES OF YESTERDAY.

NOTES OF SERVICES IN BELLEVILLE'S DIFFERENT PLACES OF WORSHIP.

St. Andrew's.

The pastor, Rev. R. S. Laidlaw, officiated at both services. In the evening his subject was "A Worthy Prime Minister." His text was from Genesis, 41st, chapter, 38th to 40th verses. Miss N. Lazier, in fine voice, sang a solo entitled "Tears of Christ."

Emmanuel R. E. Church.

A large congregation was present at the above church last night, and the service was bright and inspiring. An orchestra led the singing, which was very hearty. The Rector, Rev. Mr. Hubly, gave an interesting talk on the origin and authorship of the last hymn sung, "Old Coronation," which was the subject of much complimentary comment among the congregation. The choir sang, in fine style, "Praise Ye Jehovah," accompanied by the orchestra.

Christ Church.

"Condoning Sin" was the subject discussed last evening by the rector, Rev. R. C. Blagrave. His text was from St. Luke, 16th chapter and 8th verse:

> "And the lord commended the unjust steward because he had done wisely, for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light."

During the service Mrs. A. G. Parker sang a solo entitled "These are They," from "The Holy City." Her sweet voice was heard to much advantage in the selection, and the congregation of Christ Church listened to her again with pleasure.

TWO FAMOUS HYMNS BARRED

"NEARER, MY GOD, TO THEE" AND "LEAD, KINDLY LIGHT."

Newark, N. J., Oct. 20.—Bishop Jno. J. O'Connor has sent an order to all the Roman Catholic pastors in the Diocese of Newark, warning them that the hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," must not be sung hereafter in any Catholic church in the diocese, and that the hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," may only be sung in a church after the service is over, provided the pastor has given his permission. The latter hymn was written by Cardinal Newman before his conversion to Catholicism. Bishop O'Connor cites a rigid rule of the Church that nothing may be sung except a part of the liturgical service, and that the hymns mentioned do not come under that head.

SO THE OLD FOLKS SAY.

(Pall Mall Gazette.)

The old folks say, The times are changing,
The bygone years were surely best;
O'er land and sea, forever ranging,
Men wander now in vague unrest;
And faded are the green romances,
The morning light had died away,
The world has lost its golden chances
So the old folks say.

The old folks say, The days are duller
The sweet songs are left unsung,
The spring was full of scent and color,
Long, long ago, when we were young.
Above our heads the sky was clearer,
And warmer was the sunlight ray;
Yet heaven is now a little nearer,
So the old folks say.

The old folks say, 'Tis Maytime weather,
Play, children, to your heart's desire,
But leave us hand in hand together,
Beside the swiftly failing fire.
For earthly chains are near their breaking,
And eyes are dim, and locks are gray,
But Love's a dream that knows no waking,
So the old folks say.

Referring to place names reminds one that the case of the Hudson Bay Co. in seeing that its title is spelled as above has led countless people to refer to Canada's inland sea as Hudson's Bay. It is no more Hudson's Bay than certain other natural features are Hudson's River, or Mackenzie's River. The proper name is Hudson Bay. It is so on the authorized maps and in the standard geographies, and it is specifically so designated by the authority for settling such matters in Canada, the Georgaphical Board. Gentle reader! don't let people delude you with the idea that to "speak proper" you must say Hudson's Bay.

The Ruling Passion.

No self respecting actor will admit that his show is not drawing full houses every night. One of the profession who plays juvenile parts recently met a leading man on the Rialto. The leading man was dressed in deep black. There was a wide band of crape on his hat, and he had discarded the patent leather shoes an actor loves for others of a subdued polish that spoke of grief.

"What's the matter?" asked the juvenile.

"My father is dead," answered the leading man in a heartbroken voice.

The juvenile expressed his sympathy. "When did he die?" he asked.

"Last week. We buried him today—a nice funeral," answered the heartbroken one.

"Large attendance?" asked the juvenile.

A smile of enthusiastic delight flashed over the mourner's face. "Large attendance?" he cried. "My boy, we turned 'em away."

"Hail Columbia's" First Rendition.

"Hail Columbia" was written in 1798 by Joseph Hopkinson when congress, in session at Philadelphia, was debating what attitude to assume in the struggle between France and England. Party feeling ran high, and the air was surcharged with patriotic enthusiasm. A young actor in the city who was about to have a benefit came to Hopkinson in despair and said that twenty boxes remained unsold, and it looked as if the proposed benefit would prove a failure. If Hopkinson would write him a patriotic song adapted to the tune of "The President's March," then popular, it would save the day. The following afternoon the song was ready. It was duly advertised, the house was packed, and in wild enthusiasm the song was encored and re-encored.

One Side of the Mouth.

Did you ever meet a stranger who talked from one side of his mouth, usually in an undertone and with his eyes wandering while talking? The man's manner is not an indication that he is weighing his words or has something important to tell. It is almost a sure sign that he has spent years in jail. This manner of talking is acquired in prison, where conversation among prisoners is prohibited and where the men have to talk out of one side of their mouths in order to prevent the keeper from noticing that conversation is going on. The habit sticks to the convicts for years after they get out.

One at a Time.

Women do not mass as well as men do. They lose by aggregation. A street car full of women makes walking seem attractive. A regiment of men is pleasing. A regiment of women would be disturbing. So there are some flowers that, although individually charming, do not bunch well. Taken in large groups, women are objectionable. It is as individuals or in small squads that they are so incomparably interesting.—Life.

HAT TRICKS OF M.P'S

REMARKABLE WAY OF CINCHING "SEAT" IN BRITISH COMMONS.

Hat May Become an Ornament of Debate — How Sir Frank Lockwood's Utility Hat Held the Fort For Him —Two-Hat Trick Spoiled by Over Popularity — A Member's Corporeal Presence Is Necessary Now.

It is one thing to possess a hat, and another to know what to do with it. In the British House of Commons the rules and regulations concerning hats are many and varied. For instance, an honorable member may wear a hat while in his seat, but he must on no account put it on before he gets there, and he must take it off as he leaves. A member sauntering in and out of the sacred precincts with his hat on would raise a din loud enough to awaken the seven sleepers, and catch the Speaker's eye into the bargain. Another rule concerning hats is that when the House has been cleared for a division, a member is not permitted to address the Speaker without a hat on. They do say that on one occasion the G.O.M. could have worn a bucket or a punch-bowl without being wholly lost to sight and memory dear; but that is another story.

An M. P. can do things with a top-hat which he could do but ingloriously and ineffectively with a cap. There is no glory in a cap, and this is why Mr. Keir Hardie has never attained unto the same. A top-hat can be utilized as a repository for a written speech or a hidden newspaper, both luxuries forbidden.

Ornament of Debate.

It may even be sat upon to give finish and eclat to a peroration, and in this way it has become an ornament of debate in many a maiden speech. You can drop down on a cap after asking a searching question on the political situation in Timbuctoo, and it is still as good as ever it was; but sit on a shining topper in the same circumstances, and lo, it is no more! It can only be used afterwards as a wind instrument in a concertina band.

The O'Brien—he was shivered in his undergarment because wicked Irish gaolers stole his never-mention-thems—once did a fine oratorical performance with a top-hat. It is a detail that the glory was accidental, and that the hat was not his own. He was orating on the woes of Erin, and, raising his hand with one of those mighty gestures which have given him a reputation and a name, he drove home his argument with such thrilling force on the headgear of a "gintleman from the sister isle" that the House began to wonder whether the honorable member would ever be rescued. But the mightiest record still belongs to C.-B., who has had the unspeakable honor of having his hat banged off his head, and trundled down the floor of the House twice in succession by a declamatory enthusiast who sat behind him.

Hat Held Fort For Him.

Those were days when you could get even more out of a top-hat when you tried hard than you can to-day. The hat-trick was then a lovely, subtle ingenious thing. One day the late Sir Frank Lockwood, lawyer, good fellow, and gentleman through and through, dropped into the House at five o'clock in the morning, left a utility hat which he kept for the purpose in his locker, drove to his chamber, read up the case of Regina versus somebody or other, had breakfast at the Cock, and then went up to the Old Bailey Court and cheated the gallows of his respected client. All the while his utility hat had been holding the fort for him.

When he entered the House again an Irish member, crowded out of the seats below, was requesting the ruling of the Speaker on the point whether a member could deposit one hat in his seat, and then leave the House to pursue his ordinary avocations in another hat, while another poor fellow, crowded out, was driven to address the House from the roof. The Speaker ruled against two hats for one head, and so Lockwood relented. That was Sir Frank Lockwood's own account, and part of it, at all events, is history.

Two-Hat Trick Spoiled.

While it lasted, the two hat-trick could not be beaten; but, like all good things, it was spoiled by over-popularity. Busy merchants and stockbrokers used to enter the House with squash hats under their arms, inflate the hats by the touch of a spring, deposit them on the seats they like best, and go their ways to ply a roaring trade.

From hats it got to gloves. The rather startling Dr. Tanner once entered the House with an armful of hats to peg out claims for Erin, and when he had used them up, took off his coat, and made an effort to set up freehold and ancient rights for the seat it covered. The wicked say, too, that on the introduction of the Home Rule Bill, Mr. Austen Chamberlain swooped down to Westminster in a four-wheeler full of hats, and that he deposited them in the House as far as they would go.

Of course, this sort of thing could not be allowed. It was not cricket, and the Speaker made the rule of one man one hat.

Corporeal Presence Now.

But ingenious are the wicked. Sir Charles Dilke and the genial Labouchere, who ere he departed the precincts long contributed to the gaiety of nations, concocted a conspiracy. One summer's afternoon, Mr. Sydney Gedge, peering furtively through outspread fingers while at prayers, saw Sir Charles Dilke hurrying in, and not only place his own card in the receptacle at the back of his seat, but also place the Laboucherian card in the receptacle at the back of the Laboucherian seat, the Labouchere being absent.

Then, iniquity of iniquities, he saw Sir Charles fold his hands, bend his head, and assume an attitude of pious devotion. This defiance of rule, precedent, and sanctity so upset Mr. Gedge that he called the attention of the Speaker to what he had seen through parted fingers, with the result that all duplicity of the kind was for ever forbidden, and now, hat or no hat, if a member would make sure of a seat, he must hie him forth to prayers, not by substitute but in corporeal presence.

"Mr. Henson is terribly fastidious about these things."

"Then he shall be satisfied. I shall tell him that I have—er—seen the body. And I have, you know. In these matters a medical man cannot be too careful. If you will provide me with pen and ink——"

"Thank you very much. Will you come this way, please?"

Walker followed into the drawing-room. Mrs. Henson, wearing something faded and dishevelled in the way of a mourning dress, was crooning some dirge at the piano. Her white hair was streaming loosely over her shoulders, there was a vacant stare in her eyes. The intruders might have been statues for all the heed she took of them. Presently the discordant music ceased, and she began to pace noiselessly up and down the room.

"Another one gone," she murmured; "the best-beloved. It is always the best-beloved that dies, and the one we hate that is left. Take all those coaches away, send the guests back home. Why do they come chattering and feasting here? She shall be drawn by four black horses to Churchfield in the dead of the night, and there laid in the family vault."

"Mrs. Henson's residence," Enid explained, in a whisper. "It is some fifteen miles away. She has made up her mind that my sister shall be taken away as she says—to-morrow night. Is this paper all that is necessary for the —you understand? I have telephoned to the undertaker in Brighton."

Walker hastened to assure the girl that what little further formality was required he would see to himself. All he desired now was to visit Henson and get out of the house as soon as possible. As he hurried from the drawing-room he heard Mrs. Henson crooning and muttering, he saw the vacant glare in her eyes, and vaguely wondered how soon he should have another patient here.

Reginald Henson sat propped up in his bed, white and exhausted. Beyond doubt he had had a terrible shock and fright, and the droop of his eyelids told of shattered nerves. There was a thick white bandage round his throat, his left shoulder was strapped tightly. He spoke with difficulty.

"Do we feel any better this morning?" Walker asked, cheerfully.

"No, we don't," said Henson, with a total absence of his usual graciousness of manner. "We feel confoundedly weak, and sick, and dizzy. Every time I drop off to sleep I wake with a start and a feeling that that infernal dog is smothering me. Has the brute been shot yet?"

"I don't fancy so; in fact, he is still at his post upstairs, and therefore——"

"Therefore you have not seen the body of my poor dear cousin?"

"Otherwise I could have given no certificate," Walker said, with dignity. "If I have satisfied myself, sir, and the requirements of the law, why, then, everybody is satisfied. I have seen the body."

Technically the little doctor spoke the truth. Henson muttered something that sounded like an apology. Walker smiled graciously and suggested that rest and a plain diet were all that his patient needed. Rest was the great thing. The bandages need not be removed for a day or two, at the expiration of which time he would look in again. Once the road was reached in safety Walker took off his hat and wiped the beads from his forehead.

"What a house," he muttered. "What a life to lead. Thank goodness I need not go there again before Saturday. If anybody were to offer me a small glass of brandy with a little soda now, I should feel tempted to break through my rule and drink it."

Meanwhile the long terror of the day dragged on inside the house. The servants crept about the place on tiptoe, the hideous bell clanged out, Mrs. Henson paced wearily up and down the drawing-room, singing and muttering to herself, until Enid was fain to fly or break down and yell hysterically. It was one of Margaret Henson's worst days.

The death of Christiana seemed to affect her terribly. Enid watched her in terror. More than once she was fearful that the frail thread would snap—the last faint glimmer of reason go out for ever. And yet it would be madness to tell Margaret Henson the truth. In the first place she would not have understood, and on the other hand she might have comprehended enough to betray to Reginald Henson. As it was, her grief was obvious and sincere enough. The whole thing was refinedly cruel, but really there was no help for it. And things had gone on splendidly.

Henson was powerless to interfere, and the doctor was satisfied. Once she had put her hand to the plough Enid's quick brain saw her through. But she would have been hard put to it to deceive Henson under his very nose without the help of the bloodhound. Now she could see her way still farther. She waited nervously for a ring from the lodge-gates to the house, and about four o'clock it came. The undertaker was at the gates waiting for an escort to the Grange.

Enid passed her tongue out over a pair of dry lips. The critical moment was at hand. If she could get through the next hour she was safe. If not—but there must be no "if not," she told herself. The undertaker came, suave, quiet, respectful, but he dropped back from the bedroom door as he saw two gleaming, amber eyes regarding him menacingly.

"The dog loved my sister," Enid explained, quietly. "But he has found his way to her room, and he refuses to move. He fancies that we have done something with her. . . . Oh, no, I couldn't poison him! And it would be a dreadful thing if there were to be any thing like a struggle here. Come, Rollo."

Evidently the dog had learned his lesson well. He wagged his great tail, but refused to move. The undertaker took a couple of steps forward and Rollo's crest rose. There was a flash of white teeth and a growl. At the end of half an hour no progress had been made.

"There's only one thing for it," suggested Williams, in his rusty voice. "We can get the dog away for ten minutes at midnight. He likes a run then, and I'll bring the other dogs to fetch him, like."

"My time is very valuable just now," the undertaker suggested, humbly.

"Then you had better measure me," said Enid, turning a face absolutely flaming red and deadly white to the speaker. "It is a dreadful, ghastly business altogether, but I cannot possibly think of any other way. The idea of any thing like a struggle here is abhorrent. . . . . And the dog's fidelity is so touching. My sister and I were exactly alike, except that she was fairer than me."

The undertaker was understood to demur slightly on professional grounds. It was very irregular and not in the least likely to give satisfaction.

"What does it matter?" Enid cried, passionately. She was acting none the less magnificently because her nerves were quivering like harpstrings. "When I am dead you can fling me in a ditch, for all I care. We are a strange family and do strange things. The question of satisfaction need not bother you. Take my measure and send her coffin home to-morrow, and we will manage to do the rest. Then to-morrow night you will have a four-horse hearse here at eleven o'clock, and drive the coffin to Churchfield church, where you will be expected. After that your work will be finished."

The bewildered young man responded that things should be exactly as the young lady required. He had seen many strange and wild things in his time, but none so strange and weird as this. It was all utterly irregular, of course, but people after all had a right to demand what they paid for. Enid watched the demure young man in black down the corridor, and then everything seemed to be enveloped in a dense purple mist, the world was spinning under her feet, there was a great noise like the rush of mighty waters in her brain. With a great effort she threw off the weakness and came to herself, trembling from head to foot.

"Courage," she murmured, "courage. This life has told on me more than I thought. With Chris's example before me I must not break down now."

CHAPTER XX.

The lamps gleamed upon the dusty statuary and pictures and faded flowers in the hall, they glinted upon a long polished oak casket there reposing upon trestles. Ever and anon a servant would peep in and vanish again as if ashamed of something. The house was deadly quiet now, for Mrs. Henson had fallen asleep, worn out with exhaustion, and Enid had instantly stopped the dreadful clamour of the bell. The silence that followed was almost as painful as the noise had been.

On the coffin were wreaths of flowers. Enid sat in the drawing-room with the door open, where she could see everything, but was herself unseen. She was getting terribly anxious and nervous again; the hour was near eleven, and the hearse might arrive at any time. She would know no kind of peace until she could get that hideous mockery out of the house.

She sat listening thus, straining her ears to catch the slightest sound. Suddenly there came a loud clamour at the front door, an imperative knocking that caused Enid's heart to come into her mouth. Who could it be? What stranger had passed the dogs in that way?

She heard crabbed, sour, but courageous old Williams go to the door. She heard the clang of bolts and the rattle of chains, and then a weird cry from Williams. A voice responded that brought Enid, trembling and livid, into the hall. A young man with a dark, exceedingly handsome face and somewhat effeminate mouth stood there, with eyes for nothing but the shining flower-decked casket on the trestles. He seemed beside himself with rage and grief; he might have been a falsely imprisoned convict face to face with the real culprit.

"Why didn't you let me know?" he cried. "Why didn't you let me know?"

His voice rang in the roof. Enid flew to his side and placed her hand upon his lips.

"Your mother is asleep, Frank," she said. "She has had no sleep for three nights. A long rest may be the means of preserving her sanity. Why did you come here?"

The young man laughed silently. It was ghastly mirth to see, and it brought the tears into Enid's eyes. She had forgotten the danger of the young man's presence.

"I heard that Chris was ill," he said. "They told me that she was dying. And I could not keep away. And now I have come too late. Oh, Chris, Chris!"

He fell on his knees by the side of the coffin, his frame shaken by tearless sobs. Enid bit her lips to keep back the words that rose to them. She would have given much to have spoken the truth. But at any hazard she must remain silent. She waited till the paroxysm of grief had passed away, then she touched the intruder gently on the shoulder.

"There is great danger for you in this house," she said.

"What do I care for danger when Chris lies yonder?"

"But, dear Frank, there are others to consider besides yourself. There is your mother, for instance. Oh, you ought not to have come here to-night. If your father knew!"

"My father? He would be the last person in the world to know. And what cares he about anything, so long as he has his prints and his paintings? He has no feelings, no heart, no soul, I may say."

"Frank, you must go at once. Do you know that Reginald Henson is here? He has ears like a hare; it will be nothing less than a miracle unless he hears your voice. And then——"

The young man was touched at last. The look of grief died out of his eyes and a certain terror filled them.

"I think that I should have come in any case," he whispered. "I don't want to bring any further trouble upon you, Enid, but I wanted to see the last of her. I came here, and some of the dogs remembered me. If not, I might have had no occasion to trouble you. And I won't stay, seeing that Henson is here. Let me have something to remember her by; let me look into her room for a moment. If you only knew how I loved her! And you look as if you had no grief at all."

Enid started guiltily. She had quite forgotten her role for the time. Indeed, there was something unmistakably like relief on her face as she heard the porter's bell ring from the lodge to the house. Williams shuffled away, muttering that he would be more useful in the house than out of it just now, but a glance from Enid subdued him. Presently there came the sound of wheels on the gravel outside.

"They have come for the—the coffin," Enid murmured. "Frank, it would be best for you to go. Go upstairs, if you like; you know the way. Only, don't stay here."

The young man went off dreamily. A heavy grief dulled and blinded his senses; he walked along like one who wanders in his sleep. Christiana's room door was open and a lamp was there. There were dainty knick-knacks on the dressing-table, a vase or two of faded flowers—everything that denotes the presence of refined and gracious womanhood.

Frank Littimer stood there looking round him for some little time. On a table by the bedside stood a photograph of a girl in a silver frame. Littimer pounced upon it hungrily. It was a good picture—the best of Christiana's that he had ever seen. He slipped out into the corridor and gently closed the door behind him. Then he passed along with his whole gaze fixed on the portrait. The girl seemed to be smiling out of the frame at him. He had loved Christiana since she was a child; he felt that he had never loved her so much as at this moment. Well, he had something to remember her by—he had not come here in vain.

It seemed impossible yet to realize that Christiana was dead, that he would never look into her sunny, tender face again. No, he would wake up presently and find it had all been a dream. And how different to the last time he was here. He had been smuggled into the house, and he had occupied the room with the oak door. He——

The room with the oak door opened and a big man with a white bandage round his throat stood there with tottering limbs and an ugly smile on his loose mouth. Littimer started back.

"Reginald," he exclaimed, "I didn't expect to see you here, or——"

"Or you would never have dared to come?" Henson said, hoarsely. "I heard your voice and I was bound to give you a welcome, even at considerable personal inconvenience. Help me back to bed again. And now, you insolent young dog, how dare you show your face here?"

"I came to see Chris," Littimer said, doggedly. "And I came too late. Even if I had known that I was going to meet you, I should have been here all the same. Oh, I know what you are going to say; I know what you think. And some day I shall break out and defy you to do your worst."

Henson smiled as one might do at the outbreak of an angry child. His eyes flashed and his tongue spoke words that Littimer fairly cowed before. And yet he did not show it. He was like a boy who has found a stone for the man who stands over him with the whip. With quick intuition Henson saw this, and in a measure his manner changed.

"You will say next that you are not afraid of me," he suggested.

"Well," Littimer replied, slowly; "I am not so much afraid of you as I was."

"Ah! so you imagine that you have discovered something?"

Littimer apparently struggled between a prudent desire for silence and a disposition to speak. The sneer on the face of his enemy fairly maddened him.

"Yes," he said, with a note of elation in his voice, "I have made a discovery, but I am not going to tell you how or where my discovery is. But I've found Van Sneck."

A shade of whiter pallor came over Henson's face. Then his eyes took on a murderous, purple-black gleam. All the same, his voice was quite steady as he replied.

"I'm afraid that it not likely to benefit you much," he said. "Would you mind handing me that oblong black book from the dressing-table? I want you to do something for me. What's that?"

There was just the faintest suggestion of a sound outside. It was Enid listening with all her ears. She had not been long in discovering what had happened. Once the ghastly farcical incubus was off her shoulders she had followed Littimer upstairs. As she passed Henson's room the drone of voices struck on her ears. She stood there and listened. She would have given much for this not to have happened, but everything happened for the worst in that accursed house.

But Henson's last words were enough for her. She gathered her skirts together and flew down the stairs. In the hall Williams stood, with a grin on his face, pensively scraping his chin with a dry forefinger.

"Now what's the matter, miss?" he cried.

"Don't ask questions," Enid cried. "Go and get me the champagne nippers. The champagne nippers at once. If you can't find them, then bring me a pair of pliers. Then come to me on the leads outside the bathroom. It's a matter of life and death."

CHAPTER XXI.

David did not appear in the least surprised; indeed, he was long since past that emotion. Before the bottom of the mystery was reached a great many more strange things were pretty sure to happen.

"So you bought that cigar-case yourself?" he said.

"Indeed, I did," Ruth answered, eagerly. "Of course, I have long known you by name and I have read pretty well all your tales. I—I liked your work so much."

David was flattered. The shy, sweet admiration in Ruth's eyes touched him.

"And I was very glad to meet you," Ruth went on. "You see, we all liked your stories. And we knew one or two people who had met you, and gradually you became quite like a friend of ours—Enid and Chris and myself, you understand. Then a week or two ago I came down to Brighton with my uncle to settle all about taking the house here. And I happened to be in Lockhart's buying something when you came in and asked to see the cigar-case. I recognized you from your photographs, and I was interested. Of course, I thought no more of it at the time, until Enid came up to London and told me all about your synopsis, and how strangely the heroine's case in your proposed story was like hers. Enid wondered how you were going to get the girl out of her difficulty, and I jokingly suggested that she had better ask you. She accepted the idea quite seriously, saying that if you had a real, plausible way out of the trouble you might help her. And gradually our scheme was evolved. You were not to know, because of the possible danger to yourself."

"At the hands of Reginald Henson, of course?"

"Yes. Our scheme took a long time, but we got it worked out at last. We decided on the telephone because we thought that we could not be traced that way, never imagining for a moment that you could get the number of your caller over the trunk line. Enid came up to town, and worked the telephone, Chris was in No. 218, and I brought the money."

"You placed that cigar-case on my doorstep?"

"Yes, I was wound up for anything. It was I whom you saw riding the bicycle through Old Steine; it was I who dropped the card of instructions. It seems a shameful thing to say and to do now, but I—well, I enjoyed it at the time. And I did it for the sake of my friends. Do I look like that sort of a girl, Mr. Steel?"

David glanced into the beautiful shy eyes with just the suggestion of laughter in them.

"You look all that is loyal and good and true," he exclaimed. "And I don't think I ever admired you quite so much as I do at this moment."

Ruth laughed and looked down. There was something in David's glance that thrilled her and gave her a sense of happiness she would have found it hard to describe.

"I am glad you do not despise me," she whispered.

"Despise you!" David cried. "Why? If you only knew how I, well, how I loved you! Don't be angry. I mean every word that I say; my feelings for you are as pure as your own heart. If you could care for me as you do for those others I should have a friend indeed."

"You have made me care for you very much indeed, Mr. Steel," Ruth whispered.

"Call me David . . . . How nice my plain name sounds from your lips. Ruth and David. But I must hold myself in hand for the present. Still, I am glad you like me."

"Well, you have been so good and kind. We have done you a great deal of injury and you never blamed us. And you are just the man I have always pictured as the man I could love . . . . David!"

"Well, it was only one little kiss, and I'm sure nobody saw us, dear. And later on, when you are my wife——"

"Don't you think we had better keep to business for the present?" Ruth said, demurely.

"Perhaps. There is one little point that you must clear up before we go any farther. How did you manage to furnish those two big dining-rooms exactly alike?"

"Why, the furniture is there. At the top of the house, in a large attic, all the furniture is stored."

"But the agent told me it had been removed."

"He was wrong. You can't expect the agent to recollect everything about a house. The place belonged to the lady whom we may call Mrs. Margaret Henson at one time. When her home scheme fell through she sold one house as it was. In the other she stored the furniture. Enid knew of all this, of course. We managed to get a latch-key to fit 218, and Enid and a man did the rest. Her idea was to keep you in the dark as much as possible. After the interview the furniture was put back again, and there you are."

"Diplomatic and clever, and decidedly original, not to say feminine. In the light of recently acquired knowledge I can quite see why your friends desired to preserve their secret. But they need not have taken all those precautions. Had they written——"

"They dared not. They were fearful as to what might become of the reply."

"But they might have come to me openly."

"Again, they dared not for your sake. You know a great deal, David, but there is darkness and trouble and wickedness yet that I dare not speak of. And you are in danger. Already Reginald Henson has shown you what he can do."

"And yet he doesn't know everything," David smiled. "He may have stabbed me in the back, but he is quite ignorant as to what advice I gave to Enid Henson, which brings me back to the cigar-case. You saw me looking at it in Lockhart's. Go on."

"Yes, I watched you with a great deal of curiosity. Finally you went off out of the shop saying that you could not afford to buy the cigar-case, and I thought no more of the matter for a time. Then we found out all about your private affairs. Oh, I am ashamed almost to go on."

The dainty little face grew crimson; the hand in David's trembled.

"But we were desperate. And, after all, we were doing no harm. It was just then that the idea of the cigar-case came into my mind. We knew that if we could get you to take that money it would only be as a loan. I suggested the gift of the case as a memento of the occasion. I purchased that case with my own money and I placed it with its contents on the doorstep of your house."

"Did you watch it all the time?"

"No, I didn't. But I was satisfied that nobody passed, and I was sufficiently near to hear your door open at the hour appointed. Of course, we had carefully rehearsed the telephone conversation, and I knew exactly what to do."

David sat very thoughtfully for some little time.

"The case must have been changed," he said. "It is very difficult to say how, but there is no other logical solution of the matter. At about half-past twelve on that eventful night you placed on my doorstep a gun-metal cigar-case, mounted in diamonds, that you had purchased from Lockhart's?"

"Yes, and the very one that you admired. Of that I am certain."

"Very well. I take that case with me to 218, Brunswick Square, and I bring it back again. Did I take it with me or not? Anyhow, it was found on the floor beside the body. It never passed out of my possession to my knowledge. Next day I leave it at the office of Messrs. Mossa and Mack, and it gets into the hands of the police."

"Was it not possibly changed there, David?"

"No, because of the initials I had scratched inside it. And beyond all question that case—the same case, mind you, that I picked up on my doorstep—was purchased by the man now lying in the hospital here from Walen's, in West Street. Now, how was the change made?"

"If I could only see my way to help you!"

"The change was made the day you bought the case. By the way, what time was it?"

"I can't tell you the exact time," Ruth replied. "It was on the morning of the night of your adventure."

"And you kept it by you all the time."

"Yes. It was in a little box sealed with yellow wax and tied with yellow string. I went to 219 after I had made the purchase. My uncle was there and he was using the back sitting-room as an office. He had brought a lot of papers with him to go through."

"Ah! Did you put your package down?"

"Just for a moment on the table. But surely my uncle would not——"

"One moment, please. Was anybody with your uncle at the time?"

Ruth gave a sudden little cry.

"How senseless of me to forget," she cried. "My uncle was down merely for the day, and, as he was very busy, he sent for Mr. Reginald Henson to help him. I did not imagine that Mr. Henson would know anything. But even now I cannot see what——"

"Again let me interrupt you. Did you leave the room at all?"

"Yes. It is all coming back to me now. My uncle's medicine was locked up in my bag. He asked me to go for it and I went, leaving my purchase on the table. It is all coming back to me now. . . . When I returned Mr. Henson was quite alone, as somebody had called to see my uncle. Mr. Henson seemed surprised to see me back so soon, and as I entered he crushed something up in his hand and dropped it into the waste-paper basket. But my parcel was quite intact."

"Yellow wax and yellow string and all?"

"Yes, so far as I remember. It was Mr. Henson who reminded my uncle about his medicine."

"And when you were away the change was made. Strange that your uncle should be so friendly with both Henson and Bell. Have they ever met under your roof?"

"No," Ruth replied. "Henson has always alluded to Dr. Bell as a lost man. He professes to be deeply sorry for him, but he has declined to meet him. Where are you going?"

"I am going with you to see if we can find anything in the waste-paper basket at No. 219. Bell tells me that your servants have instructions to touch no papers, and I know that the back sitting-room of your house is used as a kind of office. I want, if possible, to find the paper that Henson tried to hide on the day you bought the cigar-case."

The basket proved to be a large one, and was partially filled with letters that had never been opened—begging-letters, Ruth said. For half an hour David was engaged in smoothing out crumpled sheets of paper, until at length his search was rewarded. He held a packet of note-paper, the usual six sheets, one inside the other, that generally go to correspondence sheets of good quality. It was crushed up, but Steel flattened it out and held it up for Ruth's inspection.

"Now, here is a find!" he cried. "Look at the address in green at the top: '15, Downend Terrace.' Five sheets of my own best notepaper, printed especially for myself, in this basket! Originally this was a block of six sheets, but the one has been written upon and the others crushed up like this. Beyond doubt the paper was stolen from my study. And—what's this?"

He held up the thick paper to the light. At the foot of the top sheet was plainly indented in outline the initials "D. S."

"My own cipher," David went on. "Scrawled in so boldly as to mark on the under sheet of paper. Almost invariably I use initials instead of my full name unless it is quite formal business."

"And what is to be done now?" Ruth asked.

"Find the letter forged over what looks like a genuine cipher," David said, grimly.

CHAPTER XXII.

Bell followed Dr. Cross into the hospital with a sense of familiar pleasure. The cool, sweet smell of the place, the decorous silence, the order of it all appealed to him strongly. It was as the old war-horse who sniffs the battle from afar. And the battle with death was ever a joy to Bell.

"This is all contrary to regulations, of course," he suggested.

"Well, it is," Cross admitted. "But I am an enthusiast, and one doesn't often get a chance of chatting with a brilliant, erratic star like yourself. Besides, our man is not in the hospital proper. He is in a kind of annex by my own quarters, and he scoffs the suggestion of being nursed."

Bell nodded, understanding perfectly. He came at length to a brilliantly-lighted room, where a dark man with an exceedingly high forehead and wonderfully piercing eyes was sitting up in bed. The dark eyes lighted with pleasure as they fell upon Bell's queer, shambling figure and white hair.

"The labor we delight in physics pain," he greeted with a laugh and a groan. "It's worth a badly twisted shoulder to have the pleasure of seeing Hatherly Bell again. My dear fellow, how are you?"

The voice was low and pleasant, there was no trace of insanity about the speaker. Bell shook the proffered hand. For some little time the conversation proceeded smoothly enough. The stranger was a good talker; his remarks were keen and to the point.

"I hope you will be comfortable here," Bell suggested.

A faint subtle change came over the other's face.

"All but one thing," he whispered. "Don't make a fuss about it, because Cross is very kind. But I can't stand the electric light. It reminds me of the great tragedy of my life. But for the electric light I should be a free man with a good practice to-day."

"So you are harping on that string again," Bell said, coldly. "I fancied that I had argued you out of that. You know perfectly well that it is all imagination, Heritage."

Heritage passed his left hand across his eyes in a confused kind of way.

"When you look at one like that I fancy so," he said. "When I was under your hands I was forgetting all about it. And now it has all come back again. Did I tell you all about it, Cross?"

Bell gave Cross a significant glance, and the latter shook his head.

"Well, it was this way," Heritage began, eagerly. His eyes were gleaming now, his whole aspect was changed. "I was poor and struggling, but I had a grand future before me. There was a patient of mine, a rich man, who had a deadly throat trouble. And he was going to leave me all his money if I cured him. He told me he had made a will to that effect, and he had done so. And I was in direst straits for some ready cash. When I came to operate I used an electric light, a powerful light —you know what I mean. The operation failed and my patient died. The operation failed because the electric light went out at a critical time.

"People said it was a great misfortune for me, because I was on the threshold of a new discovery which would have made my name. Nothing of the kind. I deliberately cut the positive wire of the electric light so that I should fail, and so that my patient might die and I might get all his money at once. And he did die, and nobody suspected me—nobody could possibly have found me out. Then I went mad and they put me under Bell's care. I should have got well, only he gave up his practice and drifted into the world again. My good, kind friend Reginald Henson heard of my case; he interested some people in me and placed me where I am at present."

"So Reginald Henson knows all about it?" Bell asked, drily.

"My dear fellow, he is the best friend I have in the world. He was most interested in my case. I have gone over it with him a hundred times. I showed him exactly how it was done. And now you know why I loathe the electric light. When it shines in my eyes it maddens me; it brings back to me the recollection of that dreadful time, it causes me to——"

"Heritage," Bell said, sternly, "close your eyes at once, and be silent."

The patient obeyed instantly. He had not forgotten the old habit of obedience. When he opened his eyes again at length he looked round him in a foolish, shame-faced manner.

"I—I am afraid I have been rambling," he muttered. "Pray don't notice me, Bell; if you are as good a fellow as you used to be, come and see me again. I'm tired now."

Bell gave the desired assurance, and he and Cross left the room together.

"Any sort of truth in what he has been saying?" asked the latter.

"Very little," Bell replied. "Heritage is an exceedingly clever fellow who has not yet recovered from a bad breakdown some years ago. I had nearly cured him at one time, but he seems to have lapsed into bad ways again. Some day, when I have time, I shall take up his case once more."

"Did he operate, or try some new throat cure?"

"Exactly. He was on the verge of discovering some way of operating for throat cases with complete success. You can imagine how excited he was over his discovery. Unfortunately the patient he experimented on died under the operation, not because the light went out or any nonsense of that kind, but from failure of the heart's action owing to excitement. Heritage had no sleep for a fortnight, and he broke down altogether. For months he was really mad, and when his senses came back to him he had that hallucination. Some day it will go, and some day Heritage will take up the dropped threads of his discovery and the world will be all the better for it. And now, will you do me a favor?"

"I will do anything that lies in my power."

"Then be good enough to let me have a peep at the man who was found half-murdered in my friend David Steel's conservatory. I'm interested in that case."

Cross hesitated for a moment.

"All right," he said. "There can't be any harm in that. Come this way."

Bell strolled along with the air of a man who is moved by no more than ordinary curiosity. But from the first he had made up his mind not to lose this opportunity. He had not the remotest idea what he expected to find, but he had a pretty good idea that he was on the verge of an important discovery. He came at length to the bedside of the mysterious stranger. The man was lying on his back in a state of coma, his breath came heavily between his parted lips.

Bell bent low partly to examine the patient, partly to hide his face from Cross. If Bell had made any discovery he kept the fact rigidly to himself.

"Looks very young," he muttered. "But then he is one of those men who never grow any hair on their faces. Young as he looks, I should judge him to be at least forty-five, and, if I am not mistaken, he is a man who has heard the chimes at midnight or later. I'm quite satisfied."

"It's more than I am," Cross said, when at length he and his visitor were standing outside together. "Look here, Bell, you're a great friend of Steel's, whom I believe to be a very good fellow

A SPIRITUAL HARVEST

LAW OF CAUSE AND EFFECT WORKS HERE.

NO WORTHY EFFORT WASTED

By Faith Sower of the Seed Sees His Future Harvest—So May Men and Women Who Work to Win Souls for Christ and Right Living—Reward of the Kindly Effort Is Sure and Certain.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Diver, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 21.—In this sermon, using the familiar type of the seed sower, the preacher shows that no worthy effort at winning men and women from sin is ever wasted, but is rewarded by a spiritual harvest. The text is Ecclesiastes xi., 1, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

This text has been impressed on my mind ever since I journeyed around the world and came home by the land of the pharaohs. When I wandered amid the ancient ruins and stood under the shadows of its obelisks and pyramids and reflected that all these temples and palaces and monuments and tombs were the relics of the ancient race which was attracted by the fertility of the land lying along the banks of the river Nile, these words have had for me a complete fascination, for in the light of Egyptian lore I thought King Solomon was alluding to the custom with which the descendants of the ancient subjects of the Rameses are wont to sow their seed. That custom is very interesting to a traveler from this hemisphere. Egypt is a vast desert. From one end of the year to the other no rain falls on that parched soil. How, then, is the land cultivated? By the river Nile, which, when the spring freshets flow into it, rises above its banks and overflows the low lying lands on each side. Then, as the river Nile dries up again, most of the overflowing water is drawn back into the original channel and leaves the adjacent regions under a layer of thick mud, with here and there small shallow lakes and pools. Then the Egyptian farmer goes forth and scatters his seeds upon this water. The seeds sink into the mud. They take root. Then, when the harvest time comes, the lands alongside of the Nile are covered with luxuriant crops.

In light of this strange custom of Egyptian agriculture I used to say, "Ah, I know what King Solomon meant when he said, 'Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days.' He is practically saying: 'Pick out your richest grounds. Go up to the rich mud-covered fields by the Nile. Drop here a seed and there a seed of God-given teaching. You will never find that those seeds will die. You harvests will soon yield their thirty, their sixty, their hundredfold. The ground is so rich that it is certain to bring forth a harvest.'" Thus I would always picture the Christian in obeying this injunction as casting his seed upon rich soil and then in a few months driving up to the gospel granaries with his wagons laden with the heavy golden sheaves which he had harvested for his Master.

That is a very beautiful vision which I had about the message of my text. There was only one trouble about it. The vision was not true. When I began to look up what the Bible scholars said about this theme I found they made no allusion to the river Nile and its vast muddy banks, with their mud filled with the sowers' seeds. According to Thomas Scott, this text alludes to the Palestine farmer and not to the Egyptian. It pictures a Palestine farmer scattering the seed over his fields and coming to a swampy region. It is the poorest part of his farm. He has never cultivated it before, because, when he came to it, he always said: "What is the use of my planting there? I will never get any return for my labor. My seed will only rot and never bring me back any sheaves." But Solomon says: "O farmer, go to the most unpromising parts of the farm. Scatter your good seeds amid the swampy soils, where you and all good people are skeptical about getting any return. Your gospel seeds will never be uselessly thrown away. The harvests will come. Believe me, the harvests will come." Let me read to you his very words, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days." Could we have more practical advice for Christian work?

Instead of seeking the richest fields, God is here telling us to sow in the most undesirable ones. Now, as I begin to run over some of the most unpromising regions for gospel seed planting, my mind in the first place naturally turns toward the child who is born of dissolute or degraded parents. "Oh," you say as you look at him, "there is no use wasting anything upon that boy! He was born of a bad mother. His father was divorced from her on account of her flagrant sins. She is never at home. You might as well try to change a leopard's spots as to overcome the parental taint in his blood." Or you say: "What is the use? That boy's father is a drunkard and an infidel. He daily scoffs at the Bible. Any good seed we might sow in that child's heart would be rooted out in a night by the ridicule of his parent." Yes, Sunday school teacher, I know how discouraged you are over that boy. But do not despair. Go on sowing your gospel seed in that child's heart whenever you have an opportunity. Christ will look after the result. The gospel harvests in that life will surely come. Do you not recall the divine promise given to us in Ecclesiastes, "Cast thy bread upon the waters?" That means "Cast thy seed in the unpromising fields, for thou shalt find it after many days."

And why should we not cast the gospel seed upon the child heart? Have you a right to say that any child cannot be led to Christ until you have tried to lead him there not only seven times, but seventy times seven? A child's heart seems to me like the desert of Arizona. Now, there are two kinds of desert. There is the desert of sand and rock, like that of Sahara. You might as well expect a dotted sieve to hold water as such a desert. You can pour rivers upon rivers into it and have shower after shower descend upon it, and those waters will almost instantly disappear. It would take centuries upon centuries of inundations to change the Sahara sands into the rich soil of a harvest field.

But such a desert as that is not to be compared to the Arizona desert. There the lands are rich beyond all human computation in all the elements that are essential to develop vegetable life. You could grow wheat there. You could grow corn there. You could grow orchards there. You could grow the most exquisite of flowers there, if you only had water. Travelers will tell you that when the short rainy seasons come to the Arizona desert it will be literally covered with wild flowers, and the richest of grasses will spring up as if by magic. Thus I feel when I look off upon a great community, with its many children. There I do not find rocky hearts, stony hearts, flinty hearts, which cannot be touched by a Saviour's love. But, like the Arizona plains, I find rich soil just ready for the gospel showers. Give the child a chance for God. Sow the gospel seed in the homes where the parental life is not what it should be. Christ will look after the result. The harvest will surely come for his glory. Dare you deny that God's promises are true? "Cast thy bread upon the unpromising fields, and thou shalt find it after many days."

Let me open for a moment the door of your home. For whom are you chiefly living? I think your chief desire is for your children. You say to your wife: "No, Mary; I will not allow that. The children must not go." But after the supper is over your little daughter climbs up into your lap and begins to talk. The first thing you know you have not only consented for her to do what you said she might not do, but you have consented to let her take you along. "Oh, John," your wife says, "those babies can twist you about their little fingers. You have no mind of your own when they are about." Your answer: "Not at all; not at all. I always make them do what I feel is best." But tell me honestly—the children are not listening—do you not live for them? Do they not lead you anywhere they will by the string of love? Now, my friends, if your children have such an influence over you, your neighbor's children have just as much influence over him. Remember this fact—if you win a child of worldly parents to Christ, that child in all probability will lead the parents to Christ also. Oh, my brother, are not these gospel prizes worth striving for? The easiest way to get Christ into a worldly home is to go there by the half open door of a child's heart. "Cast thy bread upon the child's life, and thou shalt find it after many days."

But another unpromising field for gospel seed planting is the besotted life of the man or woman who for years and years has been living the life of a degenerate or a social outcast. When you think of them you invariably say, "They are Ephraims wedded to their sins. Leave them alone. They have had their moral characters absolutely driven out of them. When the ear drum is gone there is no hope in going to a specialist. He will have nothing to work upon. The hearing, in that case, can never be restored. So is it with the degenerates. It is useless to cast pearls before the swine. Back into the filth they will go. It is useless to read the Ten Commandments to a flock of human wolves. Only upon the carcasses of sin will they banquet. All that you can do is to leave them to gormandize at their corrupt and disgusting feasts."

Well, my brother, what you say may be true. Ephraim may be wedded to his sins. But, when you go forth to sow gospel seed and are tempted to leave Ephraim's land unsown, be very sure that it is really swamp land. Perhaps you may be making a mistake. Perhaps you are hastily passing judgment of condemnation upon men whom God has not yet given up as hopeless. What I do know is this: If you had lived in Christ's place many of the sinners and the outcasts with whom he talked you would never have spoken to for fear of defiling your garments. Many of the thieves and robbers and the libertines and the moral lepers whom he lifted up out of their sins you would never have touched. You would have said, "It is useless. They are degenerates. They are Ephraims wedded to their sins. Leave them alone." You had better be careful when you refuse to scatter the gospel seed in the shriveled heart of an outcast. Even there Christ will bless your seed planting. Yes, he will bless you when you plead with a devil-possessed Mary, or with a libertine and a murderer like David, or with a hard-hearted tax collector like Zacchaeus, or with even an adulteress like the woman of Samaria. Your gospel seed planting will never go astray. No matter how unpromising the human field which you sow, those seeds will never be lost. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

An impressive parable found among the Hindoos is the following: Many years ago a thief was captured with stolen money in his hand and sentenced to die. The night before his execution he devised this novel plan for rescue: He called the jailer into his cell and said, "Go tell the king that if I can come to him I can tell him how to grow gold." The intelligence was carried to the king, and he said, "Let the culprit be brought before me." When the thief entered the royal presence he produced a piece of gold and said: "Your majesty, if this piece of gold be planted in the soil it will grow into a tree, every branch of which will be laden with gold, as an orchard with fruit. But this golden seed must be planted by a hand which has never been stained by a dishonest act. Of course I am a thief and cannot plant this seed. My hand is not clean, so I pass it to your majesty." The king looked at the gold a moment; then he said: "I would plant it if I could; but, alas, my hand is not clean! I will pass it to my prime minister." The prime minister's hand was not clean, so he passed it to the governor of the citadel. The governor's hand was not clean, and he passed it to the high priest. The high priest's hand was not clean, and he passed it on to another.

Thus the golden seed went from hand to hand. Then the thief said, "Your majesty, if no man's hand is clean, why should I alone die for the crime?" "You are right," said the king. "If you are to die, then I must die also." Then the conscience-stricken king pardoned the culprit because he and his officers were all sinners alike. Is the story a mere legend, a fable? I think not. We say certain men are degenerates and beyond the pale of gospel hope. Are they? Are our own hands morally clean? Have we always been pure? Have we never sinned? Are we not sinning now? Oh, my Lord and my God, if thou canst save us, the chief of sinners, canst thou not save even the lowest and the vilest with whom we come in contact in our daily life? Yes, even the lowest and the vilest the Lord Jesus can save. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

But the next unpromising field for gospel seed planting to which my mind turns naturally is the bitter hearts of the persons who for years and years have been identified with Christian works, whose labors were unappreciated by their contemporaries and who have been cast out, or, rather, frozen out, of the churches with which they were identified. Some of these men and women now are among the most bitter of all enemies of the churches. There are hundreds and thousands of men and women who despise the church of God because some Christian friend or some church has proved false to them. They despise the church of God, which they once loved, because some man or body of men has been unappreciative of their loyalty and self-sacrifice. Now, my friends, it is your duty and my duty to go after these delinquent church members. We must go after them. We must harness them up to the gospel chariot again and get them to pull. I know it will be hard work to bring them back. I know it is an unpromising field for gospel seed planting, but if we go forth in the right spirit, with the right gospel seed, we can get a harvest even in this unpromising soil. Remember the words of my text, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

But, lastly I think of one of the hardest of all fields in which to sow the gospel seed. That is the stony heart of the man who has stilled the pleadings of his conscience by accepting a religion or a creed which will allow him to give free rein to his evil desires and not feel that he is doing wrong. And these liberal religions or false creeds are everywhere. There are so many that at least one of them will satisfy almost any condition of sinful life and gratify every evil desire. Some of them will allow you to yield to all your desires and appetites. Some will let you live the most selfish of lives. There is no need of my going into details. I mean the creed which will allow a man to turn his back upon wife and children and start a social community where he can defy the domestic laws and where the laws of purity are so liberal, so utterly lax, that they will allow men to do almost anything they will. Now, how are we to fight against the sins of these men and women who stifle the pleadings of conscience by false creeds? Simply by gospel seed planting. I know the stony hearts of these transgressors are unpromising for a rich harvest, but remember God's seeds can bring forth their hundredfold harvest even in places where you may think a gospel sheaf can never be gathered.

But I cannot close without asking this one pertinent question: Is it not a fact, after all, my brother, that the reason you have not been a gospel sower in the unpromising fields of life is because you do not hold the good seed in your own hand? What is the good of a field and a sower if that sower has no seed to scatter? Friend, why art thy hands empty? Is it because thou hast not yet been consecrated to the service of Jesus Christ? Wilt thou become one of God's sowers to-day and equip thyself for the work of his holy spirit? Wilt thou dig thy empty hands down into the bin of God's promises and bring them up full, and then plant the first in your own stony heart, and then scatter them over the fields of the neighbors' hearts? May God help me as I now take a handful of his everlasting promises. May I lift these promises as gospel seeds and go up and down among my people and say, "Friend, this seed is for thee. This seed is for thee." Wilt thou receive these gospel seeds and plant them in thine own heart and here and now fit thyself as a gospel sower for Christ? Wilt thou, friend? Art thou ready now to be his sower? "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

Left Handed Animals.

It may seem queer to speak of an animal or a bird as left handed, but the naturalists use that term in discussing the question, just as they do in speaking of human beings. Many of them claim that all animals and birds are left handed. Livingston, the famous African explorer, was among these. One of his illustrations is the habit of the lion in always striking with its left paw. Parrots are probably left handed, too, for they nearly always take with the left claw anything that may be handed to them. A student of parrot habits says, however, that this may be accounted for by the fact that people use the right hand in giving anything to a parrot, and the bird naturally extends the claw that is nearer the object.

Colors That Cure Consumption.

The value of light as an agent in curing diseases is becoming increasingly recognized, says the Chicago Journal. The latest development of the idea is the assertion of a medical man that the clothes worn by consumptives should be of a color which will allow the light to penetrate the body. White materials, it is found, are the best for this purpose, and consumptives are consequently advised to clothe themselves in snowy raiment, either of linen, velvet, cotton or cloth. Silk, however, is barred.

From London Bridge In a Sack.

Some years ago a porter named Fuller, employed at Billingsgate market, London, made a bet that he would jump from London bridge tied up in a sack, his only stipulation being that he should be provided with a knife, which he was not to open till he touched the water, with which to rip open the sack. He succeeded in accomplishing the feat and when picked up by some friends in a boat was none the worse for his dive.

SLIPS OF THE TONGUE.

Some of the Queer Bulls That Have Been Recorded.

That man made a remark that had better have been left unsaid who, when the king found some fault with the earl marshal for some details of the coronation ceremony, replied, "Please, your majesty, I hope it will be better next time." Lord Orford tells the following, which he characterizes as the best "bull" he ever heard: "I hate that woman," said a gentleman, looking at one who had been his nurse. "I hate that woman, for she changed me at nurse." A gentleman was once complimenting Mme. Denis on the manner in which she had just enacted the part of Zara. "To act that part," said she, "a person should be young and handsome." "Ah, madam," replied the would-be complimenter, "you are a complete proof to the contrary," which was a faux pas with a vengeanace. It was at an execution in Ireland that the rope broke and the half-hanged victim fell to the ground, when the person who was superintending the execution said, "You rascal, if you do that again I'll kill you as sure as you breathe."

It was an Irish mayor who issued a proclamation stating that certain business would be transacted in that city "except Monday" (Easter Sunday only excepted), which is capped by the preamble of an English bill which ordained that certain regulations should take place "on every Monday" (Tuesday excepted), while an English mayor ran this close in a proclamation and an advertisement relating to some forthcoming races, wherein it was stated that "no gentleman will be allowed to ride on the course but the horses that are to run."

Another "bull" of the Legislature which actually found its way on to the statute book was that in which in amending an old act it was ordained in the event of conviction that of the fine of 40 shillings, half was to go to the King and half to the informer. In the amending act this was altered to "40 strokes with the birch, half to go to the King and half to the informer," which only tends to show that the draughtsmen of the laws of the nation are not always as careful as they might or should be. Of course, perhaps, the poor things are overworked or tired.

Shakespeare has been guilty of more than one literary "bull," one of his best being in the first portion of "Henry IV.," wherein the carrier complains that "the turkeys in his panniers are quite starved," the phrase occurring in the fifth scene of the second act, whereas turkeys came from America, and the new world was not even discovered for a century later. Again, in the first scene of the fifth act of "Henry V.," wherein Gower is made to say to Fluellen, "Here comes Pistol, smiling like a turkeycock," all of which proves the appositeness of the remark that even Homer sometimes nods, as Shakespeare did in these and other instances. Many others could be deduced, but the above examples will suffice.

Going a step higher, we find the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of a former day equally at fault in his language, for in a proclamation issued from the Council chamber of Dublin we find it set forth that "whereas, the greatest economy is necessary in the consumption of all species of grain and especially in the consumption of potatoes," etc. Mr. Grey tells of a lawyer who in an action for assault and battery informed the judge that "the defendant beat his client with a certain wooden instrument called an iron pestle."—London Standard.

Always at Home.

It was all legally and satisfactorily settled early in the reign of Queen Victoria that the British sovereign may quit Britain without let or hindrance, and constitutionally discharge her or his duties at whatsoever place shall be chosen. Where the King is there is the court, and then, within the British dominions, Parliament might be summoned to assemble. Oriental rulers have a more subtle method of legalizing their journeys. The Emperor of Japan must worship the dust of his ancestors every morning. But he need not necessarily go to their tombs; earth from the tombs is strewn before him, and he obeys the strict letter of the law. The Shah of Persia develops the idea still more quaintly. Rightly he should never take his feet off Persian soil. And he does not. No matter how far he may travel, he keeps his feet on Persian soil; it is packed into the false sole of his boots. Hence, though he eat his dinner at Buckingham Palace or discuss the weather with the Kaiser at Potsdam, the soil of Persia is always beneath his royal feet.

Compulsory Archery.

Archery was once a compulsory exercise in every English parish after Sunday church. "It is a worthy game," preached Bishop Latimer, "a wholesome kind of exercise and much commended in physic." A fine of a halfpenny for abstaining from archery practice on Sunday was enforced in Edward III.'s reign, and Henry VIII.'s crack regiment, the yeomen of the guard, was composed entirely of bowmen. Archery flourished some time after the introduction of the hand gun, though this had been used in England as early as 1471. This developed, in James I.'s time, into the caliver, so called from the English misconception of an order to supply English soldiers with guns of the same "caliber" as the French pattern, and the longbow was finally abandoned in the civil wars.

Maizypop In England.

Maizypop in London is the product of the latest American invasion. It is asserted, says What to Eat, that the record for such introductions has been broken in this case, for it took just one week to form a company, to register the trademark and to lease a building. In the second week the finished product was being turned out. Maizypop is simply popcorn as we are familiar with it in pink and white cakes wrapped in oiled paper. The name is a concession to the language of England, where corn is known as maize. The two Americans who have started maizypop upon its career first bought the foreign rights for popcorn machinery, then arranged to control the export of shelled corn from the United States for ten years.

The Nerve Centres

are capable of generating a certain amount of motive force, or nerve impulse, and no more. Whenever the call upon the centres exceed their ability to respond, the result is a disturbance somewhere. A large amount of motive force is utilized in the function of vision, even when it is performed under the easiest possible circumstances, but when there are defects in the eye and its appendages there is still greater demand for nerve force to bring about good vision. Each nerve centre is intimately connected and in delicate sympathy with all other centres of the nervous system. Of all the centres in the nervous system, which are the largest, most sensitive and most constantly in use? They are the nerve centres of SIGHT, which occupy one-third of the whole gray-matter area of the brain. Our "Repression" Glasses reverse the strain on these nerve centres.

Horrible Accident At Pt. Ann Cement Works

George Rion and William Bowler, Two Employees, Blown to Pieces by Explosion of Dynamite—Cause a Mystery, Which May Never be Explained—Both Were Young Men—How it Happened—Inquest Will Not be Held.

Shortly before 5 o'clock on Saturday afternoon an appalling accident, which cast a gloom over the city, occurred at the quarry in connection with the works of the Belleville Portland Cement Company, which, as our readers know, are situated at Point Ann, about five miles east of the city.

As the result of an explosion of dynamite, placed in drilled holes to receive the same, two employees of the company, namely, George Rion and Wm. Bowler, were instantly killed, and their bodies horribly mutilated.

WILL REMAIN A MYSTERY.

Just what caused the explosion is not known, but what is surmised is probably the correct solution of the terrible and unfortunate affair.

HOW IT HAPPENED.

It appears that, during the afternoon, some 30 holes had been drilled for the purpose of blasting out the rock which is used in the manufacturing of the cement. The parties engaged at this work were Thos. Brophy, foreman of the quarry; John Simpson and the two men who were killed.

Rion and Bowler had taken a box containing a number of sticks of dynamite to one end of the row of holes, and Brophy and Simpson were at the other end. This has always been the custom, and the holes are so filled up by the parties until they meet in the centre, when from an electric battery, situated some yards away, the current is turned on and the rock blown up.

The two men whose lives were sacrificed had evidently filled up two holes with dynamite, and attached the caps and wire, and were working at the third hole, when a loud explosion occurred.

BLOWN TO PIECES.

Brophy and Simpson, turning suddenly around, could see nothing but rocks flying about and were unable to see any trace of Rion or Bowler.

Upon investigation the horribly mutilated remains of the men were found in different directions.

Bowler had been blown about 60 feet off in one direction and Rion some 70 to 80 feet in the opposite direction.

The latter's body went up in a tree and what remained of it was found lying by the trunk, on the ground. It presented a terrible appearance, as the unfortunate man was virtually decapitated, his hands and feet being blown off, in addition to other mutilations.

Bowler's remains presented an equally gruesome appearance, as the greater portion of his face was carried away and he was completely disembowelled, in the cavity being found four or five good-sized rocks. One of his hands was also blown off, as well as his feet. The effect of the explosion upon Bowler was most remarkable, as not a particle of clothing was left upon his body. In both cases death must have been instantaneous.

The severed members of the unfortunate men, and pieces of flesh, were picked up in all directions.

CORONER VIEWS THE SCENE.

The bodies were allowed to remain where they had been deposited by the explosion until Dr. Yeomans, coroner, of this city, had been called to view the scene of the accident.

After hearing the facts of the case, as presented by those about the plant, an inquest was considered unnecessary, and an order was given to have the remains taken care of.

CAUSE OF THE EXPLOSION NOT KNOWN,

As to the direct cause of the explosion, that, as already stated, is not known, and never will be. The impression amongst those who, perhaps, are in a position to know, is that Rion and Bowler were either engaged in tamping down the dynamite in the holes and struck the percussion cap, which is at the head of the last stick placed in the hole, or picked the cap.

The concussion caused two of the filled holes to explode, and the shock was such as to be plainly felt for some distance away from the works.

PREPARED FOR BURIAL.

As soon as possible after the accident the remains were brought to Tickell & Sons' undertaking establishment, in this city and prepared for burial.

The remains of Bowler were on Sunday afternoon taken to the parents' home, at Point Ann, and Rion's were this afternoon taken to Holloway Street Church, where services were held prior to burial.

BOTH YOUNG MEN.

Rion, who was 29 years of age, was a widower, and his case is an exceptionally sad one, as only three weeks ago his wife was laid away in the tomb. By this distressing dispensation of Providence two little children are orphaned, but will, no doubt receive the tender care and loving sympathy of relatives and friends.

Bowler was a young man, only 19 years of age, and was a son of Mr. Geo. Bowler, who resides at Point Ann. He was a nephew of Mr. D. Bowler and Mrs. T. Haslip, of this city. The young fellow was a fine specimen of manhood.

The parents and relatives of the unfortunate men will receive the heartfelt sympathy of every one in the deplorable accident which has bereaved them.

BOTH MEN WERE POPULAR.

Both men were well spoken of by their fellow-employees. They had been employed about the cement works for some time, and were considered competent and reliable. Their terrible death has cast a gloom not only over the works, but over the neighborhood, where both were well and favorably known.

MORBID CURIOSITY

A large number from the city and vicinity, inspired by morbid curiosity, yesterday visited the scene of the accident.

No trace whatever has been found of the box containing the sticks of dynamite which the men took with them for the purpose of filling the holes.

Rion was a member of the Canadian Order of Oddfellows, under whose auspices the funeral was conducted this afternoon. A goodly number of the members attended. On the 21st of last month Mrs. Rion died, and the husband was killed one month, less a day, later, namely, on October 20th.

Peterboro Man Will Succeed Mr. Mathison

SALARY IS $2,000 PER ANNUM AND A FREE RESIDENCE—APPOINTEE ONCE RAN FOR THE LEGISLATURE.

Toronto, Oct. 23.—Dr. C. B. Coughlin, of Peterboro, has been appointed Superintendent of the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb at Belleville. Premier Whitney made the announcement officially on Saturday afternoon through his secretary, Mr. Horace Wallis.

Interest concerning the appointment was general among medical men of the province and a number of physicians had intimated to the department that they were available as Mr. R. Mathison's successor. The salary that goes with the office is $2,000 a year and a free residence. The retiring Superintendent, owing to his long term of service, was receiving much more than this amount.

Dr. Coughlin assumes his new responsibilities in the prime of life. He practiced for several years at Arthur, Wellington county, and less than a decade ago was Hon. J. M. Gibson's opponent as Conservative candidate in East Wellington for the Legislature. Four years ago Dr. Coughlin moved to Peterboro, and on the reorganization of the Provincial Board of Health was appointed a member of that body by the Government. Dr. Coughlin is a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

For some time deceased was engaged in farming, but of late years had been unable to follow that occupation, owing to ill-health. Heart trouble was the cause of death. Mr. Orrill was for years a member of Bridge St. Methodist Church and in politics was a Conservative. He was respected by all who knew him. A widow but no family survives. Four brothers and four sisters also survive. The brothers are Richard, William and Thomas, of Trenton, and Charles, a G.T.R. engineer, of this city. SUIT MAY SHOW FRAUD.

Fernie Lumber Co. May Have Paid Royalties on Only a Portion of the Cut.

Nelson, B. C., Oct. 22.—Sensational evidence was given yesterday in the Fernie Lumber Co. suits for damages against the Crow's Nest Southern Railway, through fire originating on the right of way of the railway.

Inspector Martin for the Government testified that royalty had been collected on 900,000 feet of timber only, whereas accounts of the company produced showed more than double this cut. Government officials say that the books produced in court were not those inspected by him at the mill.

The mill accountant said he had never seen the inspector examine the books. He knew nothing of the books required by the statutory enactment.

An enquiry is probable into the whole matter. The court has adjourned and will examine ground at Fernie to-day.

THE BUCKINGHAM KILLING.

Jury Returned An Open Verdict On Saturday Afternoon.

Buckingham, Oct. 22.—The jury returned an open verdict Saturday afternoon after the inquest on the death of Detective Warner of Montreal, who was mortally wounded in the battle between the local lumbermen strikers and the special constables, aided by the brothers Maclaren.

The evidence taken yesterday went heavily against the Maclaren side of the case. One witness stated that Alexander Maclaren had fired the first shot, which opened the fight.

First, in the case of a navigable river, is there any public property on the banks such as the foreshore of the sea border? On the bank of the Lievre River the police stopped the strikers.

Second, can proprietors employ armed men as watchmen even though they are sworn in as private constables?

Third, is it not the duty of persons who suspect trouble to notify the provincial or Dominion authorities, as it the case in England, where there is no such individual as the private armed detective authorities?

These are some of the points which will be threshed out and will probably form a precedent in Canadian law.

CLEMENCEAU'S CABINET.

Col Picquart, Defender of Dreyfus, May Be Offered Portfolio.

Paris, Oct. 22.—M. Clemenceau, Minister of the Interior, was summoned yesterday to the Elysee Palace and entrusted with the task of forming a new Ministry.

He expressed his acceptance, and then consulted M. Sarrien, the former Premier, with regard to the political situation; M. Dubost, president of the Senate, and M. Bourgeois, Minister of Foreign Affairs whom he urged pressingly to retain his portfolio. M. Bourgeois was inflexible in his refusal, pleading ill-health.

M. Clemenceau also held conferences with his political friends, including Col. Picquart, the defender of Dreyfus, who was restored to the army and promoted in July. M. Clemenceau declares he has not yet offered any portfolio, and saw Col. Picquart only to obtain information on certain phases of the army estimates. It will take him four days to choose his Ministers.

Winnipeg, Oct. 22.—Hungarians of Winnipeg will appeal to the Department of Justice at Ottawa to extend clemency to Vincleur Magyar, who is under sentence to be hanged at Regina on Nov. 29 for murder, and in whose the full court at Regina, Friday last refused to grant a new trial.

Magyar was convicted of shooting James Campbell a farmer of Frobisher, for whom he was working, and with whom he had a dispute over wages.

On Tuesday night Mr. Borden will speak at Sudbury.

Dynamited For Revenge.

Belleville, Oct. 22.—It turns out now that the reason for the dynamiting of the Marble Spring cheese factory, near Bridgewater, which took place recently, was enmity towards the cheesemaker, Bert Bouth. It is alleged that two men have a grudge against him. A provincial detective may look into the case.

Chicago Cable Cars Go.

Chicago, Ill., Oct. 22.—Cable cars yesterday morning ceased to operate in Chicago, electric trolley cars of latest type taking the place of the antiquated cars drawn by underground steel ropes for the past 19 years.

Twenty-three Chinese laborers, who were being lowered into the mine, were dashed to pieces.

THE "BLEACHERS" FELL.

One Hundred Injured and Three May Die In Football Accident.

Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 22.—During the progress of the football game between the teams from Syracuse and Colgate universities at New Star Park here Saturday afternoon, a portion of the upper section of the bleacher stands collapsed.

The stands were densely packed and 400 people were precipitated into the enclosure under the stands.

It is a miracle that none was killed. Of the 100 or more injured, the death of three of them is expected. Rev. Christopher J. Donigan, assistant pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church, sustained an injury to his spine which may prove fatal. Prof. William Lusk, principal of the Union Free School, Hamilton, also sustained a serious injury to his spine, and he is in a precarious condition at a hospital. John West of Rome is injured internally and may die.

The accident occurred just after the resumption of play in the second half.

KILLED BETWEEN TRACKS.

John Corrigan, Too Deaf to Hear Train, Was Run Down.

Hamilton, Oct. 22.—John Corrigan, a G. T. R. carpenter, was run down by a yard engine in the Stuart street yards yesterday morning and instantly killed.

He was very deaf, and while walking in a narrow space between two tracks the engine backed into him, dragging him some distance. His head was severed from his body, his hand was cut off and his body frightfully mangled.

The unfortunate man was 66 years of age. A widow and a grown-up family survive him. An inquest will be held.

COLLIERY BANK ON FIRE.

Twelve Hundred Employes May Be Idle Several Weeks.

Glace Bay, N.S., Oct. 22.—Yesterday morning the reserve colliery bank head was discovered to be on fire, the conflagration originating in a pile of slack coal beneath the structure. The colliery brigade turned out, but were unable to save it. The machine-shop also went up in flames, and but for a favorable wind the other buildings would have been burnt.

When the bank gave way the haulage ropes broke and blazing coal cars went careering down the slope with a possibility of setting the mine on fire, but were wrecked by the side of the track.

A Boy Was Killed.

One fatality occurred. Four small boys were driving a company's team when their horse ran away, and, dashing into a gatepost near the stables, overturned the wagon. Three of the boys escaped, but the fourth fell underneath the wagon, crushing his skull. Death came inside of half an hour.

The property loss to the coal company, some $5,000 to $6,000, is the lightest loss. It will take a few weeks to get up, even a temporary bank head to handle run of the mine coal, and in the meantime 1,200 employes will be idle.

Montreal, Oct. 22.—Homer Taylor, 60 years of age, and a well-known business man, was killed on the C.P.R. near Alexandria. A fellow-workman named Francis Troy had his sight slightly, but not permanently injured.

SEE CORPSES IN LUTIN.

Divers Succeed In Getting Rope Under Sunken Submarine.

Bizera, Tunis, Oct. 22.—The divers working on the French submarine-boat Lutin, which went down off this coast, Oct. 16, with 14 men and two officers on board, yesterday succeeded in digging a tunnel under her stern, through which a hawser was passed.

All efforts to remove the bodies from the Lutin have proved vain. Through the window of the hatch divers have perceived two corpses.

Kansas City, Mo., Oct. 22.—A fire that started Saturday afternoon in a booth connected with a street fair in Kansas City, Kas., caused a loss estimated at over $150,000, and for a time threatened the business centre. The Masonic Temple, valued at $50,000; 80 booths, containing valuable exhibits of various kinds, and five residences were destroyed, and the Central Christian Church was damaged.

Aged Woman Suicides.

Brockville, Oct. 22.—A few rods from her home, near Carthage, was found the body of Mrs. Emerson Peek, aged 63, with an ugly cut in her throat. Catarrh of the Stomach

A PLEASANT, SIMPLE, BUT SAFE AND EFFECTUAL CURE FOR IT.

IT COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Catarrh of the stomach has long been considered the next thing to incurable. The usual symptoms are a full or bloating sensation after eating, accompanied sometimes with sour or watery risings, a formation of gases, causing pressure on the heart and lungs, and difficult breathing, headaches, fickle appetite, nervousness and a general played out, languid feeling.

There is often a foul taste in the mouth, coated tongue, and if the interior of the stomach could be seen it would show a slimy, inflamed condition.

The cure for this common and obstinate trouble is found in a treatment which causes the food to be readily, thoroughly digested before it has time to ferment and irritate the delicate mucous surfaces of the stomach. To secure a prompt and healthy digestion is the one necessary thing to do and when normal digestion is secured the catarrhal condition will have disappeared.

According to Dr. Harlanson, the safest and best treatment is to use after each meal a tablet composed of Diastase, Aseptic Pepsin, a little Nux, Golden Seal and Fruit Acids. These tablets can now be found at all drug stores under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and not being a patent medicine can be used with perfect safety and assurance that healthy appetite and thorough digestion will follow their regular use after meals.

Mr. R. S. Workman, Chicago, Ill., writes: "Catarrh is a local condition resulting from a neglected cold in the head, whereby the lining membrane of the nose becomes inflamed and the poisonous discharge therefrom passing backward into the throat, reaches the stomach, thus producing catarrh of the stomach. Medical authorities prescribed for me for three years for catarrh of stomach without cure, but to-day I am the happiest of men after using only one box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I cannot find appropriate words to express my good feeling. I have found flesh, appetite and sound rest from their use."

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the safest preparation, as well as the simplest and most convenient remedy for any form of indigestion, Catarrh of Stomach, biliousness, sour stomach, heartburn and bloating after meals.

There were serious riots in the city of Valencia Saturday in consequence of a statement by the Archbishop of Valencia, that couples having been united by civil marriages only were living in a state of concubinage. There was a great demonstration against the prelate, who was fiercely denounced.

Amid cries of "Death to the archbishop!" the mob moved toward the archbishop's palace, but troops prevented them from reaching it.

The archbishop has been summoned to Madrid in order to allay the excitement.

Twenty-two Japanese out of fifty-three on board were landed twenty miles from here on Friday. Nine have been apprehended. The detained schooner is liable to confiscation and a fine of $100 for each man not listed.

The captain said that heavy weather had blown them from the Copper Islands, where they had been fishing. The schooner was short of water.

Canada imposes no poll tax on the Japanese, but they are expected, with all other immigrants, to submit to inspection.

Paris, Oct. 23.—M. Clemenceau has begun the formation of a Cabinet. He offered the Foreign Office portfolio to M. Poincare, Minister of Finance in the Sarrien administration, who declined. M. Caillaux, who was Finance Minister in the Waldeck-Rousseau Cabinet, has accepted the portfolio of Finance. It is regarded as certain that M. Briand, Minister of Public Worship; M. Barthou, Minister of Public Works; M. Ruan, Minister of Agriculture; M. Thompson, Minister of Marine, and M. Doumerge, Minister of Commerce, will remain, and that Gen. Picquart will get the War portfolio, and M. Miller and the Justice Department. A new Ministry of Labor may be created with M. Vivian, the well-known Socialist Deputy, at its head.

Three Judges Against Two

Hold Hon. J. H. Lamont in His Prince Albert, Sask., Seat.

Old Law Is Not Applicable—Appeal Against Decision of Judge Prendergast Dismissed By Saskatchewan Court—Laurier Judges Say There Is No Controverted Elections Act—May Be Appeal to Supreme Court.

Regina, Sask., Oct. 23.—The controverted election law is not in force.

That is the decision reached in the Supreme Court sitting yesterday afternoon and the ruling of Judge Prendergast is therefore sustained.

The appeal was on the decision in the petition against Hon. J. H. Lamont in Prince Albert.

The court divided before coming to a conclusion and when all decisions were read it was found that Judges Wetmore and Scott were for quashing the decision of Judge Prendergast and allowing the hearing of election protests, while Judges Sifton, Newlands and Harvey were of opinion that the appeal should be quashed.

The last three judges are appointees of the Liberal Government, while the former two judges, Wetmore and Scott, were appointed by the old Conservative Government.

Five decision were read out before the final result was known and each judge made his finding on a different ground.

The result of the decision is that 16 protests against the return of members of Legislative Assembly charged with bribery and corruption are held in abeyance and cannot be brought to courts for a fair hearing.

Feeling was running high in Regina last night and on the street there is almost as much excitement as when the election was held.

It is said that an appeal will be made to the Supreme Court of Canada.

MUST BE TRIED AGAIN.

Judgment In "Thin Red Line" Case Is Reserved.

Winnipeg, Oct. 22.—Lawrence Duggan, returning officer at Selkirk in the Dominion elections of 1904, must go to trial again.

At a sitting of the Appeal Court yesterday, the decision of Judge Perdue, withdrawing the case from the jury, was reversed. The court orders that the plea of not guilty must be set aside, and that Duggan, who is accused in what is known as the "thin red line" case, of having erased, or caused to be erased, the names of persons entitled to vote on the lists of the Dominion election, must go to trial again.

Chinese Army Manoeuvres.

Chang Te Fu, Province of Honan, China, Oct. 23.—The autumn manoeuvres of the Chinese imperial army began yesterday in the neighborhood of Chang Te Fu. About 30,000 troops are engaged, under the command of Yuan Shikai, commander-in-chief of the Chinese forces, and including cavalry, infantry and artillery, the latter army consisting of 150 guns. The troops engaged in the operations are equipped with the most modern accoutrements, and have been drilled and trained by foreign officers. Thirty artillery attaches of foreign powers are closely following the operations.

Drown In Building Foundation.

Detroit, Oct. 23.—For the foundation of the new Ford 18-storey building on Griswold street, nearly 15 caissons or wells, from six to ten feet in diameter, and from 150 to 200 feet deep, are being sunk. These wells will be filled with cement forming the piers upon which the structure will rest. Two men, Fred Rush and Lacio Tol, were caught at the bottom of one of the shafts 150 feet below the surface yesterday and drowned like rats.

Norway's Parliament Opens.

Christiania, Norway, Oct. 23.—The newly-elected Parliament was opened yesterday by King Haakon, in the presence of Queen Maud and the diplomatic corps. The King said he rejoiced at the "great good-will shown by foreign countries towards our fatherland since the establishment of its independence," and spoke hopefully of Norway's future prospects.

Lineman's Frightful Death.

Montreal, Oct. 23.—A young man named Kelly, an employe of the Montreal Park & Island Railway, missed his footing, and in trying to prevent himself from falling, seized hold of a live wire. Sparks were noticed flying from his hands, and in the twinkling of an eye the deadly wires were embedded in the flesh of his hands with fatal results.

Submarine Sprang a Leak.

Paris, Oct. 23.—The naval court enquiry at Bizera, Tunis, has officially transmitted to the Ministry of Marine its theory that the submarine boat Lutin sprang a leak in her stern, which destroyed her equilibrum and that she thereupon sunk and filled.

Carthagenian Refloated.

Philadelphia, Oct. 23.—The British ship Carthagenian, from Glasgow, which went aground on Thursday in the Delaware Bay, was floated yesterday afternoon. She is apparently undamaged.

Crushed In Horses' Stall.

Slaughtering Quail.

Windsor, Oct. 23.—Farmers coming into town report that a ruthless slaughter of quail is being carried on in Essex County by "pot hunters." The open season does not begin until Nov. 1.

Sea Captain Suicides.

Halifax, N. S., Oct. 23.—Capt. Nelson Payzant, a well-known retired sea captain, committed suicide yesterday by hanging himself. Despondency caused by ill-health, is the supposed cause.

Black Jackets

THE MOST FASHIONABLE

Fashion has decreed black to be the fashionable garment for autumn and winter wear. Tweeds are rapidly on the wain and will be rapidly replaced in favor by black, and after all what could be handsomer than black for a dressy coat. It can be worn anywhere and with anything and always lends a dignified appearance to the wearer.

We have made provision for the fashion by importing an elaborate display of black coats for both ladies and maids. We think we are justified in saying that a choicer lot could scarcely be seen anywhere.

The black coats are particularly pretty this season, with their handsome trimmings of braids and embroidery.

When you are ready for your new coat, call into our Mantle Department for a few minutes and let us show you the latest styles. New ones keep arriving almost every day.

Mr. Fielding's Mistakes,

Mr. Fielding's Budget speech of last session proves to have been a good deal out of the way. It was nearly at the end of the fiscal year when he spoke, but his estimate of the expenditure for 1905-6 was $1,159,360 too low. This is in current expenditure alone. The capital outlay has been $452,216 above Mr. Fielding's estimate, so that altogether he was a million and a half out in his reckoning. The Finance Minister expressed the hope that there would be no increase in the net national debt during the year. As a matter of fact there was last year an increase of over $800,000 in the debt of the country in spite of the alleged surplus of $13,000,000. It is a great thing for a government to have a surplus, but the kind which Mr. Fielding produces always go with an increase of debt.

Parliament will not meet early in November as proposed. The tariff on which ministers were supposed to be engaged during the last year and a half is not prepared. It may be recalled that the Minister of Finance met with an accident last winter and that this was the reason given for the failure to revise the tariff in the late session. As the Tariff Commission has been busy over the matter since the House rose, and the measure is not yet in shape, we may now suppose that there were other reasons for the delay.

The closing of the accounts of the fiscal year makes it possible to see how the cost of governing the country has increased in ten years. The following table is for "ordinary" expenses alone:

1897	$38,349,670
1898	38,832,526
1899	41,903,501
1900	42,975,279
1901	46,866,368
1902	50,759,392
1903	51,691,903
1904	55,612,833
1905	63,319,683
1906	67,659,360

The current expenditure in the last year of Conservative rule was $36,349,142.

TIMELY TOPICS.

Medicinal mud baths are said to be splendid for health, which reminds us that Front St. should be a great health resort if only there were a few pounds of sulphur mixed with the mud which covers it.

A sure sign that municipal elections are not far off is the fact that the Council has begun to talk sewerage again. After the question has lain quiescent for nine months or so, it generally bobs up at the end of a year, only to drop out of sight again before the smoke of the municipal battle has cleared away. The City Fathers seem to talk like business this time. Let us hope something may come of the oratory. Belleville needs sewerage, and, like the kid reaching for the cake of soap, won't be happy till she gets it.

It's nice to hear of prospective industries, but ten thousand dollar loans do not grow on every bush, especially after the summer has been a dry one. However, the matter, which came up in the Council last night, has been referred to the Industrial Committee, and those industrious gentlemen can be depended on to look after it.

The case of Mr. Orr, who last night addressed a letter to the Council, asking remuneration for a heavy doctor bill, the same having been incurred for injuries caused by a fall on a defective sidewalk, recalls to mind the fact that the old man traps which exist on our outlying streets, and which are dignified by the name of sidewalks, cannot be got rid of too quickly. The Intelligencer has always contended that some kind of cheap walk was needed for places where the more expensive granolithic walks cannot be laid. Let us hope the tar macadam walk, now being laid on South George St., may solve the problem. In the meantime, the moral in Mr. Orr's case seems to be—if you receive injuries through a defective walk, do not wait till the time limit has expired before entering a claim for damages.

There are some mean women in this world, says the Buffalo Express. A New York man, who was tired of working, beat his wife in order to get into the penitentiary. Then the heartless creature refused to make a charge against him and he was turned out to face the cold world.

• • •

The following is just such an article as one would expect to find in the sane and conservative Montreal Gazette. It contains a quiet rebuke to such silly shouters as the Toronto Globe, which, by lurid headlines, tried to hound Hon. Mr. Foy on to precipitancy. The Gazette says, "It became known on Thursday of last week that the Ontario Bank was in difficulties, and on Wednesday of this week the general manager was under arrest and the president had been summoned to appear in court on a charge of breaking the provisions of the Bank Act. There are newspapers and men who complain that this procedure was not rapid enough. There are many people who seem to forget that the law officers have responsibilities as well as power, and that among the responsibilities is that they should be reasonably sure a crime has been committed before they undertake to put anybody in jail. This is one of the protections of innocent men; and reasonable men will not condemn the officials who remember it."

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE BRIDGE ST. CONCERT.

There was, considering the weather, a large audience at the Thanksgiving concert given last night by the choir of Bridge St. Church, assisted by Miss Edna Bird, Mr. Dan A. Cameron, Mr. J. Vincent Doyle and Prof. W. H. Spooner, organist of St. Thomas' Church. The programme was an exceedingly pleasing one, and it was a delighted audience which filed out about 10 o'clock. There were organ solos by Prof. Hunt and Prof. Spooner, both gentlemen playing up to the form which has given them a high reputation in this city. Mr. Dan A. Cameron sang the aria, "But Who May Abide?" from "The Messiah," and overcame the technical difficulties in a masterly way, showing great flexibility of voice and richness of tone. Mr. Cameron's vibrato, which he sometimes leaves at home, was in beautiful working order last night, more's the pity. Mr. J. Vincent Doyle sang Faure's "Crucifix" in a highly reverential and impressive way. He has a fine high baritone voice, good method and no florid nonsense about him. Mr. Doyle should be a favorite on Belleville concert programmes. He has improved very perceptibly in the past year. Miss Edna Bird sang Dudley Buck's "My Redeemer and My Lord," in a pleasing way, and gave the beautiful number a sympathetic rendition. The duet by Mrs. A. P. Allen and Mr. Cameron, "By Thee With Bliss," from "The Creation," with chorus by the choir, was a charming number, and Mrs. Allen's high and flexible soprano was hardly ever heard to better advantage.

The second part of the programme consisted of a cantata, "A Song of Praise," which was very well rendered by the choir and soloists. Mr. Cameron sang the baritone solos, Mrs. Allen the soprano and Miss Gertrude Price the alto. The choir was in fine form, though, truth to tell, the attack, once or twice, was not quite up to the Bridge St. standard. However, that standard, as everybody knows, is a high one. The cantata proved to be an exceedingly tuneful composition, and could easily be sung in many places before it received a better interpretation than that of last night. The solos were, without exception, charmingly sung, the choruses being given with fine coloring. A very pleasing number was a quartette, "The Sun is Setting," by Mrs. Allen, Miss Price, Mr. C. H. Vermilyea and Mr. S. R. Burrows. The voices, unaccompanied, blended beautifully. Mrs. Allen's aria, "I Will Extol Thee," and Miss Price's solo, "We Sow the Seed," were also listened to with keen pleasure. The baritone solos by Mr. Cameron were quite up to his usual excellent form. Prof. Hunt played the accompaniments in a masterly and unobtrusive way.

"HELLO BILL."

A small company presented the above attraction in the Carman last night, and a small audience turned up to see it. There was plenty of singing and dancing, and the plot was not so complicated that people had to overtax their brain in order to follow it. "A musical absurdity" would just about describe it. The audience, however, seemed to like it, and encored the songs liberally. The star, Mr. George F. Hall, was very good, and the company a fairly capable one.

"THE DUCHESS OF DEVONSHIRE."

From beginning to end there have been few plays in the history of the stage more completely equipped than is "The Duchess of Devonshire," touring this season under the management of Mr. Ernest Shipman with Miss Roselle Knott as Georgiana Spencer, the "Duchess of Devonshire," which comes to the Carman on Thursday night. The costumes for the historical figures in the play have been prepared by the best costumers in New York and are complete in every detail. The old furniture, the tapestry, the armor, the wall plates, the books, all have been selected because of their special fitness, and one of the hardest things at the rehearsals of the play has been the old fashioned dances which are introduced. In its last act the play is unique in that the good old atmosphere is retained to the very last.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

NO ACCIDENTS IN NATURE.

Every Calamity, No Matter How Great, Has a Definite Beginning.

There are no accidents in nature. The avalanche that without a moment's warning rushes headlong down the mountain side is not an accident. For years previous tiny atoms have been crystalizing and adding their minute weight to the mass which left its base when the accumulation reached a certain point.

Neither is baldness an accident. The infinitesmally small germ which is the cause of Dandruff and Baldness, feeds silently and long before the result is seen.

The small germs which thrive on the scalp and which are the cause of baldness and dandruff cannot exist however, when Newbro's Herpicide is applied.

Sold by leading druggists. Send 10c in stamps for sample to The Herpicide Co., Detroit, Mich. J. S. McKeown, special agent.

A PLANET OF GREAT PEAKS.

Peculiarity of the Ring Mountains of the Moon.

The moon is really and truly a great planet of mountains, its whole visible surface being dotted with elevations of curious shapes and of extraordinary height. We say "its whole visible surface" and hasten to explain that we make this statement simply because the eye of man has never seen but one side of the surface of the moon. What we see convinces us that the little planet is extremely mountainous, for on the "end" exposed to our view there are no less than 30,000 peaks, varying in height from 2,000 feet to four miles. When we consider the fact that this lunarian world is only one thirty-second part as large as the earth we can easily see why it deserves the title of the "planet of great mountains." There is a peculiar thing about these 30,000 moon peaks. Each and every one of them has a ringlike form, the open end of the conical point being of greater or lesser diameter, according to the height of the mountain. In a low grade telescope these peaks resemble true volcanoes, but when viewed through a high grade glass it is seen that the depression in the center of the queer "ring mountain" is often so great as to be below the general level of the surrounding country. The depth of these depressions is calculated in a curious manner, by figuring on the relative shadows they cast when the sun is shining full upon them. The diameter of these "ring mountains" varies greatly, some of the larger ones being 50, 100 or even 150 miles, while the smaller look like post holes when viewed through a good telescope.

Saved the Life of Columbus.

When Christopher Columbus was in Jamaica he would have died but for the herbal medicines the natives brought him. There is no doubt that aboriginal tribes know more of the medicinal virtues of herbs and roots than is sometimes conceded. When Captain Cook discovered Australia he was amazed by the freedom from disease which the natives enjoyed, in consequence of using certain roots and herbs as medicines. It was in this country that the herbal remedy Bileans was first produced. Their use spread, as their value was made more known, till to-day all over the globe Bileans are a household remedy.

Miss E. Reed, of Kingston, Ont., says: "I suffered terribly with acute indigestion all last winter. Pain followed all food, with wind spasms, rifting, etc. My sleep at night was fitful and broken and my strength failed. Bileans were introduced to me, and I found relief from their use within a very short time. They have now cured me." Bileans cure constipation without causing griping, cure piles, biliousness, indigestion, sick headache, etc., and give strength and energy to run-down systems. All druggists sell at fifty cents a box, or post free from the Bilean Co., Toronto, on receipt of price.

Eskimo Throwing Sticks.

A "throwing stick," "throwing board" or "spear thrower," as it is sometimes called, is a contrivance for casting a javelin or harpoon, which is employed by various savage races, such as the Australians, some South American tribes and especially by the Eskimos, among whom its use is almost universal. Roughly speaking, it is a narrow grooved board a foot or so long, with one end cut into a handle and the other provided with a stud or peg for the butt of the spear to rest against. It is used thus: Grasping the handle as he would a sword, the man fits the shaft of the spear into the groove, with the butt resting against the stud, steadying the spear with the finger. Then, extending his arm and bending back his hand till the spear lies horizontal, he aims at the mark and propels the weapon by a quick forward jerk of the stick. In this way I have seen Eskimo boys casting their forked javelins at wounded waterfowl.

When Buchanan Was King.

George Buchanan was a scholar, historian, controversialist and the best Latin poet of his age. Buchanan was tutor to Mary, queen of Scots, and to her son James, afterward James I. of England. One day he caused himself to be made king of Scotland, and this was the way of it: Having observed in James a tendency to too ready acquiescence, he drew up a paper for the royal pupil to sign. James did so at once without having read it. The document happened to be a transfer of the royal authority to Buchanan for fifteen days, and no sooner had the poet got it into his possession than he began to play the monarch, even before the king himself. James thought the man a lunatic until the instrument was produced by which he had signed away his sovereignty. This incident was used by the worthy preceptor to illustrate the day's lesson on the responsibilities of monarchs.

Studio Manners Bad.

"Why do you dip your own spoon into the general sugar bowl?" asked the particular woman of the bachelor girl.

"I don't know," replied the bachelor girl plaintively, "unless it is because my studio life is corrupting my good manners. When you eat your breakfast all by yourself and there's nobody else to dip a spoon into the sugar bowl and it's all your own spoon and all your own sugar bowl and there's nobody to see or to care, why, you are almost bound to get careless and forget and dip it into other sugar bowls, aren't you?"

Sculptors' Potboilers.

They were walking past a beautiful pink and white house in New York whose door cap was most exquisitely carved. The sculptor pointed to it. "My work," he said. "That's the potboiling I do while I work on my masterpiece. It is nothing unusual with sculptors to do such work. Two of the finest pieces that were sold to the Metropolitan museum last winter were done by a man whose regular business it is to make door caps."

The Usual Way.

"Papa," said Jacky, "would you like to have me give you a birthday present?"

"Yes, indeed."

"Then now is the time to double my weekly pocket money, so's I'll have the money to buy it when your birthday comes."

Stung to the Quick.

"Henry, you look very pale. What's the trouble?"

"I was stung to the quick by an adder this afternoon."

"How did it happen?"

"Why, I dropped in at the bank, and the bookkeeper told me my account was overdrawn."

An ounce of contentment is more beneficial to a woman's complexion than a pound of cosmetics.

It is really one of the most wonderful tonics for developing the figure and soothing the nerves ever offered to the American people. Hollister's Rocky Mountain Tea or Tablets, 35 cents. D. M. Waters.

British Market Quotations Unchanged—Hogs Lower at Buffalo.

London, Oct. 22.—Canadian cattle in the British markets are quoted at 10c to 11¾c per lb.; refrigerator beef, 9c to 9¼c per pound.

TORONTO JUNCTION LIVE STOCK.

Toronto, Oct. 22.—Receipts of live stocks at the Union Stock Yards were 105 car loads, composed of 2207 cattle, 32 sheep, 20 calves and 100 mules. The mules were in transit to South Africa, being fed and watered and not for sale.

Exporters.

Prices ranged from $4.25 to $4.80, the bulk selling at $4.25 to $4.60; export bulls, at $3.65 to $4.25 per cwt.

Butchers.

The bulk of the butchers' cattle were of poor quality, very few good to choice animals being offered. Picked butchers' sold at $4.40 to $4.60; loads of good, $4 to $4.40; medium, $3.60 to $3.85; cows, $2.50 to $3.40; canners, $1.50 to $2 per cwt.

Feeders and Stockers.

There was a fairly large trade in stockers and feeders transacted as nearly all the largest buyers and feeders were operating, viz., H. Murby, H. Hunnisett, Lunness & Halligan and Denn Bros., as well as several farmers. Trade in this line was active and prices ruled as follows: Best short-keeps, 1100 to 1200 lbs. each, at $4 to $4.25; best feeders, 950 to 1050 lbs., at $3.60 to $3.90; best feeders, 800 to 950 lbs., at $3.25 to $3.60; best stockers, 600 to 800 lbs., at $3 to $3.25; common stockers, 500 to 800 lbs., at $2.12½ to $2.60.

Milch Cows.

About a dozen milch cows and forward springers were sold at $35 to $55 each. More good cows would have found ready sale.

Veal Calves.

The quality of the veal calves offered was not first class, and prices were quoted at $3.50 per cwt. for those on sale. Good quality calves are in demand and would command $5.50 to $7 per cwt.

Sheep and Lambs.

Trade in sheep and lambs is not quite as brisk in sympathy with Buffalo markets, where prices are quoted much lower than they have been. Lambs sold at $4.75 to $5.50 per cwt., and export ewes at $4.50 per cwt.

Hogs.

H. P. Kennedy reports prices easy at $6.25 per cwt. for selects, and $6 for light fats.

MONTREAL LIVE STOCK.

Montreal, Oct. 22.—Cables from Liverpool and London on Canadian cattle came stronger and prices show an advance of one cent per pound with sales in Liverpool at 10½c to 11c, and in London, at 10½c to 11½c. Glasgow cables were firmer at 5¾c to 6c, and reported the prospects improving. Demand for ocean freight space has been very quiet and rates are easier with Liverpool offering at 27s 6d, and London at 25s and even at these low figures agents find it impossible to fill the vessels. Exports last week were 3867 cattle, 119 sheep; receipts to-day were 1500 cattle 50 milch cows, 250 calves, 1300 sheep and lambs, 1000 hogs. Trade in cattle was fairly active and prices ruled steady, but good to choice beeves were scarce. Choice sold at 4¾c to 4½c; good, 3¾c to 4c; fair, 3¼c to 3½c; common, 2½c to 3c; inferior, 2c to 2¼c per lb. Milch cows met with a fair sale at $25 to $50 each. An active trade was done in sheep and lambs at firm prices. Sheep sold at 3½c to 4½c; lambs, 5¼c to 5¾c per lb. Demand for calves was good and choice stock sold at 5c to 5½c, and common at 2½c to 3¼c per pound. Cables from Liverpool, London and Bristol on Saturday were easier for Canadian bacon and prices showed a decline of 1s, which was fully expected by the trade here, owing to increased supplies from other countries. Receipts of hogs to-day were small, there being only 1000 received, of which 600 were purchased in the west by a leading packing concern, leaving only 400 to be sold on the market. This small run was no doubt due to the sharp decline in prices at the latter end of last week. A fairly active trade was done, but prices were unchanged at $6.25 to $6.50 per cwt., weighed off the cars for selected lots.

CHICAGO LIVE STOCK.

Chicago, Oct. 22.—Cattle—Receipts, about 27,000; best, steady; others, slow and weak, common to prime steers, $4 to $7.30; cows, $2.70 to $4.75; heifers, $2.00 to $5.35; bulls, $2.40 to $4.50; calves, $3 to $8; stockers and feeders, $2.40 to $4.40.

Hogs—Receipts about 28,000; best strong; others, weak; choice to prime heavy, $6.30 to $6.00; medium to good heavy, $6.40 to $6.50; butcher weights, $6.45 to $6.50; good to choice mixed, $6.35 to $6.45; packing $6 to $6.35; pigs, $5.50 to $6.40.

Sheep—Receipts, about 32,000; sheep, steady; lambs, weak to 10c lower; sheep, $4.50 to $5.75; yearlings, $5 to $6.25; lambs, $6 to $7.50.

CHEESE MARKETS.

Lindsay, Oct. 22.—The price of 12¼c for cheese at the sale of the Victoria County Cheese Board this morning did not satisfy the salesmen and the board did not sell. There were 1219 cheese boarded by 13 factories. Mr. Brown opened up with 12c, and Mr. Gillespie raised it to 12⅛c, and Mr. Clemes, buyer for Flavelle, to 12¼c.

OVEN THERMOMETER. NO "BAD LUCK" BAKING DAYS.

Twenty degrees difference in the temperature of an oven is sufficient to make "Good Luck" or "Bad Luck" in baking many kinds of food.

The heat in the oven of a range not fitted with a thermometer, or worse, fitted with a poor instrument, will easily vary twenty degrees—result is unpalatable, burned or half-baked food, a cross cook and a disappointed family at meal time.

Thermometer fitted in oven door of "Pandora" range has been a proven success for fifteen years, and every instrument is carefully adjusted, and tested by heat, before sending out—the first, best and only thermometer which is of any real value to those who do baking.

"Pandora" range is handsome, economical on fuel and a perfect baker. Sold by all enterprising dealers. Booklet free.

TENOR AND CONTRALTO DUET.

(Buffalo News.)

He—
Your eyes are like the Southern skies
With worlds of love within them pent—

She—
Please leave the money for the ice
And don't forget to pay the rent.

He—
Your mouth like Cupid's bow is arched;
I—lucky chap—to call you mine—

She—
Now this is washday—don't forget—
Bring up the tubs and string the line.

He—
Your hands — Divinely dainty hands—
Fit hands are they for taming Jove—

She—
Come home at 5 to-night, because
You simply must put up the stove!

He—
Your cheeks are tinged so fairly
With blushes of the early morn—

She—
Now, don't forget the fruit jars and
Have him send up a dozen corn.

He—
Your hair bewitchingly is waved
Across your brow like strands of gold—

She—
It's 8 o'clock! You're late to-day!
And—there, your coffee's grown stone cold!

He—
I'm off for work—goodby, fair one,
Light of my soul — farewell, dear lass!

She—
He's gone! (She hollers to him tho')
Tom, don't forget to pay th' g-a-s!

Al Adams, the Policy King of New York, who made an enormous fortune, amounting to many million dollars, out of an infamous system of the meanest kind of gambling, has given terrible proof of the truth of the Biblical axiom that "the way of the transgressor is hard." Having been indicted, tried and proved to be the most heartless of swindlers, he was sent for a term of years to the penitentiary. On the completion of his sentence he was released, and might have made an effort to live honestly, for he was still a rich man. But he could not overcome his instincts as a gambler. He became what is called a "plunger" in speculation, and in a short time got rid of all his ill-gotten money and found himself reduced to poverty. Treated with contempt and abhorrence wherever he appeared and was recognized, without a friend and nowhere to hide his shame, he performed himself the final act in the sordid tragedy of his life.

Bishop Chapon of France Thinks Modus Vivendi Is Possible.

Nice, France, Oct. 23.—While disclaiming to speak on the authority of the Pope, Bishop Chapon in an interview yesterday flatly declared his conviction that if the Church hierarchy, through the Bishops, is given the right by a decision of the Council of State to decide on the regularity of the Catholic associations in France to which Church property may be surrendered a modus vivendi between the Church and the Government is possible, and the Vatican will not insist upon Parliamentary action.

row. I don't want to get him into any harm, but a day or two ago I found this letter in a pocket-book in a belt worn by our queer patient. Steel says the fellow is a perfect stranger to him, and I believe that statement. But what about this letter? I ought to have sent it to the police, but I didn't. Read it."

And Cross proceeded to take a letter from his pocket. It was on thick paper; the stamped address given was "15, Downend Terrace." There was no heading, merely the words "Certainly, with pleasure, I shall be home; in fact, I am home every night till 12.30, and you may call any time up till then. If you knock quietly on the door I shall hear you.—D.S."

"What do you make of it?" Cross asked.

"It looks as if your patient had called at Steel's house by appointment," Bell admitted. "Here is the invitation undoubtedly in Steel's handwriting. Subsequently the poor fellow is found in Steel's house nearly murdered, and yet Steel declares solemnly that the man is a perfect stranger to him. It is a bad business, but I assure you that Steel is the soul of honor. Cross, would you be so good as to let me have that letter for two or three days?"

"Very well," Cross said, after a little hesitation. "Good-night."

Bell went on his way homeward with plenty of food for thought.

He stopped just for a moment to light a cigar.

"Getting towards the light," he muttered; "getting along. The light is not going to fail after all. I wonder what Reginald Henson would say if he only knew that I had been to the hospital and recognized our mutual friend Van Sneck there!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

The expression on Henson's usually benign countenance would have startled such of his friends and admirers as regarded him as a shining light and great example. The smug satisfaction, the unctuous sweetness of the expansive blue eyes were gone; a murderous gleam shone there instead. His lips were set and rigid, the strong hand seemed to be strangling the bedclothes. It wanted no effort of imagination to picture Henson as the murderer stooping over his prey. The man had discarded his mask altogether.

"Oh," he said, between his teeth, "you are a clever fellow. You would have made an excellent detective. And so you have found out where Van Sneck is?"

"I have already told you so," Littimer said, doggedly.

"How many days have you been hanging about Brighton?"

"Two or three. I came when I heard that Chris was ill. I didn't dare to come near the house, at least not too near, for fear of being seen. But I pumped the doctor. Then he told me that Chris was dead, and I risked it all to see the last of her."

"Yes, yes," Henson said, testily; "but what has this to do with Van Sneck?"

"I was looking for Van Sneck. I found that he had been here. I discovered that he had left his rooms and had not returned to them. Then it occurred to me to try the hospital. I pretended that I was in search of some missing relative, and they showed me three cases of bad accidents, the victims had not been identified. And the third was Van Sneck."

Littimer told his story with just the suggestion of triumph in his voice. Henson was watching him with the keenest possible interest.

"Do you know how Van Sneck got there?" he asked.

Littimer nodded. Evidently he had heard most of the story. Henson was silent for some little time. He was working out something in his mind. His smile was not a pleasant one; it was nothing like his bland platform smile, for instance.

"Give me that black book," he said. "Do you know how to work the telephone?"

"I daresay I could learn. It doesn't look hard."

"Well, that is an extension telephone on the table yonder worked in connection with the main instrument in the library. I like to have my own telephone, as it is of the greatest assistance to me. Turn that handle two or three times and put that receiver to your ear. When the Exchange answers tell them to put you on to 0,017 Gerrard."

Littimer obeyed mechanically, but though he rang and rang again no answer came. With a snarling curse Henson dragged himself out of bed and crossed the room, with limbs that shook under him.

He twirled the hand round passionately.

"You always were a fool," he growled, "and you always will be."

Still no reply came. Henson whirled angrily, but he could elicit no response. He kicked the instrument over and danced round it impotently. Littimer had never seen him in such a raging fury before. The language of the man was an outrage, filthy, revolting, profane. No yelling, drunken Hooligan could have been more fluent, more luridly diffuse.

"Go on," Littimer said, bitterly. "I like to hear you. I like to hear the smug, plausible Pharisee, the friend of the good and pious, going on like this. I'd give fifty years of my life to have just a handful of your future constituents here for a moment."

Henson paused suddenly and requested that Littimer should help him into bed.

"I can afford to speak freely before you," he said. "Say a word against me and I'll crush you. Put out a hand to injure me and I'll wipe you off the face of the earth. It's absolutely imperative that I should send an important telephone message to London at once, and here the machine has broken down and no chance of its being repaired for a day or two. Curse the telephone."

He lay back on his bed utterly exhausted by his fit of passion. One of the white bandages about his throat had started, and a little thin stream of blood trickled down his chest. Littimer waited for the next move. He watched the crimson fluid trickle over Henson's sleeping-jacket. He could have watched the big scoundrel bleeding to death with the greatest possible pleasure.

"What was Van Sneck doing here?"

The voice came clear and sharp from the bed. Littimer responded to it as a cowed hound does to a sudden yet not quite unexpected lash from a huntsman's whip. His manliness was of small account where Henson was concerned. For years he had come to heel like this. Yet the question startled him and took him entirely by surprise.

"He was looking for the lost Rembrandt."

But Littimer's surprise was as nothing to Henson's amazement. He lay flat on his back so that his face could not be seen. From the expression of it he had obtained a totally unexpected reply to his question. He was so amazed that he had no words for the moment. But his quick intelligence and amazing cunning grasped the possibilities of the situation. Littimer was in possession of information to which he was a stranger. Except in a vague way he had not the remotest idea what Littimer was talking about. But the younger man must not know that.

"So Van Sneck told you so?" he asked. "What a fool he must have been! And why should he come seeking for the Rembrandt in Brighton?"

"Because he knows it was there, I suppose."

"It isn't here, because it doesn't exist. The thing was destroyed by accident by the police when they raided Van Sneck's lodgings years ago."

"Van Sneck told me that he had actually seen the picture in Brighton."

Henson chuckled. The noise was intended to convey amused contempt, and it had that effect, so far as Littimer was concerned. It was well for Henson that the latter could not see the strained anxiety of his face. The man was alert and quivering with excitement in every limb. Still he chuckled again as if the whole thing merely amused him.

"'The Crimson Blind' is Van Sneck's weak spot," he said. "It is King Charles's head to him. By good or bad luck—it is in your hands to say which—you know all about the way in which it became necessary to get Hatherly Bell on our side. All the same, the Rembrandt—the other one—is destroyed."

"Van Sneck has seen the picture," Littimer said, doggedly.

"Oh, play the farce out to the end," Henson laughed, good-humoredly. "Where did he see it?"

"He says he saw it at 218, Brunswick Square."

Henson's knees suddenly came up to his nose, then he lay quite flat again for a long time. His face had grown white once more, his lips utterly bloodless. Fear was written all over him. A more astute man than Littimer would have seen the beads standing out on his forehead. It was some little time before he dared trust himself to speak again.

"I know the house you mean," he said. "It is next door to the temporary residence of my esteemed friend, Gilead Gates. At the present moment the place is void——"

"And has been ever since your bogus 'Home' broke up. Years ago, before you used your power to rob and oppress us as you do now, you had a Home there. You collected subscriptions right and left in the name of the Reverend Felix Crosbie, and you put the money into your pocket. A certain weekly journal exposed you, and you had to leave suddenly or you would have found yourself in the hands of the police. Your skipped so suddenly that you had no time even to think of your personal effects, which you understood were sold to defray expenses. But they were not sold, as nobody cared to throw good money after bad. Van Sneck got in with the agent under pretence of viewing the house, and he saw the picture there."

"Why didn't he take it with him?" Henson asked, with amused scorn. He was master of himself again and had his nerves well under control.

"Well, that was hardly like Van Sneck. Our friend is nothing if not diplomatic. But when he did manage to get into the house again the picture was gone."

"Excellent!" Henson cried. "How dramatic! There is only one thing required to make the story complete. The picture was taken away by Hatherly Bell. If you don't bring that in as the denouement I shall be utterly disappointed."

"You needn't be." Littimer said, coolly. "That is exactly what did happen."

Henson chuckled again, quite a parody of a chuckle this time. He could detect the quiet suggestion of triumph in Littimer's voice.

"Did Van Sneck tell you all this?" he asked.

"Not the latter part of it," Littimer replied, "seeing that he was in the hospital when it happened. But I know it is true because I saw Bell and David Steel, the novelist, come away from the house, and Bell had the picture under his arm. And that's why Van Sneck's agent couldn't find it the second time he went. Check to you, my friend, at any rate. Bell will go to my father with Rembrandt number two, and compare it with number one. And then the fat will be in the fire."

Henson yawned affectedly. All the same he was terribly disturbed and shaken. All he wanted now was to be alone and to think. So far as he could tell nobody besides Littimer knew anything of the matter. And no starved, cowed, broken-hearted puppy was ever closer under the heel of his master than Littimer. He still held all the cards; he still controlled the fortunes of two ill-starred houses.

"You can leave me now," he said. "I'm tired. I have had a trying day, and I need sleep; and the sooner you are out of the house the better. For your own sake and for the sake of those about you, you need not say one word of this to Enid Henson."

Littimer promised meekly enough. With those eyes blazing upon him he would have promised anything. We shall see presently what a stupendous terror Henson had over the younger man, and in what way all the sweetness and savour of life was being crushed out of him.

He closed the door behind him, and immediately Henson sat up in bed. He reached for his handkerchief and wiped the big beads from his forehead.

"So the danger has come at last," he muttered. "I am face to face with it, and I knew I should be. Hatherly Bell is not the man to quietly lie down under a cloud like that. The man has brains, and patience, and indomitable courage. Now, does he suspect that I have any hand in the business? I must see him when my nerves are stronger and try and get at the truth. If he goes to Lord Littimer with that picture he shakes my power and my position perilously. What a fool I was not to get it away. But, then, I only escaped from the Brighton police in those days by the skin of my teeth. And they had followed me from Huddersfield like those cursed bloodhounds here. I wonder——"

He paused, as the brilliant outline of some cunning scheme occurred to him. A thin, cruel smile crept over his lips. Never had he been in a tight place yet without discovering a loophole of escape almost before he had seen the trap.

A fit of noiseless laughter shook him.

"Splendid," he whispered. "Worthy of Machiavelli himself! Provided always that I can get there first. If I could only see Bell's face afterwards, hear Littimer ordering him off the premises. The only question is, am I up to seeing the thing through?"

CHAPTER XXIV.

Reginald Henson struggled out of bed and into his clothing as best he could. He was terribly weak and shaky, far more weak than he had imagined himself to be, but he was in danger now, and his indomitable will-power pulled him through. What a fool Littimer had been to tell him so much merely so that he might triumph over his powerful foe for a few minutes. But Henson was planning a little scheme by which he intended to repay the young man tenfold. He had no doubt as to the willingness of his tool.

He took a bottle of brandy from a drawer and helped himself to a liberal dose. Walker had expressly forbidden anything of the kind, but it was no time for nice medical obedience. The grateful stimulant had its immediate effect. Then Henson rang the bell, and after a time Williams appeared tardily.

"You are to go down to Barnes and ask him to send a cab here as soon as possible," Henson said. "I have to go to London by the first train in the morning."

Williams nodded, with his mouth wide open. He was astonished and not a little alarmed at the strength and vitality of this man. And only a few hours before Williams had learnt with deep satisfaction that Henson would be confined to his bed for some days.

Henson dressed at length and packed a small portmanteau. But he had to sit on his bed for some little time and sip a further dose of brandy before he could move farther. After all there was no hurry. A full hour was sure to elapse before the leisurely Barnes brought the cab to the lodge-gates.

Henson crept downstairs at length and trod his catlike way to the library. Once there he proceeded to make a minute inspection of the telephone. He turned the handle just the fragment of an inch and a queer smile came over his face. Then he crept as silently upstairs, opened the window of the bathroom quietly, and slipped on to the leads. There were a couple of insulators here, against the wire of one of which Henson tapped his knuckles gently. The wire gave an answering twang. The other jangled limp and loose.

"One of the wires cut," Henson muttered. "I expected as much. Madame Enid is getting a deal too clever. I suppose this is some suggestion of her very astute friend David Steel. Well, I have given Mr. Steel one lesson in minding his own business, and if he interferes further I shall have to give him another. He will be in gaol before long charged with attempted murder and robbery with violence, and so exit Steel. After that the girl will be perhaps chary of seeking outside assistance. And this will be the third I have had to get rid of. Heavens! How feeble I feel, how weak I am. And yet I must go through this thing now."

He staggered into the house again and dropped into a chair. There was a loud buzzing in his ears, so that he could hardly hear the murmur of voices in the drawing-room below. This was annoying, because Henson liked to hear everything that other folks said. Then he dropped off into a kind of dreamy state, coming back presently to the consciousness that he had fainted.

Meanwhile Frank Littimer had joined Enid in the drawing-room. The house was perfectly quiet and still by this time; the dust-cloud hung on the air and caused the lamps to burn with a spitting blue flame. Enid's face looked deadly pale against her black dress.

"So you have been seeing Reginald," she said. "Why—why did you do it?"

"I didn't mean to," Frank muttered. "I never intended him to know that I had been in the house at all. But I was passing his room and he heard me. He seemed to know my footsteps. I believe if two mice ran by him twice in the darkness he could tell the difference between them."

"You had an interesting conversation. What did he want to use the telephone for?"

"I don't know. I tried to manipulate it for him, but the instrument was out of order."

"I know. I had a pretty shrewd idea what our cousin was going to do. You see, I was listening at the door. Not a very ladylike thing to do, but one must fight Henson with his own tools. When I heard him ask for the telephone directory I ran out and nipped one of the wires by the bathroom. Frank, it would have been far wiser if you hadn't come."

Littimer nodded gloomily. There was something like tears in his eyes.

"I know it," he said. "I hate the place and its dreadful associations. But I wanted to see Chris first. Did she say anything about me before—before——"

"My dear boy, she loved you always. She knew and understood, and was sorry. And she never, never forgot the last time that you were in the house."

Frank Littimer glanced across the room with a shudder. His eyes dwelt with fascination on the overturned table with its broken china and glass and wilted flowers in the corner.

"It is not the kind of thing to forget," he said, hoarsely. "I can see my father now——"

"Don't," Enid shuddered, "don't recall it. And your mother has never been the same since. I doubt if she will ever be the same again. From that day to this nothing has ever been touched in the house. And Henson comes here when he can and makes our lives hideous to us."

"I fancy I shook him up to-night," Littimer said, with subdued triumph. "He seemed to shudder when I told him that I had found Van Sneck."

Enid started from her chair. Her eyes were shining with the sudden brilliancy of unveiled stars.

"You have found Van Sneck!" she whispered. "Where?"

"Why, in the Brighton Hospital. Do you mean to say that you don't know about it, that you don't know that the man found so mysteriously in Mr. David Steel's house and Van Sneck are one and the same person?"

Enid resumed her seat again. She was calm enough now.

"It had not occurred to me," she said. "Indeed, I don't know why it should have done. Sooner or later, of course, I should have suggested to Mr. Steel to try and identify the man, but——"

"My dear Enid, what on earth are you talking about?"

"Nonsense," Enid said, in some confusion. "Things you don't understand at present, and things you are not going to understand just yet. I read in the papers that the man was quite a stranger to Mr. Steel. But are you certain that it is Van Sneck?"

"Absolutely certain. I went to the hospital and identified him."

"Then there is no more to be said on that point. But you were foolish to tell Reginald."

"Not a bit of it. Why, Henson has known it all along. You needn't get excited. He is a deep fellow, and nobody knows better than he how to disguise his feelings. All the same, he was just mad to know what I had discovered, you could see it in his face. Reginald Henson——"

Littimer paused, open-mouthed, for Henson, dressed and wrapped ready for the journey, had come quietly into the drawing-room. The deadly pallor of his face, the white bandages about his throat, only served to render his appearance more emphatic and imposing. He stood there with the halo of dust about him, looking like the evil genius of the place.

"I fear I startled you," he said, with a sardonic smile. "And I fear that in the stillness of the place I have overheard a great part of your conversation. Frank, I must congratulate you on your discretion, so far. But seeing that you are young and impressionable, I am going to move temptation out of your way. Enid, I am going on a journey."

"I trust that it is a long one, and that it will detain you for a considerable period," Enid said, coldly.

"It is neither far, nor is it likely to keep me," Henson smiled. "Williams has just come in with the information that the cab awaits me at the gate. Now, then!"

The last words were flung at Littimer with contemptuous command. The hot blood flared into the young man's face. Enid's eyes flashed.

"If my cousin likes to stay here," she said, "why——"

"He is coming with me," Henson said, hoarsely. "Do you understand? With me! And if I like to drag him—or you, my pretty lady—to the end of the world or the gates of perdition, you will have to come. Now, get along before I compel you."

Enid stood with fury in her eyes and clenched hands as Littimer slunk away out of the house, Henson following between his victim and Williams. He

One of Three Things Always Cause
RHEUMATISM

Do you know the system rids itself of waste matter through bowels and kidneys? Yes, but by the skin as well.

As a matter of fact, the skin rids the system of more urea than the kidneys do.

If the skin, or bowels, or kidneys are unhealthy—they won't throw off enough urea. This urea is changed into uric acid—carried by the blood to joints and nerves—causing Rheumatism.

One never inherits Rheumatism. One does inherit weak kidneys, irregular bowels and bad skin action.

Fruit-a-tives
OR "FRUIT LIVER TABLETS"

will positively cure Rheumatism because they increase the eliminating action of skin, kidneys and bowels—and make these three organs so vigorous and healthy that there can be no urea or waste retained in the system to poison the blood and irritate the nerves.

FRUIT-A-TIVES are fruit juices, combined with tonics—the whole forming the most effective cure for Rheumatism.

FARM AND FIRESIDE

Useful Hints Which Will be Appreciated by the Progressive Farmer and His Housekeeper.

AGRICULTURAL.

Yankee Farmer in Cuba.

The present domestic unpleasantness in Cuba comes without surprise to those who have been observant sojourners on that fair isle within the last few years. A very weak point in the task of self-government lies in the acknowledged indifference of the Spanish residents, who are the land-owning class, and especially their lack of confidence in the political and business ability of the Cuban.

A Paradise of Climate.

It is to be hoped that tranquility may soon be restored, for if there is any place on earth that is akin to a paradise in its climatic and geographical conditions, Cuba is certainly that place. It would seem to any one at first thought that in a country where three crops a year could be raised, and with no severe winter to provide against, the cost of living would be very small. But all manufactured goods as well as many kind, of foodstuffs have to be imported, and Americans cannot live as the natives do. For although yellow fever may have been eliminated from that country — tuberculosis has not. I was told that the death rate from the latter disease among natives, particularly in certain localities, was very high.

Americans, accustomed to their evenly heated houses, could not endure the earth floors of the fireless shacks in which the ordinary native makes his home. Such abodes may be picturesque, but one is apt to lose sight of that point when shivering of an evening, and to envy grandfather's fireplace in the old Northern home.

Dairy Drawbacks.

Vegetation is so luxuriant that stock raising there will doubtless prove a great industry as the island develops her natural resources. But I noticed one thing that I should think would be a torturing nuisance. I observed at milking time the cows came up with their udders covered with ticks, or rather, leeches. These hung on, all swelled out with blood sucked from the helpless bossy. The American gentleman with whom I was staying had to make local applications in the effort to keep them off, but without much success. Doubtless such troubles help to make the production of milk expensive. I believe milk in Havana retails at 25 cents per quart.

Bee Keeping.

My interests at the time were especially in the apiarian line. The honey gathered from the bloom of aguinaldo is the best and is very light and agreeable in flavor.

Fowl brood has wrought some havoc among apiaries there, the disease being imported from the States. When it once gets a foothold I think one might as well burn up all contaminated material and start afresh —a costly remedy.

The Spaniards who have produced honey sometimes keep two thousand swarms or more. But their expense for hives is not great, these generally consisting of hollow logs set up on "saw horses." When they wish to remove the honey crop, the combs are cut out from the ends of the log with long knives, after smoking the bees further back toward the other end. The combs of honey are then crushed and the honey strained out and put up in hogheads. The wax is rendered and sold for export also.

This method of beekeeping was responsible for the fact that until recent years no comb honey was produced in Cuba. Americans have introduced modern hives and modern methods, and it is safe to assume that with the improvement in means of transportation to market, which will come with time, honey producing will increase, and it should soon be profitably marketed in the U. S. The soil is such that away from the made roads cartage is impossible much of the year in anything less substantial than the heavy, two-wheeled oxcarts. Some of the extensive Spanish beekeepers have changed their swarms over into modern hives.

I think the style most generally approved for that climate is a single-walled hive having the Langstroth frames.

In Such a Country

one has to become used to strange customs. One thing that caused no little annoyance to us when newly arrived at the Isle of Pines was the omnipresent pig. There being no fences the natives simply brand or mark their swine and give them free range. You may be roused from your slumbers with the thought that a burglar is in the house. You grasp your revolver and light a lamp only to find on investigation that the intruder is a "pig in the parlor." Everything eatable had to be safely barreled or boxed up, and shed doors securely closed to bar his pigship from sharing provisions. It was not to be wondered at if some roast pork may have been served at the tables of sundry exasperated Americans. I was surprised to see these pigs away up on the mountains in places apparently inaccessible to them.

There, as here, arises the labor problem. What few Chinese are there are as always, industrious and frugal. The climate is enervating, and the native usually lacks incentive to labor with the object of providing for the future. Americans generally have to guard their growing produce from the depredations — not of four-footed swine — but of a certain class who find it easier to fill their stomachs from another's garden than to till the soil with their own hands.

RAT PORTAGE, October, 1905

I was troubled for about two years with kidney trouble, so common among railway men. I doctored in the regular way and took a great deal of medicine, but received no benefit. My fireman recommended Gin Pills, and I am pleased to state that after taking the first box I got relief, and while I am not taking them regularly, if I feel any indications of a return of the trouble, a few doses puts me all right again.

AGRICULTURAL ITEMS.

October is a good month in which to repair farm fences and walks.

In trimming trees, trained common sense is the best rule. Always ask yourself why before using shears or saw.

Every hour spent hoeing and weeding the strawberry patch in October and November will be paid for liberally next June.

Pumpkins will increase the milk flow when fed in moderate quantities. Some feeders remove the seeds before giving to the cattle.

To judge the quality of a man's farming, ask no questions, but go out and see what sort of care he takes of his tools and machinery this winter.

Almost every orchardist has a scheme of his own for thinning trees, but it seems to be mostly a matter of theory, and practically, except during the growing season, the best time is always now.

A turkey raiser estimates the total cost of food for each bird at 50 cents, and gets them to weigh an average of fifteen pounds each, making the cost of turkey meat about 31-2 cents a pound.

If you are farming for dollars, beware of getting carried away with a breed of stock because it happens to suit your individual fancy. Study the market and general situation, and select the stock accordingly.

One young farmer who will have nothing to do with ensilage, nevertheless keeps a fodder cutter with a horse power and cuts his dried corn silage length. The cattle eat it without waste, and he thinks the practice pays.

In comparing notes on the apple crop, Farmer A found that he had secured a third more for the same grade of apples than Farmer B. That was where the business end of farming came in. Good selling accounts sometimes for the difference between profit and loss.

As to the fertilizer question, no farmer should get the "fever" and rush into it without knowing just what he is about. It is certainly true that fertilizers pay some farmers, while others have used them without profit. Every farmer should study into the conditions of his soil, market and crops, and make experiments in a reasonable way. One thing is certain, when fertilizer is used it must be applied very liberally. Don't spread it all over the farm. It will pay best on a high-priced crop, and its use should go hand in hand with thorough tillage. Fertilizers pay best when used by the best farmers.

Cider pomace is used to a large extent for cattle food, but opinions differ as to its real value. Some have claimed it equal to sugar beets, while other feeders have declared it not worth hauling from the mill. At the Vermont Station apple pomace, ensilaged, and used supplementary to and in part as a substitute for corn ensilage, was found to be relished by cows, and the results of four tests found it to be about equivalent in feeding value to corn ensilage. No doubt much of the dissatisfaction with pomace has been owing to carelessness. It has been allowed to ferment and freeze and thaw until it is unfit for food. But when packed tightly in the silo, pomace will keep in good condition.

CARE OF BREEDING HOGS.

On the average dairy farm swine are usually kept to a greater or less extent. Where this is the case, the farmer will usually find it cheaper and better to raise his own pigs instead of buying them. Every farmer need not keep a boar, but he should keep one or more brood sows. Having obtained a good animal for the purpose, mate with a male of the best ancestry. Having obtained sows that prove to be prolific and good mothers, it will be better to keep them for several years, raising two litters of pigs a year, rather than make frequent changes.

Where pigs are raised in cold weather there should be good, warm quarters, and with these and proper feed and care there need be little or no trouble. We have just as good success with pigs in winter as in summer, either in growing or fattening.

Proper conditions and care are what are needed. To make the business most successful there should be at least a moderate supply of milk during the winter. The breeding sows should not be very highly fed, only when suckling a brood of pigs but should have a moderate amount of nourishing food, with little or no grain.

Alcohol from Corncobs.

The U. S. Department of Agriculture is developing a new industry in the production of alcohol from corncobs which, the department says, promises to be of much commercial value. Investigations are being made at Hoopeston, Ill., and have proved that the large quantities of corncobs, which every year go to waste can be made to produce alcohol in sufficient quantities to justify the erection of a distilling plant in connection with a corn cannery. So far the department has succeeded by simple methods of fermentation in getting a yield of eleven gallons of alcohol from a ton of green cobs, and, by similar methods, in getting six gallons of alcohol from a ton of the green cornstalks. A department official says that these tests show that there are 240 pounds of fermentable substance in a ton of green field cornstalks, which will yield about half of their weight in absolute alcohol. In round numbers, a ton of stalks will produce one hundred pounds of alcohol or two hundred pounds of proof spirits. As a gallon of alcohol weighs nearly 7 pounds, there should be fifteen gallons of alcohol obtainable from a ton of cobs, and will have its influence in bringing the quantity to a greater figure.

A Bonfire of Free Seeds.

Those who are conducting the anti-free seed campaign, to break down the custom that has grown up in Congress of appropriating large sums yearly to distribute common garden and flower seeds, have received a powerful object lesson from Brooklyn, N. Y. A short time ago a bonfire was made of more than ten thousand packages of the free seeds that had been sent out, but for which no use could be found by the recipient. He was burning them to get them out of his way. Before they were all destroyed a bushel or more of the packages were taken to a seed dealer in New York. He became interested in looking up the history of the varieties represented, as, under the Act of Congress, they were classed as "new, rare and valuable seeds." A searching of seed catalogues developed that one variety of parsnips, two of lettuce, three of turnip, one of tomato, one of onion and two of radish had been catalogued as long ago as 1875. One of lettuce, one of tomato and one of muskmelon came into use in 1884. Five other varieties of lettuce were introduced between 1875 and 1890. The newest variety of seed was an onion first introduced in 1899, while the oldest was traced back thirty years, and its first introduction is lost in antiquity. Not one variety was found that was either "new," "rare," or "valuable." Most of them had long long since been abandoned by dealers to give place for improved varieties. Farmers' organizations in all parts of the country are taking active and decisive steps to express their disapproval of this farce of pretending to favor the agricultural class by distributing common varieties of garden seeds. Farmers would welcome the introduction of new and rare seeds, then they might improve their own productions, but they look upon this attempt of Congress to palm off on them varieties that have been discarded for a score or more years, as new, as an insult to their intelligence.—American Cultivator.

Covered Barnyards Valuable.

From experience gained by practical dairymen who have been in the habit of allowing their cows the freedom of a closed shed or covered barnyard and using the stable only at milking time, it has been found that the cows keep much cleaner than when stabled and that the milking stable is in a more sanitary condition, making it easier to produce clean milk.

By this method there is less difficulty in providing cows with an abundance of fresh air, and they are more vigorous and healthy and have better appetites than when kept in the stable. Since they can move about and get exercise they will not suffer in cold weather if the temperature is somewhat lower than in the ordinary stable. Labor is saved, as the shed can be bedded much more easily and quickly than can stalls; there is little stable cleaning to be done, and the manure is hauled directly from the shed to the field at any time most convenient and when least damage is done the land by tramping. Another advantage is the saving of fertility much more completely. Many barns do not have cement floors, and so there is more or less waste of the liquid portion of the manure. Since land is becoming so high-priced no farmer can afford to allow any fertility to be wasted, and by this method all the liquid is saved, as it is absorbed by the bedding. If only enough bedding is used to keep the cows clean, they tramp the manure so thoroughly that it does not heat nor make the air impure. If manure is hauled directly from the stable to the field there is a considerable portion of the year when it must be allowed to accumulate in the yard, where it will leach badly, or it must be hauled on to the land when it is so wet and soft that much injury is done by tramping; this is especially true on clay soil.

THE HORSE.

No Hoof, No Horse.

Since the value of a horse depends largely, or even entirely, upon his ability to labor, be it light, speedy work or heavy draft work, it is well that we devote a little thought to his organs of locomotion.

Every horseman knows too well the truth there is in the adage: "No hoof, no horse," and this may well include the legs. There are different reasons why we should give attention to and study the feet and legs of our horses. In the first place, the very nature of the use we make of our horses brings their feet and legs into action and a great deal more than nature intended, thus causing a susceptibility to disease and derangement. Putting our heavy horses at draft work, or our light horses at the light work, necessitates an overexertion of the feet and legs as compared with the demands we make on any of our other farm animals, and very naturally may we expect to see them giving out in one way or another as duty demands, or as their feet and legs are weak and deficient, and weakness that may have developed from one cause or another if perpetuated in our breeding operations will, if followed and supplemented by work which still further tends to develop that weakness, soon result in a fixed weakness or defect in our animals. We should bear this in mind, and in the selection of our horses, either for work or breeding purposes, select those of that type, quality and conformation that have by many years and generations of experience given the best results without any detrimental effects to the animals. It is especially important that our breeding stock should be free from blemishes and defects.

MEATY FOODS.

The natural food of poultry—supposing them to exist in a wild state—is insectivorous to a very large extent. Under such a condition of life they would only obtain grain at harvest time, and at other periods of the year would exist upon insects and worms, and upon green food (including such seeds as they might find.)

This is practically how the wild pheasant lives, and we may quite well take the pheasant as representing the fowl in a wild state. A pheasant shut up in an aviary, like a domestic fowl kept in a farmyard, probably gets a great deal more food of the solid cereal type than does its wild prototype; in a state of nature its only solid food is the insect food and the small amount of seed it finds, the rest being vegetable in character, like grass and buds. Yet, as a rule, the wild bird is more healthy and certainly as well proportioned as the domestic, if not so fat and fleshy. This proves the point that the most important part of a wild fowl's food is that of the insect type; and analysis shows that insect food is principally nitrogenous, whereas cereal food is mostly composed of starch. The former goes to build up muscle, bone and sinew, the latter to generate warmth. A pheasant does not, as a rule, glut itself with insect food; it only finds that in small quantity constantly. Yet what it does find suffices for all its bodily needs so far as growth is concerned.

The same applies to the domestic fowl; give it a very limited quantity of food—or, say, none at all if on a farm, and let it work for and find its own living, and what will be the result? Simply that it will be very healthy, probably not at all fat, and certainly only about as productive as a pheasant from the egg point of view. Start and feed it liberally on insect food, however, and it will at once become very productive. If a chicken it will grow, if a hen it will lay.

You cannot produce the same satisfactory result by a purely cereal diet. You must give food which is rich in nitrogen. Among cereals none are so rich as beans, peas and oats. Poultry fed on meals should always have an allowance of the two first named, and of grain none gives so satisfactory a result as the oat. But the proportion of nitrogenous constituents in these is not to be compared with what is to be found in insect food. Therefore it pays to let poultry have a liberal supply of insect food. If they are at liberty on a farm they can generally obtain a fair supply—provided, of course, that they are not over-numerous. If they are numerous, however, the supply must be supplemented. In confinement, too, where they have no chance whatever of obtaining it for themselves it must be provided.

Now, comes the question, how can a supply of insect food be provided where it does not exist, or how can it be supplemented where the existing supply is insufficient? Well, there are two principal foods, which analysis shows and experience proves, are excellent substitutes for insect life. One is bone and the other is fibrine meat. To take the latter first it may be said generally that any dried meat is good for chicken growth or for egg production, provided it is composed of lean meat. As to bone, undoubtedly what is known as "green" bone is the best to give to poultry. This is simply fresh bone granulated by being passed through a bone crushing mill, and it contains nitrogen, phosphorus, and other chemical constituents necessary for bodily growth as well as for egg production. Apart from this its "meatiness" makes it relished by poultry even in the raw state, and they will scramble greedily for a handful when thrown to them. Bone or fibrine meat should be added to all meals in the proportion of ten per cent. to twenty per cent., according to circumstances. More is required by chickens than by laying hens. Its use should be regular and systematic if the results are to be satisfactory.

HINTS TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

Tea and coffee and some fruit stains can be removed from linen by rubbing them with butter. Rub thoroughly into the linen, then soak in hot water.

The nervous housewife who lives in constant dread of fire, may, with very little trouble, make an extinguisher that will put out a blaze if used at once. All she needs to do is to put three pounds of salt in a gallon of water, and to this add one and a half pounds of salammoniac. This liquid should be bottled, and when the fire is discovered it should be poured on it.

For mending broken crockery, a little plaster of paris and gum arabic dissolved in hot water will be found an excellent glue. It should be kept at hand in case of accident. All fine china should, however, be washed by the mistress of the household. She must not expect such ware to be preserved if its care is left in the hands of a maid.

To polish cut glass, wash it well with soapsuds, rinse and then, after drying it with a cloth, polish it with sawdust and a washleather. The glass will be brilliant after this treatment.

To restore faded upholstery, beat the dust out good, then brush. Apply strong lather of castile soap with hard brush, wash off with clear water. Then wash with alum water. When dry the colors will look as well as ever. When colors are faded beyond recovery they may be touched up with a pencil dipped in water colors of suitable shade mixed with gum water.

For tender eyes make an infusion of one handful of cornflowers in a pint of hot water. Let it stand one hour. Strain and use either tepid or cold.

The complexion brush used every night with warm water and castile soap will keep the complexion free from blackheads. Twice a week apply a saturate solution of sulphate of magnesia. Be careful of the diet, eating plenty of fresh fruit and drinking three pints of water a day.

Canned goods should not only be emptied into a glass or earthen dish as soon as opened, but should be allowed to stand for one or two hours to draw back the oxygen that the heat has eliminated.

If your wax has given out and the starch sticks to the irons try kerosene. Put a little of the oil on a cloth and rub the hot iron over it a few times. This will keep the starch from sticking and removes any dirt that may have collected on the bottom or side of the irons, which often soils the garment. It will also give a gloss to the clothes. As so little oil is used, there is no danger.

In a boarding house this summer all the floors were wiped up with cloths wet with kerosene, and then wrung out as dry as possible. They take up the dust and prevent it again from being shaken into the room. It is also well to keep another soft cloth prepared in the same manner for dusting off the furniture and woodwork if it is dark.

Stomach Troubles and Constipation

No one can reasonably hope for good digestion when the bowels are constipated. Mr. Chas. Why not get a package of these tablets and get well and stay well? Price 25 cents. Samples free. To be had at R. Templeton & Co., drug store.

FOUR MAGAZINES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

CO-OPERATION IN ADVERTISING MAKES IT POSSIBLE.

Half price offers are but combinations of advertising. In a word, four magazines band together, use the same publicity and share the expenses. Four magazines working together reduce the cost of publicity about one-fourth of what it would be if taken up alone. The receipts are approximately the same as if the publicity were carried on independently. And who receives the benefits from this publicity club? The patron of the magazines, inasmuch as he secures a reduction in the subscription price made possible by economy. And thus the home can now secure three, four and five periodicals, which present-day needs require, for little more than the old-time price of a single magazine, that once was the solitary visitor to the family circle.

For instance, Combination No. 2, advertised by the Central Magazine Agency in our columns, offers The Cosmopolitan Magazine, $1.00; The Harper's Bazar, $1.00; The Home Magazine, $1.00, and The Reader Magazine, $3.00—total value, $6.00—all four for $3.00, one-half price, a saving of fifty per cent.

Another good offer is The Delineator, McClure's Magazine, The World's Work and The Home Magazine. These four may be had for just $3.50.

One of the best bargains ever offered is The Cosmopolitan Magazine, The World To-day and The Home Magazine, all three for one year for just $2.00.

For $2.00 you can secure a year's subscription to The Cosmopolitan The World To-day and The Home Magazine.

For $2.50 you can have The Cosmopolitan, $1.00; Home Magazine, $1.00; The Reader Magazine, $3.00, at one-half price, $2.50. All three for less than the price of one.

The best bargain of the year, however, is The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, Harper's Bazar and The Reader Magazine, total value, $6.00—all for half price, $3.00. This is positively the best bargain of the year.

Before subscribing to any magazines our readers should write the Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind., for prices. Further than this if you have spare time and want to earn Christmas money, the Central Magazine Agency will pay you a liberal commission on these great magazine combinations. You will be surprised to find how easy it is to make from $10.00 to $100.00 a week in securing orders from your neighbors. You can save them from 40 to 50 per cent. on their year's magazines and make a handsome commission for yourself.

To any newsdealer, druggist or agent who will act as our agent we will run their name and address at the bottom of our large display advertising. Our commission to agents or newsdealers is 35 cents an order.

Write to-day for our special offer or send your order for any of the combinations mentioned above. Remember, The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, The Reader Magazine and Harper's Bazar—all four for $3.00—total value, $6.00. You save 50 per cent. Some Symptoms of Eye-Strain.

A great percentage of eye-strain is due to affection of the extrinsic muscles. Muscular Asthenopia (painful vision from muscular troubles) is accompanied by some of the following: Redness of eye ball, dry, hot feeling, or tears, intolerance of light, shooting pains through the eyes and inflammations more or less deep, etc. According to the power of resistance will be the time that will expire before head symptoms, and bodily reflexes will manifest themselves. By and by the symptoms will be grouped by the nerve specialist, and diagnosed as nervous prostration, phychosis, migraine, brain fag, hysteria, threatened insanity, epilepsy, etc., and prescribe some waters, vacations, change of climate, etc., or any way that will get them off from using their eyes. As insomnia, nervousness, muscle twitching, loss of memory, sudden blackness coming before the vision, dizziness, temporary blindness, sick headache, pains in heart, stomach, bowels, etc. All of these symptoms are often relieved by treatment of the eyes alone. With all the efforts of the opthalmologist (eye specialist) the truth of this fact has not yet penetrated the minds of the general practitioners as it ought. The above is condensed from an address before the Iowa Optical Association, by E. H. Hazen, M.D., a medical practitioner and eye specialist of 40 years' standing. We not only give glasses to relieve and avert the above troubles, but we give exercises to strengthen these muscles.

The Sewerage Question Again Bobs Up Serenely

COUNCIL LAST NIGHT APPOINTED A COMMITTEE TO LOOK INTO THE MATTER — BY-LAW MAY BE SUBMITTED NEXT JANUARY — INDUSTRIAL CONCERN WANTS A LOAN — OTHER MATTERS

At the Council meeting last evening, in the absence of City Clerk Mikel, Mr. H. P. Thomas acted in that capacity. The business transacted was principally of a routine nature Ald. Cooper, Gordon, Knox and Paterson were absent.

COMMUNICATIONS.

From Mr. J. F. Orr, stating that his wifem some time ago, fell on the sidewalk on the south side of Moira street owing, it is alleged, to the walk being defective. She sustained injuries of a rather serious nature and his expenses in connection with the same had been $171.00. He asked the Council to reimburse him.—Laid on table.

From the Carriage Mounting Company, of Toronto, intimating that they might remove to some other place and would like a loan of $10,000 to assist in erecting buildings, etc. The communication intimated that they had been in business some 17 years and were employing 40 to 50 hands.—Laid on table.

The reports of the various committees, as already published, were read.

Ald Sinclair was chairman in COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Before the work of the Committee was taken up Mr. H. Smith was heard in reference to having the water main extended on Church street, below Wharf street. He stated that a number desired to take water if the extension was made.

The Mayor said that he had been spoken to in reference to the matter and something should be done. The expense would be great, but as the Gas department was considering the building of a drain down that street the laying of a water main might be done at the same time.

Ald Panter was in favor of the Mayor's suggestion, and he moved that the matter be referred to the Gas and Water committees, to discuss the same and ascertain if it was not possible to do both at the same time.

Ald Vermilyea stated that the Surveyor had made an estimate of the work and the cost would be upwards of $700. He would be pleased to have the two committees work together in this matter.

The motion of Ald. Panter was unanimously adopted.

The accounts recommended for payment by the various civic committees were passed without discussion.

The recommendation from the Gas Committee that the tender of the Standard Gas Holders and Construction Company, Limited, be accepted for the erection of a gas holder, and that the City Solicitor be instructed, to prepare the necessary contract and By-law for the same, was unanimously adopted.

The communication of Mr. J. F Orr was discussed.

Ald. Marsh said that, whilst the Council sympathized with Mr. and Mrs. Orr, the Council would, in his opinion, be establishing a bad precedent if it paid anything. Mr. Orr's remedy, he thought, was with the Accident Insurance Company with whom the city was insured.

The Mayor stated that the matter was brought to the notice of the Accident Company, but not until after the time for entering a claim was past.

On motion the communication was filed and the Clerk instructed to acknowledge it and explain the position the Council took.

Ald. Panter suggested that the communication from the Carriage Mounting Company be referred to the Industrial Committee.

A motion to that effect prevailed.

On motion the report of the Assessor, as already published, was received and filed.

The following accounts were ordered to be paid:

W. Stewart	$ 1.50
A. Wheeler	1.50
Mabel McIninch	5.00
D. Hill	27.00
H. Janeway	6.75

ENQUIRIES.

Ald Marsh asked if it would be absolutely necessary to submit another by-law to the ratepayers in reference to the Zwick's Island filtering project.

The Mayor—"My understanding is that such is the case."

Ald Sinclair wished to know if a By-law would be submitted in reference to building at least three trunk sewers, namely, on Coleman, Front and Dundas streets.

The Mayor said this would be a move in the right direction.

Ald. Panter asked if any steps had been taken in reference to having an investigation re the condition of the two fire engines.

Mayor Sulman said reports were in the hands of the chairman, Ald. Cooper

MOTIONS.

Moved by Ald. Panter, seconded by Ald. Vermilyea, that Mr. W. J. Campbell be allowed to tap the drain on West Bridge street for the purpose of draining his cellar, he to assume all responsibility.—Carried.

Moved by Ald. Vermilyea, seconded by Ald Sinclair, That at the request of the County of Hastings the City lay and construct a four-inch water pipe on Dundas street from the present water pipe to the eastern limits of the city and from that point on the Kingston road to a point selected by the County at or near the House of Refuge, including a hydrant for fire protection, and also for domestic purposes; the County to pay the expense of same from the eastern limits of the city, and the County to pay $65 per annum for the fire protection and the usual meter rates for the other water service. The city to have the privilege of tapping the pipe on the road to furnish water services to any party or parties on such terms as the city may prescribe, but the County not to permit any of the pipes to be tapped for services for any other party or parties; the County to keep the said pipe, hydrant and all other pipes, taps and connections in proper repair, the same to be open to inspection of any person appointed by the city; the Solicitor to prepare an agreement to be signed by the city and county, and the county to procure the consent of the Township of Thurlow to the agreement.—Carried.

Ald. Green took exception to a part of the motion referring to tapping the pipe and giving water to those who reside outside of the city limits.

Ald. Marsh said that the city limits might in a few years be extended, and he could see no harm in allowing the motion to pass as it was worded.

Ald. Marsh moved, seconded by Ald Sinclair, that a special committee consisting of the Mayor, Ald. Panter, Sinclair and the mover be appointed to consider the matter of selecting certain streets for the building of trunk sewers, with a view to having the necessary By-law submitted at the next municipal election. —Carried Council adjourned.

D. and D. Institution's New Superintendent

The Peterboro Review, in noticing that Dr. Coughlin, of that city, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Mathison, gives the following sketch of the new Superintendent:

Dr. Charles Bernard Coughlin was born in Asphodel township on April 5th, 1862. He is a son of the late Richard Coughlin, who was a native of Cork, Ireland, and came to Canada in 1829, settling in Asphodel. Dr. Coughlin was educated at the Norwood High School and the Peterboro Collegiate Institute. He taught school in the county for four or five years and then entered Trinity Medical College, Toronto, where he was graduated as M.D in 1890. He was president of his class during the final year. After leaving Trinity he took post graduate courses in New York and Chicago and in 1892 began the practice of his profession in Arthur, County of Wellington. He took an active part in municipal politics and was reeve of the village for two years. In 1898 he was the Conservative candidate for the Legislature in East Wellington, in a three cornered contest, John Craig being the Liberal standard bearer and James Parks the candidate of the Patrons. Mr. Craig, who was elected, died soon after, and Hon. J. M. Gibson, Attorney-General, who had been defeated in Hamilton, received the Liberal nomination in East Wellington. Dr. Coughlin was the candidate for the Conservative party in this bye-election and succeeded in pulling down a normal Liberal majority of 750 to about 500. In 1900 he was offered the Conservative nomination in North Wellington for the Federal House, against Hon. James McMullen. He declined the honor, but consented to take charge of the organization for Mr. Edward Tolton, who wrested the riding from the Liberals, displacing Mr. McMullen, who had held the seat for nearly a quarter of a century. In 1902 Dr. Coughlin removed to Peterboro, where he has since practiced his profession with signal success. He has enjoyed a large practice.

Dr. Coughlin is an effective platform speaker and has always been a consistent, zealous Conservative. He has spoken in several ridings on behalf of the Conservative cause and rendered his party heroic and unselfish service. He is a man of genial disposition, good judgment and strict integrity. He has always taken a deep interest in educational problems and in public affairs. His removal will be a distinct loss to Peterboro and Belleville can be congratulated on securing a citizen who is in every way worthy of confidence trust and respect. The government is also to be congratulated on securing an excellent administrator for the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb — a man who will fill the position worthily and well and who, in his departure from Peterboro will carry with him the very best wishes of all classes of citizens irrespective of creed or party, for his future success, prosperity and usefulness.

Body Not Yet Found.

No trace of the body of Mr. John Shannon, who was drowned at Three Rivers, Quebec, on Thursday last, has been found. His brother, Leo, returned home this morning from the scene of the accident, where he went on Friday last. The body has evidently been carried down stream for some distance, as there is a strong eddy where the accident took place.

Mr. W. D. Chisholm Joins the Majority.

DEATH OF POPULAR AND BRIGHT YOUNG CITIZEN OCCURRED LAST NIGHT.

Our citizens generally were shocked this morning when it was learned that Mr. William D. Chisholm had, during the night, passed away. Only a few days ago he was about the city, apparently in the best of health. On Thursday evening last he was taken ill and typhoid fever developed, which caused his demise. The late Mr. Chisholm, although comparatively a young man, was well known in this city and vicinity. He was the only surviving son of Mr. James P. Chisholm, who resides on the eastern boundary of the city. Deceased was born in the Township of Thurlow 36 years ago, but nearly all his life was spent in this city, where he was educated. For some years he was private secretary to the late Mr. John Bell, K.C., senior counsel for the G.T.R., and about five years ago married the latter's youngest daughter, Miss Norah Bell. Since Mr. Bell's death Mr. Chisholm had been connected with what is known as the Land Department of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which position took him out of the city much of the time. He was an official who was much valued by the company. In social life the deceased was popular and was prominent in Masonic circles, being a member of the Belleville Lodge, and also a Knight Templar. Mr. Chisholm was a member of St. Andrew's Church. The widow, but no family, survives. The sincere sympathy of many will be extended to the widow and relatives in their hour of affliction.

Some Railway Talk From Port Hope Way

Port Hope, Oct. 22.—Mr. E. Donald, representing the Grand Trunk Railway, spent most of last week here, closing options on property secured in the central and eastern portions of the town, through which the new spur line for the Midland division will run from Midland to Montreal. A new freight shed will be erected on John street, for which the company has purchased ground, and a new passenger station and refreshment room will be erected east of the viaduct.

All the towns along the lake shore between Toronto and Montreal which have been feeders to the G.T.R are on the verge of having the C. P. R. connect with them, which will give the citizens the benefit of their long desire for railway competition. C.P.R. and C.N.R surveyors are working north of the town on a proposed line between Ottawa and Toronto, while Mr. D. Hillman, of the C.P.R., with a large staff, has gone into camp for a few weeks at the old agricultural grounds, making this point the base for the district between Newtonville and Cobourg in the survey of what is destined to be the main line of the C.P.R. from Toronto to Montreal. From Cobourg west the C.P.R. will run sufficiently north of the G.T.R. to establish more direct connections with Port Hope, Newtonville Newcastle, Bowmanville, Oshawa and Whitby, entering Toronto via Leaside Junction.

The intense itching characteristic of salt rheum and eczema is instantly allayed by applying Chamberlain's Salve. As a cure for skin diseases this salve is unequal'ed. To be had at R. Templeton & Co's drug store.

The wounded are foreigners.

WIND LIFTS BIG TRAIN

30 Freight Cars and Two Passenger Coaches Blown From Track.

Railway Service in United States West Utterly Demoralized by Terrific Wind and Snow Storm — Lines Blocked With Debris — 2,000 Trees Uprooted in Salt Lake City—Colorado and Kansas Feel Blizzard.

Salt Lake City, Utah, Oct. 23.—Railway service between here and Ogden, is utterly disorganized. The terrific wind Saturday night and Sunday morning carried down all the telegraph wires, making the despatching of trains in regular order impossible.

The Denver and Rio Grande system is moving few trains. The Oregon Short Line is blocked by a wreck near Woods Cross, where 30 freight cars were blown from the tracks. Two passenger coaches on the Salt Lake and Ogden Railroad were blown from the track near Centreville and the conductor and two passengers were bruised.

The Salt Lake and Ogden Line is blocked by many trees blown across the track. In Salt Lake City 2,000 trees were uprooted and several frail buildings in course of construction were wrecked.

Snow Stops Railway Traffic.

Kansas City, Kas., Oct. 23.—A blizzard prevailed yesterday in Western Kansas, the most severe for this time of season in many years. In some places snow, driven by a wind, is piling up in the cuts, stopping railway traffic and playing havoc with telephone and telegraph wires.

Snow Inconveniences Navigators.

Port Arthur, Oct. 23.—Snow fell here all day yesterday, at times quite heavily. Much of it has melted and not more than an inch or so now covers the ground. The falling snow caused inconvenience to the vessels in the bay and a constant tooting of whistles was kept up to indicate the position of ships.

Heavy Fruit and Stock Losses.

Denver, Colorado, Oct. 23.—Snow, wind and cold extended over nearly the entire country between the Rocky Mountains and the Missouri River yesterday, causing heavy losses of live stock and of late fruit. Telegraph wires were prostrated and railroad schedules disarranged.

The storm is almost unprecedented for severity at this season of the year and takes rank, according to the weather bureau, with the snow fall on April 22 and 23, 1885.

Up to six o'clock last evening about 20 inches of snow had fallen in Denver. Much of this snow melted soon. While the temperature on the plains has fluctuated from 20 to 30 above zero, it has been much colder at higher altitudes. At Corona, the highest point on the new Maffat Railroad, two degrees below zero early yesterday was reported.

Drifts Nine Feet Deep.

At Emery Gap, on the Colorado Southern Railroad, snow drifted nine feet deep and traffic was tied up yesterday. Two rotary snow ploughs were sent out to open the road.

A Santa Fe train was detrained between Wagon Mound and Spring, N.M., Sunday night and the road was blocked for several hours. Snow caused the mail coach and two baggage cars to jump the track, and they rolled down an embankment. Only one man, the mail clerk, was hurt, and his injuries are not severe.

Saw 79 Drown.

Mobile, Ala., Oct. 23.—The Mallory Line steamer Colorado, which arrived yesterday, had as passengers Joseph Melson, Charles Oslon, Charles Anderson and Otto Brink, who were picked up at sea on Saturday morning 90 miles off Key West. Melson says he saw 79 men drowned from a househ at which was wrecked off Long Key, Ala., in last week's storm.

HURRICANE IN HONDURAS.

British Schooner Southern Queen Driven Ashore Goes to Pieces.

Mobile, Ala., Oct. 23.—The first news of a terrible hurricane that visited the towns of Ruatan, Tela, Utilla, Colorado and El Provence, Honduras, on Oct. 12, was brought here Sunday night by the Norwegian fruit steamer Harold.

A number of vessels were wrecked, several destroyed and buildings in each of the towns mentioned badly damaged. The loss to the owners of the fruit plantations will, it is stated, reach almost a million dollars. The British schooner Southern Queen was thrown on the beach at Ruatan and went to pieces in less than an hour, and the Harold suffered somewhat and will have to be docked.

A tidal wave accompanied the hurricane and swept everything before it. Capt. Henrychsen reports that when he left, the beaches were strewn with vessels of all kinds, including three large sailing vessels. No lives were reported lost.

WORTH EXPERIMENT.

R. L. Borden Says In Transportation Speech That Government Operation of Railways Is Desirable.

Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., Oct. 23.—Before the largest gathering ever assembled under one roof in the Soo, R. L. Borden, leader of the Conservative Opposition at Ottawa, delivered an address last evening.

For Government Operation.

The feature of his speech was his declaration of the belief that the Government operation of railways is worth the experiment.

He assailed the Government on its policy with regard to the construction of the new Grand Trunk Pacific, and held that in view of the country guaranteeing nine-tenths of the cost it might as well have taken over the remainder and secured the railroad for the people.

Transportation was the principal theme of the address, and severe criticisms were offered with regard to the management of the Intercolonial. He advocated the extension of that line to the Georgian Bay, so that it could compete with other lines for the western trade, under which conditions he believed deficits would no longer follow.

Political Purity Is Not of Liberals.

He also referred to the question of political purity, and gave the details of a number of the scandals of the Liberal administration.

Mr. Borden arrived in the Soo last evening, and all day to-day was entertained by a committee of the Conservative Association. In the forenoon he was taken about the river for a trip on the steamer Algoma. He viewed the steel works and lunched with a number of political friends at the International.

Parade of Soo Cadets.

In the afternoon he took part in the function of opening the new Campbell public school. Previous to the opening of the school, a parade was held of Soo Cadets, who formed a guard of honor for the visitor, and the Algonquin Rifles Band.

Last night's meeting was held in the skating rink. Other speakers were W. H. Hearst, A. C. Boyce, M.P.; W. R. Smyth, M.P.P. W. J. Thompson was chairman, and an address from the Young Liberal-Conservative Club was read by C. V. Plummer.

BAPTIST CHURCH DAY.

Peterboro Convention Appoints a Committee On Church Union.

Peterboro, Oct. 23.—Yesterday was church day at the Baptist convention. The first resolution expressed horror at the Congo atrocities and recorded the emphatic protest of the convention at the system of forced labor, which prevails in the Congo Free State, and asking the influence of the Government to put down this injustice.

The nominating committee suggested the following as a committee on church union: Dr. Farmer, Superintendent Norton, Dr. T. S. Johnstone, Dr. S. S. Bates, Prof. J. L. Gilmour, Dr. J. A. Gordon, Rev. J. G. Brown, B.D.; Dr. Perry, Rev. W. J. McKay, B.D.; Dr. A. A. Cameron, Bros. J. G. Scott, K.C., R. D. Warren, D. E. Thompson, K. C., and Rev. Wm. Walker, B.A. They were all appointed.

PILES

SUFFERED FOR 23 YEARS—TRIED EVERYTHING WITHOUT AVAIL "PYRAMIDS" DOING THE WORK.

A TRIAL PACKAGE MAILED FREE TO ALL.

The rectum, like the mouth, is lined with that soft, satiny material known as mucous membrane. Piles is a disease of that membrane and the blood vessels that lie under it. Fissure and fistula affect the same membrane and belong to the same family. Pyramid Pile Cure slipped into the bowel, melt and spread themselves over the diseased and painful surface and act just as a salve would if the trouble was on the outside of the body and could be easily seen and gotten at.

The immediate relief they give even in the most agonizing cases will startle you, as it has already startled many thousands of "Doubting Thomases" before you, who have tried everything and sent for the sample package, firmly convinced that they would again be disappointed.

But they weren't. Pyramid Pile Cure don't disappoint. They cure. They are for sale at all druggists' at 50 cents a box and are worth an even hundred to the person who needs them.

"This is to certify that I have used three 50c boxes of Pyramid Pile Cure and it has benefitted me more than any other pile remedy I have ever used. I used the sample which you sent me, together with the three 50c boxes, and I am so much better, but not entirely cured, as my case is one of twenty-three years' standing. I did not expect to be cured all at once. I had almost lost all hope of ever getting any remedy that would help me until I tried Pyramid Pile Cure. I believe they will entirely cure me if I continue their use, which I intend doing so long as I can get the money to pay for them. I do not think any one ever suffered very much more than I have at times. Then I would be so nervous I could not get any ease in any position I could place myself.

I cannot express my gratitude for the good your medicine has done me. I will continue to tell my friends of your merit. Yours, Emma Bodenhamer, Bedford, Ind."

Or if you want to prove this matter at our expense, before purchasing, send your name and address to the Pyramid Drug Co., 56 Pyramid Building, Marshall, Michigan, and receive a trial package free by return mail.

'TIS OATH AGAINST OATH

Thomas Lewis Goes For Trial on the Perjury Charge.

Magistrate Kingsford Considers That There Is Sufficient Evidence to Commit—Prisoner Is to Be Released on $10,000 Bail—Another Grist of London Bribes—More Witnesses Tell of Receiving From $8 to $10 for Voting.

Toronto, Oct. 23.—Thomas Lewis appeared before Magistrate Kingsford yesterday on the perjury charge.

T. C. Robinette, for the defence, got permission to ask for particulars, but waived the right, pleaded not guilty and asked for a jury trial. He did, however, register formal objection to the jurisdiction of the magistrate to try the case.

Crown Attorney Corley asked to have the information amended so as to have the evidence of Oct. 4 added.

The portions of the evidence given in the investigation, upon which the charge of perjury was laid, were then submitted.

The first was the evidence of Alfred J. Clark, and Mr. Robinette objected that perjury could not be proven in that case, as Clark and Lewis were alone at that time, and it was simply a case of oath against oath.

Only Oath Against Oath.

Said Magistrate Kingsford: "Your argument is that it would be only a case of oath against oath?" and in this Mr. Robinette concurred.

"Well, you can only make the objection in law now and a ruling can be given after the evidence is heard," was the reply.

Mr. Armour then proceeded to read portions of Lewis' evidence to show that he had made contradictory statements regarding the day he went to Detroit.

Mr. Robinette pointed out that the witness had afterwards corrected this evidence and the magistrate held that no perjury could be proven if the witness corrected his statements and told the correct version.

Committed For Trial.

After the reading of Lewis' contradictory evidence, and his explanation that he was ill and his memory poor when testifying, the magistrate expressed the opinion that there was already sufficient evidence to commit for trial.

Before the proceedings opened yesterday afternoon, Mr. DuVernet told Magistrate Denison that, by an arrangement with the Attorney-General, the prisoner, Thomas Lewis, would be freed on his own bond of $5,000 and two additional bonds of $2,500 each. One of the bondsmen is R. M. Tooth, the London barrister, and John Lewis, a brother of the prisoner, will arrive this morning to furnish the other $2,500 bail.

Arrested the Wrong Man.

Two "material witnesses," whose presence had been so much desired in connection with the London bribery cases that they had been arrested, the one in London and the other in Ottawa, were in court yesterday. Neither proved very satisfactory to the crown, in fact, as regards John O'Meara, it transpired that he wasn't the man who was wanted, and an apology was tendered for the inconvenience and indignity of having been in custody for two days. Also $5 was given him to pay his expenses home.

A letter of apology and a certificate of innocence will be given Mr. O'Meara, who will also find out if he has any other legal compensation due him.

Corry Left $300 For Expenses.

Contractor Corry admitted having left $300 with George Reid as expenses toward London election, but stoutly denied that it had been given under pressure. 'Twas just a custom contrators with Government jobs had during elections, he said.

Three other Ottawa "workers" in the election testified, but without much result.

More Bribed Voters.

The following London voters examined in the bribery case yesterday morning swore to having received the amount set opposite their names in the Hyman-Gray bye-election:

John Clarke	$ 9.50
Edward Tolhurst	10.00
Frank Pickles	9.50
Henry Clarke	5.00
Wm. Clarke	9.50
John D. Valker	10.00
Wm. Flannery	10.00
Wm. Jarvis	9.50
John Riley	10.00
David Armstrong	5.00
James Thompson	9.50
Jusiin Jeffreys	10.00

Edward J. Bowles, an elderly man, told of having been bribed in an election in East Middlesex by Collins, who paid him $5. The court adjourned at 5.45 p. m.

Negro Riot In Philadelphia.

Philadelphia, Oct. 24.—Rioting by thousands of negroes was caused Monday night by a production of the Rev. Thomas Dixon's play, "The Landsman." Before it was ended panic reigned inside the Walnut street theatre, where the play was on, car service to the central part of the city was stopped, windows were broken and a score or more of blacks were badly beaten up. Several went to hospitals, and a number were arrested. By 8 o'clock 3,000 negroes filled the streets and two squads of reserve police from the City Hall had all they could do to protect the theatre-goers. It is probable that the press agent will be arrested for inciting a riot.

To Apply For A Receiver.

Another Sensation Sprung In Banking Circles.

Writ Issued By Several Shareholders to Have Farmers' Bank of Canada, Which Has Not Commenced to Do Business, Placed in the Hands of a Receiver—Misrepresentation and Fraud Are Alleged.

Toronto, Oct. 24.—Before the Farmers' Bank of Canada has actually started to do business a writ has been issued against it at Osgoode Hall, and the court has been asked to appoint a receiver.

Fraud and misrepresentation on the part of the agents of the bank is alleged, and the prospectus is also called in question.

The bank has now $175,000 of its $1,000,000 capital stock subscribed, but before it can get its charter or begin business it must have a quarter of a million subscribed.

Plaintiffs and Defendants.

John Sproatt, George Castle, W. A. Dixon, Wm. McLean, Finlay McCallum, Robt. Hume, James Murray, Geo. Denoom, John McLeod, James Shuert, and Wm. Harris sue on behalf of themselves and all other persons alleged to be subscribers for shares of the capital stock of the Farmers' Bank of Canada. The defendants are the Farmers' Bank, Jos. Gallagher, John Watson, John Ferguson, Alex. Fraser, Alex. S. Lown, W. R. Travers, C. H. Smith, A. G. H. Luxton, W J Lindsay.

The plaintiffs dispute the validity of alleged contracts to take shares in the capital stock of the bank. They claim they were induced to subscribe for shares through fraud and misrepresentation. They ask that these contracts be declared void, and demand an accounting of all promissory notes received on behalf of the provisional directors of the bank.

The Bank's Side.

Mr. W. R. Travers, the general manager, made the following statement yesterday:

"The Farmers' Bank of Canada today, through their general manager, W. R. Travers, deposited with the Bank of Montreal $250,000 for the credit of the Receiver-General, in accordance with section 13 of the Bank Act. And notice has been given in The Canada Gazette of a meeting of the shareholders for Nov. 26, 1906."

ONTARIO BANK STATEMENT.

Figures Differ Between August and September to Large Extent.

Ottawa, Oct. 24.—The curator of the Ontario Bank, W. E. Stavert, makes a return in the bank statement issued by the Department of Finance yesterday. This return, the curator says, is subject to correction.

Some of the most important changes from the August statement of the bank, which was the last one filed before the bank failed, is that one in regard to current loans and total assets and liabilities. The assets were given in August as $17,371,862. In the September return they are quoted as $15,920,207. The total liabilities in August were placed at $14,991,479, and in September at $15,272,271. These figures would apparently give a showing of $1,718,228 worse than the previous month. The current loans in Canada in August were $13,725,227. In the curator's statement they are $12,287,691. There is only $6,000 in the call loans, that of September statement being the highest.

The capital in both instances is the same, being $1,500,000, and the reserve $700,000. The note circulation has risen in September to about $100,000. Deposits payable on demand were $2,918,922 in August and $2,965,028 in September. Deposits payable after notice were $9,861,242 in August and $9,859,261 in September. The assets included in August $149,276 in Canadian municipal and British and foreign public securities, $1,087,568 in railway and other bonds, debentures and stock, and $50,000 in Government securities. The September statement shows respectively $242,317, $917,505, and $50,000.

Detroit Divorces For Canadians.

Detroit, Mich., Oct. 24.—Of ten divorce cases heard Monday by Judge Rohnert, three decrees were given to Canadian women, who had lived here little more than the statutory two years.

A divorce was refused a woman, who was married in Lambeth, Ont., and lived in Ingersoll, because she had accepted $700 from her husband, and signed an agreement not to bother him further.

Henry Rockett secured a divorce because his wife refuses to leave her Canadian home to live with him. They formerly lived in Manitoba.

Socialists Condemned to Death.

Suspends Their Certificates.

Ottawa, Oct. 24.—Capt. Spain finds the captain and mate of the steamer Maude responsible for the wreck of the latter in the Ottawa River, when three lives were lost. Their certificates are suspended for a year.

Immigrant, Pauper, Thief.

Montreal, Oct. 24.—George Williams, an English immigrant of three months' standing, was scored by Judge Scott yesterday when sentencing him on a charge of theft. "A pauper you come here, a thief you are here, but unfortunately I can't send you back. You English criminal, you are a charge on the Canadian public. Three months in jail."

Charge Withdrawn.

St. Thomas, Oct. 24.—The infanticide case, in which Mrs. Louise Smith was charged with murdering her daughter's illegitimate child, has been disposed of by the murder charge being withdrawn and a plea of guilty of concealment of birth being entered and accepted. Sentence was deferred.

The Inheritance Tax.

The inheritance tax of Ontario will this year amount to a round million at least. A proviso in the Act devotes this part of the public revenue to charitable purposes. Were it not so, the threat made so long ago as Mowat's time to pare down or extinguish the Government grants to hospitals and charities would have been carried out, or if they were continued some other form of direct taxation would have to be devised to provide the funds.

It is suggested in some quarters that the Act be amended by striking out the proviso, thus making the inheritance tax a part of the revenue for all purposes.

The reason set forth is that rich persons are deterred from giving in their life time what they would give if this levy were not to be made after their death .

But does the proviso act as a deterrent ? asks the London Free Press. At no previous time were the wealthy more liberal in donations to all kinds of public objects than they are to-day.

As to public charities, there might seem to be less claim to Government munificence than formerly by reason of the abounding prosperity, which public expenditures have largely aided in bringing about. But the previous administration in Ontario, from Mowat to Ross, insisted so strenuously that the inheritance tax was necessary to continue the grants for charitable purposes, that by common consent the Act was allowed to stand without further opposition.

The Act, however, remains as an anomaly in a community which cannot boast of many great fortunes, and of very few fortunes indeed which were not won by great and incessant labor through two or three generations. These estates bore their proportional share of the public burdens as times progressed, and the work was done by those who came to inherit as well as by the person in whose name the estate stood. The tax is therefore upon the living as well as upon the dead, who has no more use for what it represents.

The justification for the tax in England does not altogether hold good in the province of Ontario. These large estates were taken by Government and given over in entail with feudal responsibilities such as those for the country's defence in time of danger. These obligations were abolished but the estates remained in possession. A tax in substitution of military duty was therefore not unreasonable.

No such plea holds in this province, which never had a feudal lordship, but where every man had to get what he could by hard scrabble from the earliest times.

Penitentiary Twine.

The Kingston News of Wednesday last prints a racy account of certain doings in the penitentiary, which, as it gives name and date, chapter and verse, has all the semblance of truth and certainly calls for further enquiry.

It is stated that 80 or 100 men were engaged in breaking stone that there is no sale for, inhaling the dust for their health's sake. Seven of these were picked out to go to the binder twine warehouse, where some six or seven hundred bags of twine were found to be of short weight by three pounds each. These men were to bring them up to the standard, and this was done by soaking the twine in oil until the required weight was reached.

The writer in the News says "the oil used" costs six cents a gallon and weighs about twelve pounds. Twine at the cheapest is worth ten cents per pound, so therefore six cents worth of oil is the equivalent in weight of a dollar and twenty cents worth of twine. Figure out for yourself what a nice little rake-off there would be on 1,800 pounds of twine and then prate to me of "all is done for the convicts' good.'

The necessity of making the twine of standard weight is not so clear considering that this output of the prisoners is not sold in the common market, there being apparently no call for it from farmers. It is not even used at the Experimental Farm or the outlying experimental stations. There was a bill in last year's accounts for twine for these Government farms.

The twine in question may find its way eventually into the hands of the combine which has controlled the market since twine was put on the free list. All the tricks concerning this commodity produced at the penitentiary may not be restricted to oiling the bags to make them of uniform weight.

It's a good thing municipal politicians in Belleville do not talk about each other like they do in cities on the other side. If they did it would be harder than ever to get men to run for aldermen. This town, Mr. Potter says, is one of the prettiest places he has seen. There are some very beautiful drives and the whole town is nicely laid out. Here's something worth knowing in these days of fads and indigestion; Professor Harcourt, in his address to the Women's Council the other day, informed his hearers that food prepared from grain is less costly and better otherwise when simply used as ordinarily ground for the purpose. One reason for the discredit into which the plain cereals have fallen is the fact that they are usually insufficiently cooked. Coarsely ground wheat, for example, will easily stand an hour of continuous boiling before it becomes fit to be used as a breakfast food, but then it is absolutely the best article of diet procurable, especially if it contains a large proportion of hard spring wheat from the West.

"A Taxpayer for Many Years" writes; "I was greatly interested, in reading your report of the Council proceedings, in the remarks made by Ald. Green, who expressed himself as opposed to any people, living outside the city limits, being allowed to obtain the use of city utilities. I am surprised to find, upon investigation, that several parties, who live outside the city limits, are able to share in the benefits which are made possible by our citizens burdening themselves with debt and paying high taxes. I do not object to the new County House of Refuge getting water, neither the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb or Albert College, but I really do think, and, I believe, with justice, that private parties, who live outside the city limits in order to save high taxes, should not be allowed to share in the benefits which are only made possible by the payment of those same high taxes. If the waterworks and gas works were run by private companies there could be no valid objection to gas or water being furnished to Sidney or Thurlow residents, but, as the case now stands, the gas and water works are the property of the citizens, and if they run at a loss the citizens suffer. I would ask, how much would Sidney or Thurlow people lose if the gas works or water works ran at a loss? It may be urged that Sidney or Thurlow people who use our gas or water pay what is asked of them. That is not the point. The point, as I see it, is this; The privilege of obtaining that gas or water is one of the advantages we obtain by paying 22 3-10 mills on the dollar, and outsiders, who take no risks and pay none of our taxes should not be allowed to share in our advantages. I believe in Belleville advantages for Bellevillians, who think enough of their city to live in it and help support it. It may be urged that the practice has been going on for years. Possibly, but it is wrong, and should be stopped. I would like to hear the views of some of our leading citizens on this question, which, to my mind, is a very timely one."

In regard to the above it may be stated that many people think, as the services being used by outsiders are now installed, it would be folly to refuse to sell city utilities when they can be disposed of at a profit. The city authorities, perhaps, would hardly be justified in playing the part of a dog in the manger Leaving aside that very important consideration, it would appear that "A Taxpayer for Many Years" puts up rather a plausible case. There are, however, always two sides to a question. It would be interesting to hear the other side.

A peculiar accident is alleged to have happened in Brockville. A farmer drove into town and, while tying his horse, came into contact with a spike which held the end of a chain by which an arc light was raised and lowered. The farmer received a severe electric shock, and was nearly killed. Now he alleges gross negligence on the part of the management of the light company. It appears that the day the farmer was injured was a very wet one, and experts say that, on rainy days objects which otherwise are almost absolutely free from electric influences may become highly charged with electricity. The incident, says the Brockville Times, will remind many that about a year ago at Peterboro, Ont., a team of horses was instantly killed by electricity when driven into a muddy puddle on one of the streets of that city which puddle had in some mysterious manner become highly charged with electricity. It should also have the effect of inducing people to keep their hands off all electrical appliances.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

BASEBALL.

Deaths on the Diamond in a Year.

Now that the knights of the diamond have given place to the fiercer heroes of the gridiron, fans and football enthusiasts are casting up a few comparisons as to the final cost in human lives of these two sports, the opinion is that "football is not so bad after all."

This season, says a U. S. paper, twelve baseball players were killed. The batted ball, the pitched ball and the thrown bat all proved deadly. Aside from those who met death in games, baseball has, indirectly, at least, a dozen victims who fell off roofs, died of heart disease or were run over by cars while hurrying to games.

The list of players to whom the great national sport was fatal is:

Joseph Schneider, Germantown, Pa., died of exhaustion after home run at Belmont, July 2nd.

Frank Welson, Philadelphia; struck and killed by bat that slipped from friend's hand in game, May 26th.

George T. Snyder, old-time baseball player, stricken with heart disease as he made a two-bagger.

William Garrison, Philadelphia; ruptured a blood vessel striking a ball in Camden, April 12th.

Casper Musselman, of Catasauqua, Pa.; hit over heart by pitched ball, August 20th.

Alfred Moyer, struck with bat in game at Allentown, April 22nd.

John Atting, skull fractured by pitched ball at Pottstown, July 4th.

Joseph J. McDonald, of Mount Holly, N.J.; hit on head by batted ball, September 3rd.

Frederick Whittaker, Hamilton Terrace, N.J.; hit over heart by batted ball, July 29th.

Eugene Harris, 15 years old, hit on head by batted ball at Asheville, April 8th.

Thomas F. Burke, struck by pitched ball at Lynn, Mass., August 11th.

Henry Dychl, hit by pitched ball at Wooster, Ohio, June 10th.

Several spectators of ball games were killed. Thomas P. Baker was hit by a bat that slipped from a player's hands at Camden, June 16th.

George C. Hackett was killed by a batted ball in Philadelphia May 30.

Eva Bennett died of excitement watching a game in Philadelphia, July 22nd.

Fear that the Athletics might lose brought a stroke of apoplexy to James H. Benson, of Philadelphia, on April 15th.

And so it goes. The list here given is necessarily incomplete, but it gives an idea of the accidents which happened in one part of the country from baseball.

SPORTING NOTES.

Percy Le Sueur, last year's goalkeeper and captain of the Smith's Falls team, will play goal for the Ottawa Hockey Club this winter.

Looks like as if you might as well shake dice for the baseball championship as spend a whole season arguing the matter out on the diamond. Here's the Sox and Cubs occupying the eyes of America while they decided the championship of the world. And no sooner is it settled than a "semi-professional" team in Chicago first wallops the Sox and then does the same thing to the Cubs. Don't be so hard on the Torontos, says the Telegram. They may just have been throwing deuces while the other chaps were turning up aces and sixes.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system ?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

Very Encouraging Reports Presented

TO THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE WOMAN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY NOW IN SESSION HERE —THE DELEGATES AND WHERE THEY ARE STAYING.

The twenty-fifth annual meeting of the Board of Managers of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Church in Canada and Newfoundland was convened in Bridge St. Church yesterday afternoon at 3 o'clock, the President, Mrs. W. E. Ross, occupied the chair. The meeting opened with the Doxology and the repetition of the Lord's Prayer. The scripture lesson was read by Mrs. Jackson, of Winnipeg, and Mrs. (Dr.) Carman offered prayer.

A short but very impressive memorial service was held in memory of the late Mrs. Gooderham, of Toronto, the first President of the Board. Mrs. Strachan, Field Corresponding Secretary, told of her earnest, faithful life, wonderful enthusiasm in the early days of the work, and of her wonderful faith in the power of prayer.

Mrs. Massey, of Wallbridge, and the first life member of the W.M.S., welcomed the delegation on behalf of the churches and auxiliaries and gave reminiscences, stating that the first auxiliary of the W.M.S. was organized in the City of Belleville in 1876 in connection with the late M. E. Church, and an amalgamation with the present society was made in 1884.

Reports of branches were given by the corresponding secretaries.

Mrs. McKay, Home Corresponding Secretary, presented her report, showing that there are 10 conference branches.

946 auxiliaries.
545 mission circles and bands.
Increase of new organizations, 96.
Total income for the year, $93,364.34
Increase, $7,925.26.

The ladies of Bridge Street Auxiliary entertained the Board at tea in the basement of the church.

Miss Gardiner presented an invitation to visit Albert College on Thursday afternoon.

EVENING SESSION.

The first public meeting in connection with the convention of the W. M.S. was held in Bridge St. Church, Rev. Mr. Brown conducting the opening exercises.

Mrs. Ross occupied the chair.

A choir of boys sang, very acceptably, "Who is on the Lord's Side?"

Several little children, representing the infant class, went to the platform and very sweetly and simply presented Mrs. Ross with a magnificent bouquet of roses.

Mrs. Ross suitably responded.

Rev. Mr. Wilson, with a large deputation representing the Official Boards of the Church, extended a most cordial greeting and welcome, paid a very high tribute to the work of the Woman's Missionary Society, and wished the delegates a very pleasant and profitable session.

Miss Strachan, Field Corresponding Secretary, reviewed the work of the different fields, and gave encouraging reports from China, Japan, French work in Montreal, Indian work, Galician and work on the coast among Chinese and Japanese. After reading her report, a very pleasing incident occurred, when Mrs. Carman and Mrs. Willmott moved and seconded the adoption of the report, Mrs. Willmott cementing the act by reading and presenting to Mrs. Strachan a beautifully illuminated address in book form, expressing the esteem and love and appreciation the members and Board felt towards Mrs. Strachan for her twenty-five years of unbroken faithful service as Corresponding Secretary.

Mrs. Strachan, though entirely surprised, responded in a very touching address.

Miss Wilkes, the Treasurer, presented her report, showing that over $92,000 had been raised during the year, an increase of over $7,000.

A duet was sung by Mr. and Mrs. Gordon, "Sun of My Soul."

Miss Preston, returned missionary from Japan, was introduced and gave a most interesting address, touching the work in that now great country. She pointed out most forcibly that while Japan has made great advances along all national lines, and also educational, that there is still very pressing need for Christian effort. There are in Japan to-day about 60,000 baptized Christians in a population of over 50 millions. Miss Preston was listened to with undivided interest and attention.

Rev. Mr. Brown pronounced the benediction, and the meeting adjourned, to meet Wednesday morning at 9.30.

The children who presented the beautiful bouquet to Mrs. Ross at Bridge St. Church last night were Irene Moore, Gladys Bongard, Marion Clarke, Frank Rayfield, Winston Wensley and Albert Duesberry. The presentation was made on behalf of Bridge St. Sunday School.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The session was opened with devotional exercises, conducted by Mrs. Harrison, of the London branch.

The Secretary read a cordial invitation from Mr. R. Mathison, Superintendent of the Deaf and Dumb Institute, to visit the Institution.

Reports from official correspondents and presentation of work on the mission field, were presented by Mrs. Strachan.

The work in Japan was first taken up and several appropriations were made for building extensions, purchase of lands, etc. The girls in the boarding school at Tokio, with the Alumni desire to erect a new building for the orphanage, and asked the Board for a grant to purchase the land.

A tribute was paid by the President to the self-sacrifice of the missionaries, and of their willingness to go to any part of the field.

A company of missionaries has been organized, called a "Shadan," to hold all the property in trust for the society. The union of the Methodist bodies in Japan will not at present affect the work of the W.M.S. The girls' schools will be carried on in the same way, and great satisfaction was expressed at the consummation of such an event, and the following resolution was passed by the Board;

"The Board of Managers of the W. M.S., Methodist Church, Canada, desires to express its gratification at the manifestation of advance in the spirit of Christian unity by the amalgamation of the three largest Methodist churches in Japan, but inasmuch as the bodies represented on this, continue still distinct we trust that we shall be permitted, as heretofore, to continue in the control of our missionaries and their work, believing that we shall be able thus to make the most valuable contribution to the united Japanese church."

Mrs. Carman read a letter from Mrs. Massey Treble, of Toronto, offering one thousand dollars to enable the society to establish a school of domestic science; also that she would be pleased to thoroughly equip the department in a manner suitable for the best of work; also that she would provide for the education of any student or students at the Lillian Massey School in Toronto, without charge.

The last hour of the morning was consumed in considering changes in the constitution, and receiving memorials.

TIMELY TOPICS.

CARASSONNE.

"I'm growing old; just threescore year,
In wet or dry, in dust and mire
I've sweated, never getting near
Fulfillment of my heart's desire,
Ah! well, I see that bliss below
'Tis heaven's will to grant to none,
Harvest and vintage come and go,
I've never got to Carassonne!

"The town I've glanced at many a day,
You see it from yon mountain chain,
But five long leagues it lies away,
Ten long leagues there and back again.
Ah! if the vintage promised fair,
But grapes won't ripen without sun,
And gentle showers to make them swell;
I shall not get to Carassonne.

"You'd think 'twas always Sunday there,
So fine, 'tis said, are folks bedight,
Silk hats, frock coats, the bourgeois wear,
Their demoiselles walk out in white,
Two generals with their stars you see,
And towers outtopping Babylon,
A bishop, too, ah, me! ah, me!
I've never been to Carassonne!

"Yes, truly did our cure call
Pride the besetting sin of man;
Ambition brought on Adam's fall;
And soaring wishes are my bane.
Yet could I only steal away
Before the winter had begun,
I'd die contented any day
If once I'd been to Carassonne!

So sighed a peasant of Limoux,
A worthy neighbor, bent and worn;
"Ho, friend," quoth I. "I'll go with you,
We'll sally forth to-morrow morn.'
And, true enough, away we hied;
But when our goal was almost won,
God rest his soul! the good man died
He never got to Carassonne!
—From the French of Nadaud.

More miles of railroad will be built in Canada this year than in any previous year in her history, we are told by J. A. Macdonald, writing in Engineering News of New York. Most of this is trunk line, except about 900 miles for the Canadian Pacific, and will afford work for some 20,000 men. This force will have employment, if present indications are accurate, for seven or eight years. Says Mr. Macdonald: "The mere statement of these facts is enough to convey some idea of the rapidity with which the country is developing, through the increasing application of labor and capital to the exploitation of its natural resources. It should be borne in mind that none of the enterprises thus financed are of a speculative character. The region through which the new railway lines are to be constructed are well known, and the great corporations which have undertaken to furnish them with transportation facilities are taking no chances of failure. The great increase in such facilities is made because it is urgently needed, and, so far as present appears, the work will have to be kept in progress for many years to come. The natural resources of the country are vast, varied, and widely distributed, and the result of this development will be an incalculably great impetus to the prosperity and solidarity of the Dominion."

A Bridge Kept In Repair by Mussels.

The byssus, or silky beard, by which the mussel moors itself to the stone, is a familiar object of our sea rocks. It is in its nature like the silk of the silkworm and exudes in a glutinous thread from an organ at the base of the foot. The following is an instance in which the mooring of the mussel was useful to effect a purpose which human skill could not accomplish: A large bridge, with twenty arches, in the town of Biddeford, in Devonshire, crosses the Torridge river near the spot of its junction with the Taw. The tide flows so very rapidly here that it was found impossible to keep the bridge in repair by means of mortar. The corporation therefore keeps boats employed in bringing mussels to it, and the interstices of the bridges are filled by hand with these mussels. It is supported from being driven away by the tide entirely by the strong threads which these mussels fix to the stonework, and by an act or grant it is a crime liable to transportation for any person to remove the mussels unless in the presence and by the consent of the corporative trustees.

Why He Came.

A man rushed into the barber shop and jumped into the first waiting chair, explaining, "Shave in a hurry." The barber was about to apply the lather when he noticed the customer's face. It had been shaved in spots and looked like a wornout hair rug. "I beg your pardon," said the barber, "but whoever shaved you did not understand his business or must have been near-sighted." "That's all right," replied the customer rather sharply. "Every man to his trade—you are a barber—well, I am not—that's why I came here."

STRICTURE AND KIDNEY DISEASE CURED.

"I had stricture for eleven years. It finally brought on Bright's Disease of the Kidneys. I had an uncomfortable shooting pain in the groin and feeling as though something was in the urethra. My back was weak and I could scarcely stoop over. Urine was full of sediment. Had a desire to urinate frequently. Family doctors, so-called specialists, patent medicines, electric belts, all failed. I was discouraged. I had spent hundreds of dollars in vain. Finally I consulted Drs. Kennedy & Kergan as the last resort. I had heard a great deal about them and concluded from the fact that they had been established over 25 years that they understood their business. I am delighted with the results. In one week I felt better and in a few weeks was entirely cured. Have gained sixteen pounds in weight."

said no words till the lodge-gates were past and the growl of the dogs had died into the distance.

"We are going to Littimer Castle," said Henson.

"Not there," Littimer groaned—"not there, Henson! I couldn't—I couldn't go to that place!"

Henson pointed towards the cab.

"Littimer or perdition!" he said. "You don't want to go to the latter just yet? Jump in, then!"

CHAPTER XXV.

If you had asked the first five people on the Littimer Estate what they thought of the lord of the soil you would have had a different answer from every one. One woman would have said that a kinder and better man never lived; her neighbor would have declared Lord Littimer to be as hard as the nether millstone. Farmer George would rate him a jolly good fellow, and tell how he would sit in the kitchen over a mug of ale; whilst Farmer John swore at his landlord as a hard-fisted, grasping miser devoid of the bowels of compassion.

At the end of an hour you would be utterly bewildered, not knowing what to believe, and prepared to set the whole village down as a lot of gossips who seemed to mind everything but its own business. And, perhaps, Lord Littimer might come riding through on his big black horse, small, lithe, brown as mahogany, and with an eye piercing as a diamond-drill. One day he looked almost boyishly young, there would be a smile on his tanned face. And then another day he would be bent in the saddle, huddled up, wizened, an old, old man, crushed with the weight of years and sorrow.

In sooth he was a man of moods and contradictions, changeable as an April sky, and none the less quick-tempered and hard because he knew that everybody was terribly afraid of him. And he had a tongue, too, a lashing, cutting tongue that burnt and blistered. Sometimes he would be quite meek and angry under the reproaches of the vicar, and yet the same day history records it that he got off his horse and administered a sound thrashing to the village poacher. Sometimes he got the best of the vicar, and sometimes that worthy man scored. They were good friends, these two, though the vicar never swerved in his fealty to Lady Littimer, whose cause he always championed. But nobody seemed to know anything about that dark scandal. They knew that there had been a dreadful scene at the castle seven years before, and that Lady Littimer and her son had left never to return. Lady Littimer was in a madhouse somewhere, they said, and the son was a wanderer on the face of the earth. And when Lord Littimer died every penny of the property, the castle included, would go to her ladyship's nephew, Mr. Reginald Henson.

In spite of the great cloud that hung over the family Lord Littimer did not seem to have changed. He was just a little more caustic than ever, his tongue a little sharper. The servants could have told a different story, a story of dark moods and days when the bitterness of the shadow of death lay on the face of their master. Few men could carry their grief better, and because Littimer carried his grief so well he suffered the more. We shall see what the sorrow was in time.

There are few more beautiful places in England than Littimer Castle. The house stood on a kind of natural plateau with many woods behind, a trout stream ran clean past the big flight of steps leading to the hall, below were terrace after terrace of hanging gardens, and to the left a sloping, ragged drop of 200ft. into the sea. To the right lay a magnificently-timbered park, with a herd of real wild deer—perhaps the only herd of this kind in the country. When the sun shone on the grey walls they looked as if they had been painted by some cunning hand, so softly were the greys and reds and blues blended.

Inside the place was a veritable art gallery. There were hundreds of pictures and engravings there. All round the grand staircase ran a long, deep corridor, filled with pictures. There were alcoves here fitted up as sitting-rooms, and in most of them some gem or another was hung. When the full flood of electric light was turned on at night the effect was almost dazzling. There were few pictures in the gallery without a history.

Lord Littimer had many hobbies, but not one that interested him like this. There were hundreds of rare birds shot by him in different parts of the world; the corridors and floors were covered by skins, the spoil of his rifle; here and there a stuffed bear pranced startlingly; but the pictures and prints were the great amusement of his lordship's lonely life.

He passed along the corridor now towards the great oriel window at the end. A brilliant sunlight filled the place with shafts of golden and blue and purple as it came filtered through the stained glass. At a table in the window a girl sat working a typewriter. She might have passed for beautiful, only her hair was banded down in hideously Puritan fashion on each side of her delicate, oval face, her eyes were shielded by spectacles. But they were lovely, steady, courageous blue eyes, as Littimer did not fail to observe. Also he had not failed to note that his new secretary could do very well without the glasses.

The typewriter and secretary business was a new whim of Littimer's. He wanted an assistant to catalogue and classify his pictures and prints, and he had told the vicar so. He wanted a girl who wasn't a fool, a girl who could amuse him and wouldn't be afraid of him and he thought he would have an American. To which the vicar responded that the whole thing was nonsense, but he had heard of a Boston girl in England who had a passion for that kind of thing and who was looking for a situation of the kind in a genuine old house for a year or so. The vicar added that he had not seen the young lady, but he could obtain her address. A reply came in due course, a reply that so pleased the impetuous Earl that he engaged the applicant on the spot. And now she had been just two hours in the house.

"Well," Littimer cried, "and how have you been getting on?"

Miss Christabel Lee looked up, smilingly.

"I am getting on very well indeed," she said. "You see, I have made a study of this kind of thing all my lifetime, and most of your pictures are like old friends to me. Do you know, I fancy that you and I are going to manage very well together?"

"Oh, do you? They say I am pretty formidable at times."

"I shan't mind that a bit. You see, my father was a man with a villainous temper. But a woman can always get the better of a bad-tempered man unless he happens to be one of the lower classes who uses his boots. If he is a gentleman you have him utterly at your mercy. Have you a sharp tongue?"

"I flatter myself I can be pretty blistering on occasions," Littimer said, grimly.

"How delightful! So can I. You and I will have some famous battles later on. Only I warn you that I never lose my temper, which gives me a tremendous advantage. I haven't been very well lately, so you must be nice to me for a week or two."

Littimer smiled and nodded. The grim lord of the castle was not accustomed to this kind of thing, and he was telling himself that he rather liked it.

"And now show me the Rembrandt," Miss Lee said, impatiently.

Littimer led the way to a distant alcove lighted from the side by a latticed window. There was only one picture in the excellent light there, and that was the famous Rembrandt engraving. Littimer's eyes lighted up quite lovingly as they rested upon it. The Florentine frame was hung so low that Miss Lee could bring her face on a level with it.

"This is the picture that was stolen from you?" she asked.

"Yes, that's the thing that there was all the fuss about. It made a great stir at the time. But I don't expect that it will happen again."

"Why not?" Miss Lee asked. "When an attempt of that sort is made it is usually followed by another, sometimes after the lapse of years. Anybody getting through that window could easily get the frame from its two nails and take out the paper."

"Do you think so?" Littimer asked, uneasily.

"I am certain of it. Take my advice and make it secure. The panels behind are hard wood—thick black oak. Lord Littimer, I am going to get four brass-headed stays and drive them through some of the open ornamental work into the panel so as to make the picture quite secure. It is an iron frame, I suppose."

"Wrought-iron, gilt," said Littimer. "Yes, one could easily drive four brass-headed stays through the open work and make the thing safe. I'll have it seen to."

But Miss Lee insisted that there was no time like the present. She had discovered that Littimer had an excellent carpenter's shop on the premises; indeed, she admitted to being no mean performer with the lathe herself. She flitted down the stairs light as thistle-down.

"A charming girl!" Littimer said cynically. "I wonder why she came to this dull hole? A quarrel with her young man, perhaps. If I were a young man myself I might—— But women are all the same. I should be a happier man if I had never trusted one. If——"

The face darkened; a heavy scowl lined his brows as he paced up and down. Christabel came back presently with hammer and some brass-headed stays in her hand.

"Don't utterly destroy the frame," Littimer said, resignedly. "It is reputed to be Quentin Matsy's work, and I had it cut to its present fashion. I'll go to the end of the gallery till the execution's over."

"On the contrary," Miss Lee said, firmly, "you will stay where you are told."

A little to his own surprise Littimer remained. He saw the nails driven firmly in and finished off with a punch so that there might be no danger of hammering the exquisitely wrought frame. Miss Lee stood regarding her work with a suggestion of pride.

"There," she said, "I flatter myself a carpenter could have done no better."

"You don't know our typical carpenter," Littimer said. "Here is Tredwell with a telegram. For Miss Lee? I hope it isn't an intimation that some relative has died and left you a fortune. At least, if it is, you mustn't go until we've had one of those quarrels you promised me."

Christabel glanced at the telegram and slipped it into her pocket. There were just a few words in the telegram that would have been unintelligible to the ordinary understanding. The girl did not even comprehend, but Littimer's eyes were upon her, and the cipher had to keep for a time. Littimer walked away at an intimation that his steward desired to see him.

Instantly the girl's manner changed. She glanced at the Rembrandt with a shrewd smile that meant something beyond a mere act of prudence well done. Then she went down to the library and began an eager search for a certain book. She found it at length, the "David Copperfield" in the "Charles Dickens" edition of the great novelist's works. For the next hour or so she was flitting over the pages with the cipher telegram spread out before her. A little later and the few jumbled, meaningless words were coded out into a lengthy message. Christabel read them over a few times, then with the aid of a vesta she reduced the whole thing, telegram and all, to tinder, which she carefully crushed and flung out of the window.

She looked away down the terrace, she glanced at the dappled deer knee-deep in the bracken, she caught a glimpse of the smiling sea, and her face saddened for a moment.

"How lovely it all is," she murmured. "How exquisitely beautiful and how utterly sad! And to think that if I possessed the magician's wand for a moment I could make everything smile again. He is a good man—a better man than anybody takes him to be. Under his placid, cynical surface he conceals a deal of suffering. Well, we shall see."

She replaced the "Copperfield" on the shelf and turned to go again. In the hall she met Lord Littimer dressed for riding. He smiled as he passed.

"Au revoir till dinner-time," he said. "I've got to go and see a tenant. Oh, yes, I shall certainly expect the pleasure of your company to dinner. And now that the Rembrandt——"

"It is safe for the afternoon," Christabel laughed. "It is generally when the family are dining that the burglar has his busy time. A pleasant ride to you."

CHAPTER XXVI.

Lord Littimer returned, as he declared, with the spirits and appetite of a schoolboy. All the same, he did not for one moment abandon his usual critical analysis. He rattled on gaily, but he was studying his guest all the same. She might have been the typical American-lady student; but he was not blind to the fact that the plain muslin and lace frock she wore was made in Paris or that her manners and style must have been picked up in the best society. She sat there under the shaded lights and behind the bank of flowers like as to the manner born, and her accent was only sufficiently American to render her conversation piquant.

"You have always been used to this class of life?" Littimer asked.

"There you are quite mistaken," Christabel said, coolly. "For the last few years my existence has been anything but a bed of roses. And your remark, my lord, savours slightly of impertinent curiosity. I might as well ask you why your family is not here."

"We agree to differ," Littimer responded. "I recollect it caused me a great deal of annoyance at the time. And my son chose to take his mother's part. You knew I had a son?"

"Yes," said Christabel, without looking up from the peach she was peeling. "I have met him."

"Indeed. And what opinion did you form of my son, may I ask?"

"Well, I rather liked him. He seemed to me to be suffering from some great trouble, and trouble I am sure that was not of his own creating."

"Which means to say you feel rather sorry for Frank. But when you say the trouble was not of his own creating you are entirely mistaken. It is not a nice thing to say, Miss Lee, but my son was an utter and most unmitigated young scoundrel. If he came here he would be ordered out of the house. So far as I am concerned, I have no son at all. He sides with his mother, and his mother has a considerable private fortune of her own. Where she is at the present moment I have no idea. Nor do I care. Seems odd, does it not, that I should have been very fond of that woman at one time, just as it seems odd to think that I should have once been fond of treacle tart?"

Littimer spoke evenly and quietly, with his eyes full upon the girl. He was deceiving himself, but he was not deceiving her for a moment. His callousness seemed to be all the more marked because the servants were in the room. But Christabel could see clearly what an effort it was.

"You love your wife still," she said, so low that only Littimer heard. His eyes flashed, his face flamed with a sudden spasm of passion.

"Are we to quarrel so early as this?" he whispered.

"I never quarrel," Christabel said, coolly; "I leave my antagonist to do that. But I have met your son, and I like him. He may be weak, but he is a gentleman. You have made a mistake, and some day you will be sorry for it. Do you grow those orchids yourself?"

Littimer laughed, with no sign of anger remaining. All the same, Christabel could see that his thin brown hand was shaking. She noticed the lines that pain had given under those shrewd black eyes.

"You must see my orchids," he said. "Most of the specimens I obtained myself. They tell me I have at least three unique kinds. And now, if you will permit me, I am going to smoke. The drawing-room is at your disposal, though I rarely enter it myself. I always retire at eleven, but that need not bind you in any way. It has been altogether a most delightful evening."

But Christabel did not dally long in the drawing-room. As she went upstairs and along the corridor she heard the snapping of the electric lights all over the house as the servants were preparing to retire. She paused just a moment in the alcove where the precious Rembrandt was and located carefully the position of the switch there. Then she retired to her own room, where she changed her dress for a simple black gown. A big clock somewhere was striking twelve as she finished. She looked out of her door. The whole house was in darkness, the silence seemed to cling like a curtain.

She paused for a moment as if afraid to take the next step. If it was fear, she shook it aside resolutely and crept into the corridor. She carried something shining in her hands—something that gleamed in the dim, uncertain light from the big window. She stood just for an instant with a feeling that somebody was climbing up the ivy outside the house. She felt her way along until she came to the alcove containing the Rembrandt and then she stopped. Her hand slid along the wall till her fingers touched the switch of the electric light.

WOMAN

"Woman" is the name of a new magazine for women. The first number is just issued. Your newsdealer has it. You can get it from him, and it is worth your while getting it. There is nothing startling about this magazine. There should be nothing startling about a decent magazine for women and the home. But this particular magazine is unique among all the so-called publications for women. You might not like it a little bit, and then, again, it might hit your fancy good and hard.

If you like fiction—good, wide-awake, snappy stories—both serials and short stories—you will like "Woman." In fact, fiction is the big feature of the magazine.

All the other magazines for women are cast on the same model—a little bit of fiction, a few articles, more or less chit chat, some wise advice, a fashion department and a smattering of general miscellany. "WOMAN" doesn't look any more like this conventional model than a yellow dog looks like a race horse. It is built on new lines for a strictly woman's publication. To know what it is like you will have to get a copy of it. It would cost too much to tell you all about it in this advertisement.

The price of "WOMAN" is TEN CENTS A COPY, and the magazine is a very big one—192 pages.

By the way, two rattling good serial stories begin in this first number and it contains a big lot of other good things. You would do well to ask your dealer for it before his supply is exhausted.

A Housewife's Experience

ZAM-BUK TESTED BY RESULTS.

Judge a remedy by its cures. Zam-Buk has won its position by what it has done. If you have skin disease, barbers' rash, eczema, scalp sores, a troublesome ulcer, an old wound—if you have a bad cut, chapped hands, or any sore, disease or inflamed condition of the skin, give Zam-Buk a trial, and contrast what Zam-Buk can do for you with what benefit you have reaped from other preparations. To help you in this the proprietors offer a free sample box to all who send in a one-cent stamp to pay postage. Merit alone should tell in medicine.

Zam-Buk has the merit. It is compounded from the finest medicinal herbal extracts yet discovered. It is at the same time antiseptic and healing. It kills all disease germs, it builds up damaged or diseased tissue. Doctors prescribe it, nurses use it, mothers of families swear by it. "I have been keeping house for forty years, and never found anything to equal Zam-Buk," says Mrs. Angus, of Fenelon Falls. "As a household balm and salve it is wonderful." Use it for chapped hands, chilblains, burns, bruises, children's injuries, etc. Also cures piles. All druggists sell at 50c a box, or direct from the Zam-Buk Company upon receipt of price. 6 boxes for $2.50.

A Champion Duck Story

(Chatham News.)

J. G. Kerr and Archie P. McKishnie have returned from spending a few days at Mitchell's bay. They went on purpose to make a call on the ducks, and quite a number of the latter accepted their urgent invitation to come to Chatham and stay awhile.

Archie met with a remarkable experience. While busily engaged in jotting down the words of a suddenly inspired sonnet on the stock of his gun, he chanced to notice six fine teal coming along in a straight-line, one after another. They were coming straight for him. Quick as a flash, Archie raised his gun, and, with unerring aim, fired at the foremost bird. The teal getting the benefit of the full charge, stopped dead, and the other five birds, coming up behind it at tremendous speed, were unable to swerve or dodge, and the terrific impact against the dead body of their leader broke the necks of all five birds. The thing happened so quickly that Archie couldn't credit it till he saw the six dead birds all in a heap.

Local sportsman declare that the incident is unique, and, in fact, say that they would never have believed it had not Jack Kerr himself vouched for the truth of the story.

Biography.

The father of biography was Plutarch. Critics are generally agreed that the model biography is that of Johnson, by Boswell.

The Red Sea.

The southern entrance of the Red sea is commanded by the fortress of Aden and the fort on the little island of Perim, in the strait of Babel-Mandeb, the guns of the latter completely covering the narrow channel and the fortress dominating the entrance to the sea.

Thunder and Lightning.

The sound of thunder may be heard for twenty or twenty-five miles; with the ear to the ground, much farther. Lightning is reflected for 150 to 200 miles.

The Datura.

The datura, varieties of which are commonly known as the Jamestown weed, or, more familiarly, the jimson weed, the thorn apple (an allusion to the shape of the seed case and its spines) and the devil's trumpet, recalling its shape and villainous odor, retains its name almost unchanged from the Arabic.

Visiting Cards.

In 1857 the Duke of Parma had his photograph upon his visiting cards. Hence the term "cartes-de-visite."

Snake Dreams.

A well known authority on dreams and dream books says: "To dream you see snakes or serpents shows that you will be imprisoned and encounter many dangers. If you are in love, your sweetheart will be false. To dream you kill a snake shows you will overcome difficulties and enemies and be successful in love, trade or farming, but unsuccessful at sea."

Odd French Custom.

In the south of France the handing of a sweet pea by a young lady to a young gentleman is a polite way of stating that she is tired of his company.

Burton and the "Arabian Nights."

Sir Richard Burton's translation of the "Arabian Nights" was sold out in ten days and brought $80,000, upon which he and his wife lived royally for five years. At his death but $2 remained of the sum, and Lady Burton deposited it in the poor box of her church.

The Wasp's Waist.

The waist of a wasp is synonymous both in natural history and fashion for slightness. No insect has so slim a connection between the thorax and the abdomen.

In Chancery.

A London justice a short time ago made an order for the distribution of an estate that had been in the court of chancery for 100 years, during which time it had increased in value threefold.

Fortifications.

The city and the tower which the sons of Noah proposed to build were the earliest recorded instances of fortification. The tower in this case was undoubtedly a citadel.

Latin and Italian.

Several hundred writers on the subject claim that the Italian, with such changes as naturally come about in the course of ages, has always been the language of the common people living in the boot shaped peninsula. These writers assert that Latin was the language of literature, the law and the educated classes, while Italian was spoken by the people.

The Spanish Needle.

What is called the Spanish needle is the seed of a peculiar species of weed. It easily penetrates and adheres to cloth or wool and is thus transported to a new location.

Penn Yan.

Penn Yan, N. Y., was built up conjointly by settlers from Pennsylvania and New England, who were unable to agree upon a name for the new town until some distorted brain suggested Penn Yan as a combination of the words Pennsylvania and Yankee. It was adopted as a compromise and is still attached to the place.

Birds of Prey.

Most birds of prey are provided with nictating membranes that serve to keep the eye perfectly clean and bright.

Horses In Argentina.

Traveling on the Argentine pampas is interesting if not entirely comfortable. Men there are scarce, but horses are plentiful. Often sixty horses are driven in the same team. The driver is perched thirty feet from the ground. The wagons are sometimes fifty feet long and fifteen wide, while the back wheels are fourteen feet or so high.

Finger Language.

A deaf and dumb person who is fairly expert at finger language can speak about forty-three words a minute. In the same space of time a person in possession of his speech will probably speak one hundred and fifty words.

Loretto Litanies.

Loretto litanies cannot be traced beyond the fifteenth century and did not originate at the shrine, but were carried there by pilgrims.

Making Knives.

In the manufacture of knives the division of labor has been carried to such an extent that one knife is handled by seventy different artisans from the moment the blade is forged until the instrument is finished and ready for the market.

"Grand Peninsular"
Is an Ornament to the Home.

Popular taste no longer clings to deeply carved, highly ornamental ranges.

People now want rich, yet simple, elegance.

That is the way I make my new Grand Peninsular Range.

The "Grand Peninsular" is easy to keep clean, because there are no deep carvings to collect the dust and dirt. The design is simple but very effective. No fuss or frills. Just smooth surfaces which take a beautiful bright polish. The nickelled castings are detachable, and can be lifted off without loosening a bolt, when the range is to be brushed or cleaned.

Then there is the ALL-STEEL OVEN—the THERMOMETER on the oven door—extra large GRATE BARS—and a dozen other time-and-labor-savings conveniences—that are exclusive with my GRAND PENINSULAR. Have your dealer show you all these points. 42

Some Symptoms of Eye-Strain.

A great percentage of eye-strain is due to affection of the extrinsic muscles. Muscular Asthenopia (painful vision from muscular troubles) is accompanied by some of the following: Redness of eye ball, dry, hot feeling, or tears, intolerance of light, shooting pains through the eyes and inflammations more or less deep, etc. According to the power of resistance will be the time that will expire before head symptoms, and bodily reflexes will manifest themselves. By and by the symptoms will be grouped by the nerve specialist, and diagnosed as nervous prostration, phychosis, migraine, brain fag, hysteria, threatened insanity, epilepsy, etc., and prescribe some waters, evacations, change of climate, etc., or any way that will get them off from using their eyes. As insomnia, nervousness, muscle twitching, loss of memory, sudden blackness coming before the vision, dizziness, temporary blindness, sick headache, pains in heart, stomach, bowels, etc. All of these symptoms are often relieved by treatment of the eyes alone. With all the efforts of the opthalmologist (eye specialist) the truth of this fact has not yet penetrated the minds of the general practitioners as it ought. The above is condensed from an address before the Iowa Optical Association, by E. H. Hazen, M.D., a medical practitioner and eye specialist of 40 years' standing. We not only give glasses to relieve and avert the above troubles, but we give exercises to strengthen these muscles.

Mr. W. W. Chown Will Settle In Edmonton

WAS ONE OF THE PARTIES TO A BIG DEAL THERE LAST WEEK.

(Edmonton, Alta., Morning Journal.)

Eastern capital still continues to flow with unabated volume to Alberta's Capital. An important and interesting deal in Main street property took place Monday, when W. W. Chown of the W. W Chown Co., Limited, of Belleville, Ont., hardware merchants, purchased the property occupied by J. Henderson, hardware merchant, from Bown, Dawson and Hyndman and also the business and stock of hardware from Mr. Henderson himself. The purchase price of the property, which is twenty-five feet in width, was $24,000 and the amount of stock carried by Mr. Henderson was in excess of $15,000.

The deal is of more than passing interest in that it defines more clearly than ever the steadily rising importance of Edmonton as a commercial centre and the fact that its future, as such, is fully recognized by the best eastern men capable of judging and estimating what are good sound, solid and safe investments.

Mr. Chown, the purchaser, is a hardware man in every sense of the word. Born at Kingston, Ont., in 1846, the son of a successful hardware merchant, the boy grew up right in the business and even in his early teens was thoroughly grounded in every phase of it. Twenty-five years ago he moved from Kingston to Belleville, leaving his father's store and starting for himself in the latter town. As his sons grew up they too learned the business and eventually became partners in the firm of W. W. Chown Co., Limited. Early last summer Mr. Chown after a short stay here, returned to Belleville, but as he stated to The Journal representative this morning, the Western fever had caught him and he expressed his determination to come west to Edmonton and stay. His many friends in Belleville were much put out, called him crazy to leave a comfortable home and splendid business where he was well fixed for life to go out into the wild and woolly west with its dread dangers. Mr. Chown laughed their fears away bought his ticket to the metropolis of the Last West and yesterday completed a deal which will establish him as one of the leading citizens and business men in the Capital. He leaves this afternoon for Belleville to close out his business and other interests there and to bring his wife and youngest son west.

Messrs. Chown & Son will enlarge the building at present occupied by Mr. Henderson by extending it clear to the lane behind and extending the basement accordingly. They will carry a full and complete line of hardware, stoves and ranges, builders' supplies, etc.

Mr. Chown should be undoubtedly a valuable acquisition to the city from a municipal point of view. He was Mayor of Belleville for the year 1904 and previous to that sat as alderman for four years. For two years he was chairman of the finance committee and was given the credit of bringing the financial status of that city from fairly middling to a perfectly sound basis. He believes in municipal government by commission—having learned from practical experience that that system is best, provided of course, that the triumvirate are sound common sense and practical men.

As regards realty values in Edmonton Mr. Chown does not consider business property valuations too high. If he had he would not have invested. Residential properties, however, he says, are held at rather speculative values. When the G.T.P. comes in and the C.P.R. high level bridge is built, he continued, matters will then adjust themselves upon a more healthy and equitable basis.

Aftermath of An Automobile Scare

Mrs. Sarah Clark, relict of the late James Clark, of the Fifth concession of Thurlow, died yesterday, as the result of injuries received about a month or so ago. It is alleged that, while an automobile owned in this city was passing along the road, it frightened a team attached to a load of straw, which a son of Mrs. Clark was driving. The team ran away, throwing the driver off and injuring him. He was taken home, and it is alleged that, owing to flurry and excitement, his mother, while waiting on him, made a false step and fell down stairs, fracturing her hip, breaking her leg and otherwise injuring herself. The old lady was about 81 years of age, and the shock was apparently too much for her, death coming yesterday, it is alleged, as a result of the fall. The late Mrs. Clark was widely respected in the district where she lived.

School Teacher Grant Stands Searching Examination.

Nor Does He Know Aught of Any Election Misdemeanors — Did O'Meara Bluff the Crown?—Ardy Discharged as Prisoner and Used as Witness—More Men Who Got Money For Voting.

Toronto, Oct. 24.—The examination of Birtle D. Grant, a young school teacher of Goderich, to the end of securing evidence corroborative of a portion of the testimony of J. T. Pritchett, instructor in the gentle act of switching ballots, failed to yield the positive results which the Crown sought at the continuation of the London bribery investigation yesterday. Pritchett, in his sensational story, referred to a school teacher as having delivered into his hand a number of deputy-returning officers to receive a course of "training" at the time of an election some years ago in West Huron.

Denied Any Wrongdoing.

On the information supplied by Pritchett, Grant appeared as a witness yesterday, and, though subjected to a searching examination, he denied from beginning to end having had any associations whatever with the wizard of West Elgin. He did not refute having been in West Huron at the time of the election, and having rendered party service, and it was also elicited that he was in London for three weeks prior to the bye-election, doing clerical work. He also admitted an acquaintance with O'Gorman, Reid and Lewis, extending back a number of years, but gave comprehensive disclaimers of any knowledge whatever of wrongdoing in election work.

Did O'Meara Bluff?

Before the proceedings opened, Mr. DuVernet said re Accountant John O'Meara:

"The London police claim that he is the right man, and that there is no question about it. They say that he never even protested that he was the wrong man, and they are highly incensed at the charge that they made a mistake. They are positive that he is the right man."

Magistrate Denison gave the opinion that, in this case, O'Meara had "committed deliberate perjury." Mr. DuVernet agreed, and pointed out that, O'Meara having sworn that he left London ten years ago, had later made remarks, from which the inference was to be drawn that he was there seven years ago. The court said this matter should be followed up, and Mr. DuVernet intimated that it would be.

Found Money In His Pocket.

Andrew Robson, a worker for Mr. Hyman, having been assured of the protection of the Crown, testified to having bribed several voters in the bye-election and in the bye-election with $35 which some mysterious and unknown individual surreptitiously introduced into his pocket. He had paid money "directly" to men named McLaren and Ackerman, and "indirectly" to a man named Williams. It transpired that this trio had been likewise been bonused in the Beck election, and that Robson had also held out cash allurements to one Genis. He had offered $15 to him, as Genis claimed the Conservatives had bid as high as $10.

"Did he get the ten from the other party?" asked Mr. Robinette, alertly.

"I don't know; I guess he did," returned Robson.

More Votes, More Cash.

Another batch of witnesses who received cash for their votes were examined by the court.

James Dewar got $10 for his vote in the Hyman-Grey election, and $5 in the Beck-Rumble election.

John Trollope received $9.50 in the Hyman election and $5 in the Beck contest.

John Orr got $10 for staying away from the polls.

James Hay got money.
C. E. Downing got $9.50.
Harry Johnston got $10.
Charles Paul got $10.
Joseph H. Jones got $10.

Ardy Discharged.

George Ardy, one of the envelope dispensers, was here discharged at the instance of the Crown and was placed in the box as a witness. Mr. Ardy explained that he was chairman of subdivision 82, in the election, and that he had been the medium through which six money envelopes had found their way to voters. The names of these favored individuals were Rose, Johnson, Haun, Jones, Riley and Tolhurst.

Lewis Secured Bail.

Thomas Lewis, the London hotelkeeper who was committed for trial on a charge of perjury in connection with the London bribery case, was yesterday liberated on $10,000 bail. John Lewis, a brother, went surety for $5,000, and the defendant's own bond was accepted for a similar amount. Lewis has been in jail for a week.

McINTOSH BROS.

THE SUN LIFE CO.

Tells Royal Insurance Commission It Prefers Traction Bonds to Municipal Debentures For Investment.

Montreal, Oct. 24.—The Insurance Commission resumed here yesterday afternoon, the Sun Life being again the object of investigation with Secretary and Actuary T. B. Macaulay still on the stand.

The proceedings dealt almost entirely with purchases by the Sun Life of Illinois Traction securities, so-called. In 1902 and 1903 the Sun Life decided to go into the underwriting and purchase of bonds at first hand from companies issuing them.

Traction companies were preferred. Circulars were sent out to many traction companies in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, and the Sun Life got into communication with Hon. W. B. McKinley of Champagne, Illinois, who was deeply interested in several companies of the kind in Illinois.

A scheme was proposed by the latter to amalgamate many utilities companies in the neighborhood of Urbana, Champagne and Danville, under the head of the Illinois Railways and Light Co.

Half the Stock as Bonus.

The Sun Life was to buy two-thirds of the bonds issued and to get one-half the stock as a bonus. T. A. Macaulay went down to inspect the plants, etc., in Illinois. In 1903, the scheme was changed. It was decided to have the Dayton and Urbana Railway buy other lines and issue bonds to be taken up by a holding company, the Illinois Traction Co., which issued no bonds. In this the Sun Life had one-half the stock as a bonus.

The question will be further discussed to-day.

Of the $750,000 bonds of the latter company, the Sun Life got $406,000, Mr. McKinley $250,000, and persons in Montreal, some of whom were Sun Life directors, $94,000.

Investments of Directors.

The witness discussed with Mr. Shepley the advisability of the directors joining with insurance companies in any investment.

Mr. Macaulay declared that it was advisable, because, if the directors bought the same securities as the company, it showed they had confidence in the enterprises into which they were taking the company. It was an entirely different state of affairs, when the company bought securities of companies which were controlled by directors.

Another statement made by the witness was that he would rather have a company invest in traction bonds than municipal debentures, on the ground of safety. He said that the Sun Life had lost money on Toronto Junction, New Westminster, Brandon, and Sault Ste. Marie debentures.

Mr. Langmuir expressed surprise at the stand taken by the witness.

OLD WOMEN DIE TOGETHER.

Prediction That One Would Not Survive Other Has Strange Fulfilment.

Detroit, Mich., Oct. 24.—Mrs. Jennette Falkner of London, Ont., is dead at the home of one of her sons in Fairview.

Mrs. Falkner, who was 70 years of age, had lived the greater part of her life in London. Next door to her lived Mrs. Kinsella, 69 years of age. The women had been close friends for years, and each had said she would not survive the death of the other.

Upon one of Mrs. Falkner's sons telephoning to relatives in London of the death of his mother, he was told that Mrs. Kinsella had died very suddenly only six hours before.

The funerals of the two will be held in London on the same day, and they will be buried in adjourning lots in the same cemetery.

SHOT HIS PARAMOUR.

Winnipeg Man's Crime Incited By Jealousy—Also Wounds Himself.

Winnipeg, Oct. 23.—Frederick Drew, a man of bad reputation around the city, while infuriated by jealousy, shot his paramour, a negress named Josephine Jackson, yesterday afternoon, inflicting three painful, but not dangerous wounds. One bullet struck her in the left arm, another in the left side, and the third in the thigh. She was taken to the hospital, and Drew was arrested.

The prisoner is also suffering from a painful wound, having shot himself through the hand while preparing to execute his murderous purpose.

Local Option Quashed.

Toronto, Oct. 24.—The Divisional Court has quashed the local option bylaw passed in Elma Township, Perth County, by a majority of 291 in a vote of 811. The court found that the bylaw omitted a clause provided for in such cases by the Municipal Act, for the summing up of the votes, and also that there were numerous irregularities in the closing of the poll books. It is said that in only one polling place was this done properly. The township, therefore, loses and pays the costs in both courts. Judge Anglin had ruled that on account of the majority, the technical objections were not sufficient weight.

Laudanum Causes Death.

Brockville, Oct. 24.—Taking an overdose of laudanum to relieve indigestion caused the death of a young man named Kennedy, residing near Burke. He was found in his room in an unconscious condition, and all efforts to revive him failed. He had been hunting and retired in good health. Sounds from his room aroused the family, and a doctor was summoned.

Carter Harrison Injured.

Montreal, Oct. 24.—Carter Harrison, the ex-mayor of Chicago, who was head of a party of Chicago people on a hunting trip into the C. P. R. country, has been very seriously injured by a fall which caused his spine to be sprained. The character of the injury is such that he will never permanently recover from it.

Girl's Body In River.

Lindsay, Oct. 24.—For two weeks the Village of Fenelon Falls has been excited over the disappearance of Miss Powers, employed at the Twomey Hotel. Now her body has been found in the river below the steamer wharf by two boys, who were out fishing.

NORTH BRUCE NOMINATIONS.

"Honest John" Tolmie Cripples His Cause By a Canard.

Port Elgin, Oct. 24.—The town hall of Port Elgin was crowded yesterday afternoon to attend the joint meeting that followed the nominations in North Bruce.

James Walmsley, the returning officer, presided, and speeches were made by the candidates, followed by addresses from W. F. Maclean, M.P. for South York, and Hon. A. B. Aylesworth Minister of Justice; Richard Blain M.P. (Peel), W. H. Bennett, M. P. (East Simcoe), and Peter H. MacKenzie, M.P. (Bruce) were among the prominent men in attendance.

The Conservative nominee is Abraham McLellan, a well-to-do and substantial farmer of Kincardine Township; his opponent is John Tolmie, ex-M.P. of the Village of Kincardine, who has run for Parliament on every political ticket that has ever been launched in Canada.

He is a good mixer, but has crippled his cause by circulating the silly canard that his opponent can neither read nor write. He tried to wriggle out yesterday when charged with it on the platform.

Mr. McLellan spoke brifly but to the point. Mr. Tolmie spoke at greater length and concluded by an appeal for "Honest John Tolmie."

Dundas County Conservatives.

Winchester Springs, Oct. 24.—The annual meeting of the Dundas County Conservative Association was held here yesterday afternoon. There was a large attendance, and great enthusiasm was shown.

Premier Whitney addressed the meeting for two hours, going in detail over the events of the last session and the policy of the Government. As to the power question he said that justice would be done to all.

Andrew Brodeur, M.P., spoke briefly.

HOT SHOT FROM A LIBERAL.

Mayor Mowat Condemns Management of Militia as Stupid.

Kingston, Oct. 24.—Mayor Mowat, a captain in the Princess of Wales Rifles, in congratulating Major Shannon, late city clerk, on his appointment as district staff officer at London, Ont., condemned the Militia Department as the most stupidly managed of any in the public service.

It was a wonder that the permanent force was able to attain such a remarkable state of efficiency in view of the bungling of their superiors on the headquarters staff. Its business was stupidly conducted, and it apparently combined all the unbusinesslike qualities of all the other public departments put together.

Mayor Mowat is the late president of the Kingston Reform Association, who resigned because Major Shannon, a Tory, had been placed in office, which, it was claimed, many a qualified Liberal could have filled.

Dr. W. W. Sands succeeds to the office of city clerk. He was the nominee of the Kingston Liberals for the office secured by Major Shannon.

U. S. Thanksgiving Day.

Washington, Oct. 24.—The President yesterday issued a proclamation naming Thursday, Nov. 29, as a day of thanksgiving.

Catarrh of the Stomach

A PLEASANT, SIMPLE, BUT SAFE AND EFFECTUAL CURE FOR IT.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Catarrh of the stomach has long been considered the next thing to incurable. The usual symptoms are a full or bloating sensation after eating, accompanied sometimes with sour or watery risings, a formation of gases, causing pressure on the heart and lungs, and difficult breathing, headaches, fickle appetite, nervousness and a general played out, languid feeling.

There is often a foul taste in the mouth, coated tongue, and if the interior of the stomach could be seen it would show a slimy, inflamed condition.

The cure for this common and obstinate trouble is found in a treatment which causes the food to be readily, thoroughly digested before it has time to ferment and irritate the delicate mucous surfaces of the stomach. To secure a prompt and healthy digestion is the one necessary thing to do and when normal digestion is secured the catarrhal condition will have disappeared.

According to Dr. Harlanson, the safest and best treatment is to use after each meal a tablet composed of Diastase, Aseptic Pepsin, a little Nux, Golden Seal and Fruit Acids. These tablets can now be found at all drug stores under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and not being a patent medicine can be used with perfect safety and assurance that healthy appetite and thorough digestion will follow their regular use after meals.

Mr. R. S. Workman, Chicago, Ill., writes: "Catarrh is a local condition resulting from a neglected cold in the head, whereby the lining membrane of the nose becomes inflamed and the poisonous discharge therefrom passing backward into the throat, reaches the stomach, thus producing catarrh of the stomach. Medical authorities prescribed for me for three years for catarrh of stomach without cure, but to-day I am the happiest of men after using only one box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I cannot find appropriate words to express my good feeling. I have found flesh, appetite and sound rest from their use."

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the safest preparation, as well as the simplest and most convenient remedy for any form of indigestion, Catarrh of Stomach, biliousness, sour stomach, heartburn and bloating after meals.

"WE WILL HAVE VOTES!"

"You Cowardly Men Dare Not Give Us Justice."

Women Attempt to Break Into British House of Commons on Re-opening, But Are Finally Carried Out By the Police—Arrests Were Made Later—Large Crowds Witness the Opening of Both Houses.

London, Oct. 24.—The reassembling of Parliament yesterday drew large crowds to Westminster, despite the fact that the opening of the sessions was devoid of sumptuous ceremony or the appearance of royalty.

The formal opening of the House of Commons occurred during the afternoon, and before the House of Lords, thus giving the throngs of spectators an opportunity to witness the assembling of both bodies. The public galleries were overflowing with visitors. Mr. Balfour, the ex-Premier, unexpectedly appeared, and received a hearty greeting from the Opposition ranks.

Chamberlain Absent.

Joseph Chamberlain was absent. He is still nursing his attack of gout and chafing under his inability to participate in public affairs.

Premier Campbell-Bannerman was warmly welcomed.

Later, the House of Lords was the chief centre of interest, the diplomatists leaving the House of Commons to witness the entry of the peers and the Lord Chancellor taking his seat on the traditional woolsack.

King Edward left Buckingham Palace in an automobile at noon, to spend the rest of the week at the Newmarket races. The car knocked down a man as the King was leaving town, but no serious consequences resulted from the accident.

Women Cause Scene.

Unusual excitement was caused by the presence of about 100 women suffragists, many of whom, despite the protests of the police, managed to find their way into the outer lobby of the House of Commons, with the intention of buttonholing the members in support of their movement.

A number of the suffragettes, as they are termed here, mounted vacant chairs in the lobby and began to harangue the few members of Parliament present in that part of the House. The police, after being reinforced, made a strategic advance against the invaders, taking the women singly, and gradually ejected them one by one, from the house.

Attempt to Break Into House.

During the height of the tumult a small band of the staunchest suffragists determined to attempt to break into the House itself, and charged towards the entrance of the inner lobby. For several minutes, the utmost disorder, almost a riot, prevailed, and the police had all they could do to eject the women, who resolutely refused to leave without the use of force.

They clung tenaciously to the stalwart policemen, the railings or other means of support, and offered strenuous resistance to expulsion, while shouts of "We will have votes!" and "You cowardly men dare not give us justice!" resounded through the halls.

Finally, the police were forced to carry out several of the women bodily. So noisily demonstrative were they that the police arrested several of them and marched them off to the nearest police station.

LAURIER NOMINEE BEATEN.

Robitaille, An Independent Liberal, Overwhelms Amyot.

Quebec, Oct. 24.—After one of the keenest political contests known to the Quebec district, the bye-election in Quebec County to fill the federal vacancy caused by the elevation of Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick to the chief justiceship resulted yesterday in the election of Lorenzo Robitaille (Independent Liberal) by a majority of 447 votes over George E. Amyot, the Government nominee.

The majorities by polls was as follows:

Robitaille—Beauport 514, Charlesbourg 48, Sillery 32, Ancienne Lorette 12, St. Foye 3; total 609.

Amyot—St. Arbroise Jeune Lorette 34, Cap Rouge 27, Valcartier 34, Lake Beauport 13, Tewkesbury 30, Stoneham 24; total 162.

The inquest on the bodies of Belanger and Theriault will begin to-day.

$1,200 For Breach of Promise.

Toronto, Oct. 24.—Mrs. Jennie McArthur, a widow, 32, was the plaintiff in a breach of promise suit in the Assize Court yesterday. She resides in Galt. It was there she met W. J. Patterson, now of the Union Life Insurance Co. They met on the street. She worked in a laundry and he would wait for her. They became engaged in March, 1904, the marriage to take place in January, 1906. When the time came W. J. failed to appear. The jury yesterday gave her a $1,200 verdict. The defendant did not appear in court.

Ottawa, Oct. 24.—The body of [illegible] William Newham of Dunrobin, Torbolton, Carleton County, was found in a field in a badly decomposed state. She was 55 years of age, deaf and partly blind, and lost her way while proceeding to the postoffice on Oct. 8 to cash $35 in postal notes. She died from exposure, and the body lay in the field for ten days.

W. T. JENNINGS, C. E., DEAD.

End Comes to Eminent Canadian Engineer While in Michigan.

Lansing, Mich., Oct. 25.—William T. Jennings, aged 61 years, consulting engineer of the City of Toronto, died at the residence of Manager J. R. Elliott of the Michigan United Railways here yesterday morning. The deceased arrived in Lansing last Thursday from South Bend, Ind., for the purpose of inspecting the railway lines of the system. He was in fairly good health when he arrived in Lansing, but on Sunday was stricken with paralysis. His son, Gordon Jennings, who was telegraphed for on Sunday, was with him at the time of his death.

Toronto Shocked.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—News of the death in Lansing, Mich., yesterday of William T. Jennings, civil engineer, of this city, came as a great shock, not only to members of his profession, but in many other circles in which his activities had made him well known and respected.

Gordon Jennings will bring the remains of his father to Toronto.

The late Mr. Jennings was born in Toronto, his father being a Presbyterian clergyman. He entered the profession of civil engineering and applied himself to railway work. He engineered section B of the C. P. R. from Rat Portage and then superintended the construction of the C. P. R. from the Pacific Coast to a point 350 miles inland, the work having been characterized as one of the most difficult and costly in railway construction.

Returning to Toronto, he became resident engineer for the C. P. R., resigning in 1890 to become city engineer. Two years later he retired to take up a consulting practice, and in that capacity in the years which have elapsed undertook many important reports. For the city these included reports on Esplanade railway matters and on the problem of water supply.

REAL FLYING MACHINE.

M. Santos-Dumont Wins the Archdeacon Cup at Paris.

New York, Oct. 25.—The Herald prints the following special despatch from Paris:

M. Santos-Dumont won the Archdeacon Cup yesterday on the field at Bagatelle, with his Bird of Prey, a flying machine. Not only did he succeed in covering the necessary 25 metres, but in the opinion of every competent witness summoned in council immediately after the flight, it was agreed that he left the ground well even 50 metres from the point where he descended. His flight was free, with sustained balance. There was no hesitation.

The Deutsch-Archdeacon prize is worth $10,000. It was promised to the first aerial appliance which, unsupported by gas, should make a circle of at least one kilometre without coming to the ground.

Fell From Sixth Story.

Robt. McCoom, a Chicago Laborer, Killed In Hamilton.

Wheeling Bricks on the Bank of Hamilton Building, His Barrow Hit an Obstruction and Overturned, Precipitating McCoom Down the Elevator Shaft to the Basement—Miss Helen Strickland Seriously Injured By Fall.

Hamilton, Oct. 25.—Robert McCoom, laborer, Chicago, fell from the sixth storey of the Bank of Hamilton Building last evening about 6.30, and was so badly injured that he died in a few minutes. He was wheeling a barrowful of bricks on the sixth storey. The barrow hit an obstruction and overturned, throwing McCoom down the elevator shaft to the basement. Several doctors were called, but he died about ten minutes after he was picked up.

Coroner Dickson will hold an inquest. The dead man was 35 years of age, and leaves a widow and four young children. He boarded at the Commercial Hotel, and had come to the city only a few days ago.

Miss Helen Strickland, a domestic, who fell from a second-storey window at the residence of W. Miller, Colborne street, has been taken to the City Hospital in a serious condition.

The explosion took place in heading No. 29, a considerable distance from the ill-fated Klondike section, where 114 men lost their lives over four years ago. The other man had several ribs broken, severe internal injuries being feared. Both men are at St. Michael's Hospital.

The Provincial Conference

The conference of Provincial Premiers with Sir Wilfrid Laurier came to an end with the implied promise of the Dominion Government to concede to the provinces better financial terms. The increases to be allowed amount in all to $2,372,000. This arrangement gives effect to the resolutions of Mercier's inter-provincial conference at Quebec eighteen years ago. It does not satisfy British Columbia, which makes strong special claims based upon large areas, scattered population and physical conditions, involving heavy cost of administration and development. Premier McBride of that province presented the case with great force, and is so strongly convinced of the justice of his case that he declined to compromise on an extra allowance of $100,000 a year for ten years. He therefore left the conference, and British Columbia is not a party to the settlement, though she will get the benefit of the rearrangement.

Mr. McBride asked that the claims of British Columbia be referred to a commission of three, one appointed by the provincial government, one by the Dominion and one by the Imperial Colonial Office. Sir Wilfrid objected to leaving anything unsettled. Both he and his friends of the provincial delegations objected to this reference. Yet it does not appear that the agreement is a final settlement — even of financial transactions between the Dominion and the Provinces. Not only has British Columbia still a demand unsatisfied but the Eastern Provinces have financial claims respecting fisheries. It is not officially stated that the special demands for a division of the fishery award have been abandoned.

Outside of financial terms there are many unsettled questions which remain. There is the boundary of Manitoba, which is a question also affecting Ontario and the new Provinces. A conference on this question will be held next month. There are matters of conflicting jurisdiction in the control of the fisheries. Water-powers are so under provincial and federal control as to make it difficult for either party to legislate in regard to them. The whole area of liquor legislation and of legislation respecting the Lord's Day has become so involved in concurrent and conflicting authority as to make any laws on these subjects of uncertain validity. It was understood that the conference would deal with some of these matters, but they were not touched.

Nor did Sir Wilfrid carry out the promise he made last session to submit to the provincial delegates the question of Senate reform and provincial representation in the Upper Chamber. That subject seems to have been never mentioned, and we may therefore, assume that Sir Wilfrid's undertaking was merely a little subterfuge of his own to get rid of a subject which was not convenient.

TIMELY TOPICS.

Men's thoughts now run from other channels
Into that which hints at winter flannels.

"Can anybody tell me," said the man on the next block, "where Peterboro gets its pull with the Ontario Government? When the Game Wardenship was taken away from Mr. H. K. Smith, of Belleville, it was given to a Peterboro man. Then there was the matter of the Model School. A lot of towns were after it, Belleville among them, but Peterboro landed the prize. Now there is the Institute job. It was thought a Belleville man had a pretty fair chance for that, but Peterboro winked the other eye, and there was nothing doing so far as this beautiful city was concerned. Sure thing, Mr. Bradburn, M. P. P., of Peterboro, must have been seeing the new moon over his right shoulder ever since he was elected."

A letter has been received in this city which shows plainly why the Ontario Government, after declaring it would allow no more net fishing in the Bay of Quinte, reconsidered its decision and gave the fishermen permission to use nets for the balance of this year. It seems that the deputation which waited on the Government produced a letter signed by that excellent Grit official, Mr. Bastedo, which promised that the net fishing licenses would be renewed this fall. This action was taken by Bastedo without consulting the Minister from whom he was supposed to take orders, the Hon. Dr. Reaume being sick at the time. Under the circumstances, and having been shown that letter, the Government felt it could not refuse permits to fish for the balance of the year.

GAMEY'S TURN, NOW.

(Toronto Telegram.)

The same fierce light that beat upon the lone man from Manitoulin has been turned on a few of his persecutors. They, with greater opportunities and fewer temptations, do not show up much better than the backwoods politician, who did more to purify the public life of this Province in a few months than all the alleged statesmen have done in twice as many years.

Time has brought to R. R. Gamey, M.P.P., the opportunity to wreak vengeance upon his would-be destroyers. The retribution that has overtaken Mr. Gamey's foes gives point to this free and inaccurate quotation of the old verse:

Monstrous Engineering Feat of Swiss Syndicate

TO CONSTRUCT RAILWAY ALMOST TO SUMMIT OF MOUNT BLANC.

Geneva, Oct. 24.—A serious scheme to build a railway almost to the summit of the Mont Blanc range has been prepared by a Swiss syndicate, and has received the approval of the French Government. The projected railway will provide "the greatest thrill on earth," taking passengers to the roof of Europe.

The syndicate which has obtained the concession is at present completing an aerial line to the summit of the Wetterhorn. It now proposes to build a similar line from the valley of Chamonix to the summit of the Aiguille du Midi, a peak nearly 12609 feet high, in the centre of the Mont Blanc range.

According to the contract, an ordinary funicular railway will join the existing system at Chamonix. The double aerial cables will begin at the first Alpine station near the Glacier des Bossons at a height of over 8,090 feet.

The cost is estimated at about $1,000,000, and it is believed that the project will take four years to carry out. The first and easiest half will take only a year, and tourists may be able to ascend to the Glacier des Bossons at the end of next summer.

The line will skirt a score of glaciers, dozens of crevasses and unfathomable precipices, and will give those who do not care for climbing the Alps on foot an idea of the dangers and the pleasures of mountaineering.

To ride on this railway will give the passengers a series of thrills which no other line in the world can afford. It is believed, further, that it will be absolutely safe, for the engineers have examined and studied every yard of the route, and have taken every precaution in preparing the estimates. In several places it will pass over blue ice crevasses, giving the passenger the sensation of riding over blue water.

The electricity which will work the line will be generated by the River Arve. The coaches will be specially constructed to withstand the great changes of cold and heat.

The engineers are very hopeful of the success of the project, but they recognize that the nearer the line approaches the summit the more difficult will be the work of construction owing to the difficulties of the glaciers and the deep snow and the danger of avalanches. In the known tracks of the avalanches tunnels will be constructed to avoid all danger, but four-fifths of the line will be in the open air.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

What Part?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

THE ANT.

Facts About One of Nature's Most Industrious Creatures.

When spring comes with all its wealth of opening buds and new flowers, the ant is preparing for a season of profitable industry.

It comes out of its winter quarters and locates a new home where it can store away, during the summer months, the sustenance for the long winter days.

Just as industrious as the ant—but in a different way, are the countless —infinitesimal germs which burrows into the scalp and eat away at the roots of the hair.

As they burrow away Dandruff forms, and if the germs are not all killed Baldness results.

Newbro's Herpicide is the only known remedy which kills the germs. Sold by leading druggists. Send 10c in stamps for sample to The Herpicide Co., Detroit, Mich. J. S. McKeown, special agent.

Grand Old Men Of Methodist Church.

TOOK PART IN SILVER ANNIVERSARY SERVICES OF THE W.M.S. OF M.C. LAST NIGHT—THREE EXCELLENT ADDRESSES AND SOME FINE MUSIC.

There was a large audience present in Bridge St. Church last night, when the "Silver Anniversary" of the founding of the W.M.S. was celebrated. The session, which lasted about two hours, was most interesting throughout, addresses being delivered by Mrs. Ross, the president, and also by those grand old men of the Methodist Church, Doctors Carman and Sutherland.

The proceedings opened with devotional exercises, conducted by Rev. Messrs. Wilson and Leitch. The latter gentleman's opening prayer was very earnest and appropriate.

Some excellent musical numbers were rendered. The choir sang an anthem, "The Heavens Declare;" there was a tuneful quartette, "The Old, Old Story is True," by Mrs. Allen, Miss Gertrude Price, Messrs. Vermilyea and Burns, and Mrs. Allen, in fine voice, gave a highly sympathetic and beautiful rendition of "By the Waters of Babylon."

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The president, Mrs. Ross, in her annual address, gave an interesting account of the early history of the society, which, she said, was now written in many languages. They had tried to live up to the words of their motto, "The Love of Christ Constraineth Us." The work in Japan was graphically described. It had, in the 25 years, grown wonderfully, and the ladies felt that, owing to the fervent prayers of their members, it was linked to the very throne of God. In Japan they had boarding schools, orphanages, industrial schools, and, latterly, medical workers. The society had raised $903,975 since it started, and now numbered 42,821 members. The speaker referred to the General Conference lately held in Montreal, and said the ladies of the Methodist church were greatly interested in it. One lady she knew had taken six newspapers which contained the conference reports, and read them all. The president rather archly turned to Dr. Carman and asked: "Don't you think, Doctor, she will make a good delegate?"

"When she gets the chance," came the Doctor's reply.

In conclusion, Mrs. Ross urged that there was still a vast amount of work for the society to do in Japan, and this was no time to think of withdrawing their support. They needed medical workers and trained teachers for China. They must continue to pray and work and try to live up to their motto, "The Love of Christ Constraineth Us."

REV. DR. SUTHERLAND.

Rev. Dr. Sutherland said he was immensely proud of the W.M.S. of the Methodist church. He had seen it grow from small beginnings, and it was now accomplishing a great work. He congratulated the W.M.S. on the attainment of its silver anniversary, hoped they would celebrate their golden anniversary in Bridge St. Church and hoped he'd be there to take part in it. Dr. Sutherland's address was full of trenchant truths, expressed with deep earnestness and fire. Here are a few of his epigrams:

Twenty-five years ago missionary ideas were small. Then churches thought and planned in parishes; to-day they are planning in empires and kingdoms.

The searchlight of criticism is very strong to-day. Some people doubted the wisdom of the missionary movement. We must not lose sight of this criticism and this doubt. We must remember this: Christ and Christianity are on trial in heathen lands to-day.

If we believe in Jesus Christ we must believe in foreign missions.

If the gospel of Jesus Christ could not save a Chinaman it could not save a man or woman in Belleville.

The scenes and incidents depicted in the Acts of the Apostles were being reacted in China, and you meet the characters drawn in the Acts in every street in Western China to-day. There were doubters and scoffers and unbelievers, and there were staunch converts, too, just as there were when the Apostles walked the earth. There were plenty of evidences that the gospel of Jesus Christ is as strong to save to-day as it was 1800 years ago. It was late in the day for people to ask us if we believe in foreign missions.

The speaker paid a high compliment to the work being done in Japan by the W. M. S., and said Buddhism was losing its hold in that country.

The Christianizing of the world, he said, was not going to be accomplished by any sudden rush. It will require the devotion of many a life-time, but the outlook to-day was brighter and more cheering than ever before. The world everywhere was open to the gospel of Jesus Christ. The church is on the rising tide of a mighty faith, and the signs of the times show that the living Christ is in the van of the mighty host which is doing His work and bringing nearer the day when the battle will be won.

REV. DR. CARMAN.

The venerable superintendent of the Methodist Church spoke in a reminiscent vein. This was their silver jubilee. Well, it was his golden jubilee in Belleville. (Applause). Belleville gave him his wife and children, and also gave him the grandest opportunity of his life when he entered Albert College.

There was very hearty applause here from the students of Albert, who were present in goodly numbers.

Dr. Carman spoke of Bridge St. Church as one of the historic churches of Methodism. He vividly recalled the great debate held there, in which the question of Methodist union was settled, and told in graphic words, of the scenes as he remembered them. In a characteristic way the speaker told of the history of Methodism in this country, and said the church owed much to the men of other days. He admired those old heroes, just as he admired the heroes of the Old Testament, and he believed in the heroes of the Old Testament as much as he did in the heroes of the New Testament, and had little respect for those who would separate them. Speaking of the soaring aims of some young people to-day, the Rev. Dr. told of being, not long ago, at a Christian Endeavor convention in Brockville, where some young speakers were using rather inflated language, which did not reflect very favorably on the old-timers. He said to them: "Not so fast, my dear young friends. Why should not you young people of to-day go ahead and do things, when we old-timers brought you the railroads and telegraphs and fast postal services and all the modern improvements?" If they did not go ahead under such conditions, he would organize an army of the poorest old women he could find and outstrip the young people of to-day. (Laughter and applause.) The speaker then read letters he had received from Japan, which highly praised the work of the W. M. S. in that country, and also a resolution adopted by the late General Conference warmly commending the ladies and their work. The speaker gave the ladies a little advice and said he hoped the W.M.S. and the other missionary interests of the Methodist church would work together in harmony.

Before closing, the President thanked the choir and organist of Bridge St. church for their assistance and the meeting closed with the benediction, pronounced by Rev. Dr. Carman.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

The following resolution was passed:

Moved by Mrs. Gordon Wright, seconded by Mrs. Strachan, and carried, "That the Board of Managers of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist church, Canada, places on record its unqualified appreciation of the action of the British Parliament at its recent session, in expressing in strong terms, its regret and disapproval of Great Britain in connection with the India-China opium traffic. Further, resolved, that we express the hope that immediate steps will be taken to forever remove this stain which has so long tarnished the fair name of our beloved motherland. Still further resolved, that our secretary be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to England's Premier, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

It was decided to reduce the Board delegation to one to every two thousand members.

It was resolved that nominations be allowed in election of Board officers.

It was decided that, in future, the Board meeting be held the first or second week in Oct., preferably the first.

Mrs. Gordon Wright, on behalf of the Y's of Belleville of the W.C.T.U., presented to Mrs. Ross a bouquet of chrysanthemums. Mrs. Ross suitable responded on behalf of the Board.

Reports of the fields were continued by Mrs. Strachan. Additional workers were asked for. It was decided to engage the services of Miss Chan, a Chinese teacher.

A memorial was presented, asking for a Boarding School for Japanese women and children, to be established in Vancouver.

A request for an additional nurse to assist in Dr. Large's hospital at Bella Bella was received. It was left for decision to the Finance Committee.

THURSDAY MORNING.

The devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Beal, of the London Branch. Mrs. McAllister, of the same branch, giving a most inspiring Bible reading on the life of Barnabas.

Routine business occupied the time of the morning session.

Mrs. Carman moved that the constitution of auxiliaries be changed to include the superintendent of Associate helpers, and of the Cradle Roll.

Mrs. Gordon Wright, moved a resolution of appreciation to Rev. Dr. Carman and Dr. Sutherland for their inspiring addresses.

This resolution was carried with enthusiasm.

Reports of fields was again continued by Mrs. Strachan.

The Indian work was taken up. The Crosby Girls' Home required painting and the matter was referred to the Finance Committee.

The work at Kitamaat had been seriously interfered with, on account of the burning of the Home, and a new building must be erected. It was stated that one of the missionaries had lost all her possessions in the fire. It was left to the Finance Committee to deal with the matter.

A memorial to the General Board was presented, asking their cooperation in providing a Home and School for the boys at Kitamaat. The Indians had offered a site. The W.M.S. offered to manage the two homes, one for boys and one for girls.

FREAKS OF GOLF BALLS.

Have Killed Birds on the Wing and Caused a Sheep to Drop Dead.

It does not often happen that a bird falls a victim to a golf ball in its flight, although such a mishap has occurred in two or three instances, says London Tit-Bits.

Not long ago an incident of this kind was reported from Raynes Park Golf Club. It took place in the course of a bogie competition. One of the players, a Mr. Crocker, having driven off at the seventh tee, his ball created some astonishment by coming in contact with a lark in midair and literally knocking off its head.

A similar incident happened last season but one on the ground of the Birkdale Club. Two members were playing a round when one of them made a brassie shot. The ball was in full flight when a bird of the wagtail species was seen crossing the line of flight, and the next moment both objects came into collision at a distance of about forty paces from the striker.

The consequences were fatal to the unfortunate bird, which was not only killed, but decapitated. As for the golf ball, its flight was stopped by the impact, the ball falling to the ground within a few yards of its slaughtered victim. The incident had the further object of losing the player the match, he having to make an extra stroke or two to cover the distance short covered, thus costing him the game.

A still more extraordinary freak of a golf ball resulted in a tragedy on the Balcomie links in Scotland. In the course of a match one of the players, in his drive from the sixth tee, put so much vigor into it that the ball struck a sheep on the head with such force as to cause it to fall dead on the spot.

A very different, but no less interesting, story was reported from another links in Scotland about the same time. In a foursome match, played at North Berwick, one of the golfers drove his ball against a wall. It rebounded into some rough grass and for a few minutes could not be traced, but ultimately the caddie found the ball lying in a lark's nest, in which were four eggs all unbroken. For a ball to drop into a nest of eggs without breaking any was surely an extraordinary occurrence.

It is not long since a player at Woking in approaching the hole landed a ball on the top of the clubhouse. This little incident did not, however, upset his equilibrium very much. As nimbly as he could he followed the ball to the roof and from that coign of disadvantage played it so well that he was successful in securing a half of a hole which everybody considered irretrievably lost.

A similar scene was once witnessed on the St. Andrews links in the course of a three ball match. One of the players happened to drive his ball on the corrugated iron roof of a shed and, in the belief that he had consequently given up the hole, the other two calmly proceeded with the match. But they had reckoned without their host, for the next moment there was a great clatter of feet on the iron roof. Barely had the warning cry of "fore" reached the players' ears when a ball whizzed on to the course close by. It was that of the other player, who had mounted to the roof and played it from that unexpected corner.

KITCHEN OF KING EDWARD.

Head Chef Is Frenchman Who Looks After Details For Royal Table.

Preparing King Edward's meals is an elaborate business, but like everything else connected with the royal household it is worked on a carefully devised system. The under chefs, superintended by the royal chef, a Frenchman by the way, are all clad in spotless linen, they work by the clock, and each dish is commenced and finished to within a minute of the appointed time. The head chef simply walks about thinking out the final details of the masterpiece for the table, which he takes particularly under his own care.

Just outside the dining hall at Buckingham Palace there is an apartment containing a hot table where the dishes are put preparatory to being placed on the royal table. Relays of men and women convey the delicacies from the kitchen to this room, where they are taken charge of by another servant in immaculate evening dress and white gloves. The passages from the kitchen are long, with awkward corners here and there, and in order to prevent collisions there are ingenious arrangements of mirrors at each turning which enable the servants to see whether the road is clear.

Attendants are strictly forbidden to enter any other apartment than that with which they are immediately concerned, and even the dish bearers are prohibited from passing down other corridors than those which are set apart for their special use.

NO HOPE FOR HIM.

(Chicago News.)

His face is seamed with lines of care,
  Despair and agitation;
His knitted, clouded brow is wet
  With beads of perspiration.
What dreadful curse hangs o'er his head,
  Like sword to fall and smite him?
Or has his conscience serpent fangs
  To sorely sting and bite him?

Or, no; with friends he cracked some jokes
  When all were feeling mellow,
And they convinced him that he was
  A bright and sparkling fellow.
They captured in his moments weak,
  This rash, vainglorious sinner,
And he consented with a speech
  To grace a public dinner.

Where is his inspiration gone?
  His mind now gropes and wanders,
And now and then he mutters low
  And bites his lips and ponders.
He turns his stock of stories o'er
  And finds his memory murky
He's stuffed as full of chestnuts as
  A roast Thanksgiving turkey.

So he'll break down — he knows he will,
  Supreme of all disgraces!
He shudders as he thinks he sees
  The rows of listening faces.
So, as the fatal hour draws nigh,
  He paler grows and thinner,
And gloomier than a funeral feast,
  Appears that dreaded dinner.

Statisticians and timid ladies alike have long recognized the Bank as the busiest spot in London for vehicular traffic. It is surprising to find from a County Council return that it only just beats the Marble Arch. In one day 22,481 vehicles passed the Bank, and the Marble Arch record was only ten fewer. Knightsbridge, east of Sloane St., was a bad third with 18,762.

An automobile bridge, the first of its kind so far as is known, has been erected by the Roswell-Torrance Mail and Passenger State Line in New Mexico, to span the Macho, a creek on the route. The bridge is so constructed as to prevent the passage of cattle, and is built without supports in the bed of the stream because of the heavy freshets. There is no floor so that cattle can get no footing, and the automobiles cross on low-railed tracks on either side. The bridge has a total length of 64 feet. After becoming accustomed to the peculiar bridge the drivers of the cars found it an easy matter to cross at full speed, to the consternation of nervous passengers.

THE ONTARIO BANK.

Curator Stavert Calls Meeting of Shareholders For Dec. 11.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—W. E. Stavert, the curator in charge of the Ontario Bank, last evening announced that the curator and the board of advisors had decided to call a meeting of the shareholders on Dec. 11.

The board of directors of the Ontario Bank held a meeting yesterday and placed their resignations before the bank for acceptance. They will be acted upon at the meeting of the shareholders.

It is the understanding of many that the Ontario Bank has ceased to be a corporation, but it was stated that the Ontario Bank is still in existence, and that the resignation of the present board of directors necessitates the election of a new board. The Bank of Montreal has merely taken over certain assets and liabilities of the bank and has not absorbed it.

The preliminary enquiry into the ways and means by which the Ontario Bank was put to the bad will commence in police court to-morrow, when Charles McGill, who was general manager, and G. R. R. Cockburn, president, will appear.

- - The - - Crimson Blind

BY FRED M. WHITE

Author of "Tregarthen's Wife," "The Robe of Lucifer," Etc.

Copyright, 1906, by R. F. Fenno & Company.

She stood for a long time there perfectly motionless. It was a still night outside, and there was nothing to account for the rustling of the ivy leaves. The rattling came in jerks, spasmodically, stopping every now and then and resuming again. It was no longer a matter of imagination, it was a certainty. Somebody was climbing up the ivy to the window.

Leaning eagerly forward, Christabel could hear the sound of labored breathing. She seemed to see the outline of an arm outside, she could catch the quick rattle of the sash, she could almost see a bent wire crooked through the beaded edges of the casement. Yes, she was right. The window swung noiselessly back and a figure stood poised on the ledge outside.

With a quick breath and a fluttering of her heart Christabel felt for the switch.

"It will be all right," she murmured; "the other one will fancy that the light is necessary. Courage, my dear, courage, and the game is yours. Ah!"

The intruder dropped inside and pulled the window behind him. Evidently he was on familiar ground, though he seemed to be seeking an unfamiliar object. Christabel's hand stole along to the switch; there was a click, and the alcove was bathed in brilliant light. The intruder shrank back with a startled cry. He rubbed his dazed eyes.

"Why not come in through the front door, Mr. Littimer?" Christabel drawled, coolly.

Frank Littimer had no words for a moment. He was wondering who this woman was and what she was doing here. American, evidently, by her accent, and also by the revolver that she handled so assuredly.

"That is the way you used to enter," Christabel proceeded, "when you had been out contrary to parental instructions and the keepers expected to have a fracas with the poachers. Your bedroom being exactly opposite, detection was no easy matter. Your bedroom has never been touched since you left. The key is still outside the door. Will you kindly enter it?"

"But——" Frank stammered. "But I assure you that I cannot——"

"Take the Rembrandt away. You cannot. The frame is of iron, and it is fastened to the wall. It would take an experienced carpenter quite a long time to remove it. Therefore your mission has failed. It is very annoying, because it puts the other man in a very awkward position. The position is going to be still more awkward presently. Please go to your room."

"My dear lady, if my father knows that I am in the house——"

"He is not going to know that you are in the house, at least not for some little time. And when you see him it will be better not to say more than is necessary. Later on you will recognize what a friend I am to you."

"You are not showing it at present," Littimer said, desperately.

"The patient rarely sees any virtue in his medicine. Now, please, go to your room. I can hear the other man muttering and getting anxious down below. Now, if you approach that window again I am pretty certain that my revolver will go off. You see, I am an American, and we are so careless with such weapons. Please go to to your room at once."

"And if I refuse your ridiculous request?"

"You will not find my request in the least ridiculous. If you refuse I shall hold you up with my weapon and alarm the whole house. But I don't want to do that, for the sake of the other man. He is so very respectable, you know, and anything unconventional may be so awkward for him. Yes, it is just as I expected. He is coming up the ivy to investigate himself. Go!"

The revolver covered Littimer quite steadily. He could see into the blue rim, and he was conscious of strange cold sensations down his spine. A revolver is not a pretty thing at the best of times; it is doubly hazardous in the hands of a woman.

"What do you want with me?" he asked.

"My dear man, I want to do nothing with you. Only do as you are told and —there! The other man is coming up the ivy. He can't understand the light and you not returning. He imagines that you are looking in the wrong place. Please go."

Littimer backed before the weapon, backed until he was in the doorway. Suddenly the girl gave him a push, shut the door to, and turned the key in the lock. Almost at the same instant another figure loomed large in the window-frame.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Something bulky was struggling to get through the window. Half hidden in the shadow, Christabel watched with the deepest interest. If she had been afraid at first that sensation had entirely departed by this time. From the expression of her face she might have been enjoying the novel situation. It was certainly not without a suggestion of the farcical.

The burly figure contrived to squeeze through the narrow casement at length and stood breathing loudly in the corridor. It was not a pleasant sight that met Christabel's gaze—a big man with a white, set face and rolling eyes and a stiff bandage about his throat. Evidently the intruder was utterly exhausted, for he dropped into a chair and nursed his head between his hands.

"Now what has become of that fool?" he muttered. "Ah!"

He looked round him uneasily, but his expression changed as his eyes fell on the Rembrandt. He had the furtive look of a starving man who picks up a purse whilst the owner is still in sight. He staggered towards the picture and endeavored to take it gently from the support. He tried again and again, and then in a paroxysm of rage he tore at the frame-work.

"I guess that it can't be done," Christabel said, drawlingly. "See, stranger?"

Reginald Henson fairly gasped. As he turned round the ludicrous mixture of cunning and confusion, anger and vexatious alarm on his face caused the girl to smile.

"I—I beg your pardon," he stammered.

"I said it can't be done," the girl drawled, coolly. "Sandow couldn't do it. The frame is made of iron and it is fixed to the wall by four long stays. It's a neat job, though I say it myself; I persuaded Lord Littimer to have it done. And when I heard you two prowling about down there I was glad. I've got the other one safe."

"Oh, you've got the other one safe?" Henson said, blankly.

He would have liked to have burst out into a torrent of passion, only he recognized his position. The thing was shamefully funny. It was anything but nice for a man of his distinguished position to be detected in an act suspiciously like vulgar burglary. Still, there must be some plausible way out of the difficulty if he could only think of it. Only this girl with the quaint, pretty face and spectacles did not look in the least like a fool. He would have to try what blandishments would do.

"Are you aware who I am?" he asked, blandly.

"What does it matter? I've got the other one, and no doubt he will be identified by the police. If he doesn't say too much he may get off with a light sentence. It is quite easy to see that you are the greater scoundrel of the two."

"My dear young lady, do you actually take me for a burglar?"

There was a note of deep pain in Henson's voice. He had dropped into a chair again, with a feeling of utter weakness upon him. The girl's resolute mien and the familiar way in which she handled her revolver filled him with the deepest apprehension.

"I am a very old friend and relative of Lord Littimer's," he said.

"Oh, indeed. And is the other man a relative of Lord Littimer's also?"

"Oh, why, confound it, yes. The other man, as you call him, is Lord Littimer's only son."

Christabel glanced at Henson, not without admiration.

"Well, you are certainly a cool hand," she said. "You are two clever thieves who have come here for the express purpose of robbing Lord Littimer of one of his art treasures. I happen to catch one, and he immediately becomes the son of the owner of the place. I am so fortunate as to bag the other bird, and he resolves himself into a relative of my host's. And you really expect me to believe a Hans Andersen fairy story like that!"

"I admit that appearances are against me," Henson said, humbly. "But I am speaking the truth."

"Oh, indeed. Then why didn't you come in through the front door? The violent exercise you were taking just now must be dangerous to a man of your build!"

"I am afraid I shall have to make a clean breast of it," Henson said, with what he fondly imagined to be an engaging smile. "You may, perhaps, be aware that yonder Rembrandt has a history. It was stolen from its present owner once, and I have always said that it will be stolen again. Many a time have I urged Lord Littimer to make it secure."

"How grateful you should be to me for having done so!"

"Ah, you are cynical still, which is a bad thing for one so young and—er—charming. I came down here to see my very noble relative, and his son accompanied me. I came to try and make peace between father and son. But that is a family matter which, forgive me, I cannot discuss with a stranger. Our train was late, or we should have been here long ago. On reaching the castle it struck me as a good idea to give Lord Littimer a lesson as to his carelessness. My idea was to climb through the window, abstract the Rembrandt, and slip quietly into my usual bedroom here. Then in the morning, after the picture had been missed, I was going to tell the whole story. That is why Mr. Littimer entered this way and why I followed when I found that he had failed to return. It was a foolish thing to do, and the denouement has been most humiliating. I assure you that is all."

"Not quite," Christabel drawled. "There is something else."

"And what may that be, my dear young lady?"

"To tell your story to Lord Littimer before you sleep. That kind of romance may do for Great Britain, but it wouldn't make good family reading in the States."

"But, my dear young lady, I beg of you, implore you—"

"Come off the grass! I'm to let you go quietly to bed and retire myself, so that when morning arrives you will be missing together with as much plunder as you can carry away. No, sir."

Henson advanced angrily. His prudence had gone for the time. As he came down upon Christabel she raised her revolver and fired two shots in quick succession over Henson's shoulder. The noise went echoing and reverberating along the corridor like a crackling of thunder. A door came open with a click, then a voice demanded to know what was wrong.

"Now I guess the fat is in the fire," Christabel said.

Henson dropped into a chair and groaned. Lord Littimer, elegantly attired in a suit of silk pyjamas and carrying a revolver in his hand, came coolly down the corridor. A curious servant or two would have followed, but he waved them back crisply.

"Miss Lee," he said, with a faint, sarcastic emphasis, "and my dear friend and relative, Reginald Henson —Reginald, the future owner of Littimer Castle!"

"So he told me, but I wouldn't believe him," said Christabel.

"It is a cynical age," Littimer remarked. "Reginald, what does this mean?"

Henson shook his head uneasily.

"The young lady persisted in taking me for a burglar," he groaned.

"And why not?" Christabel demanded. "I was just going to bed when I heard voices in the forecourt below and footsteps creeping along. I came into the corridor with my revolver. Presently one of the men climbed up the ivy and got into the corridor. I covered him with my revolver and fairly drove him into a bedroom and locked him in."

"So you killed with both barrels?" Littimer cried, with infinite enjoyment.

"Then the other one came. He came to steal the Rembrandt."

"Nothing of the kind," the wretched Henson cried. "I came to give you a lesson, Lord Littimer. My idea was to get in through the window, steal the Rembrandt, and, when you had missed it, confess the whole story. My character is safe."

"Giddy," Littimer said, reproachfully. "You are so young, so boyish, so buoyant, Reginald. What would your future constituents have said had they seen you creeping up the ivy? They are a grave people who take themselves seriously. Egad, this would be a lovely story for one of those prying society papers. 'The Philanthropist and the Picture.' I've a good mind to send it to the Press myself."

Littimer sat down and laughed with pure enjoyment.

"And where is the other partridge?" he asked, presently.

Christabel seemed to hesitate for a moment, her sense of humor of the situation had departed. Her hand shook as she turned the key in the door.

"I am afraid you are going to have an unpleasant surprise," Henson said.

Littimer glanced keenly at the speaker. All the laughter died out of his eyes; his face grew set and stern as Frank Littimer emerged into the light.

"And what are you doing here?" he asked, hoarsely. "What do you expect to gain by taking part in a fool's trick like this? Did I not tell you never to show your face here again?"

The young man said nothing. He stood there looking down, dogged, quiet, like one tongue-tied. Littimer thundered out his question again. He crossed over, laying his hands on his son's shoulders and shaking him as a terrier might shake a rat.

"Did you come for anything?" he demanded. "Did you expect any mercy from——"

Frank Littimer shook off his grasp gently. He looked up for the first time.

"I expected nothing," he said. "I—I did not come of my own free will. I am silent now for the sake of myself and others. But the time may come—God knows it has been long delayed. For the present, I am bound in honor to hold my tongue."

He flashed one little glance at Henson, a long, angry glance. Littimer looked from one to the other in hesitation for a moment. The hard lines between his brows softened.

"Perhaps I am wrong," he muttered. "Perhaps there has been a mistake somewhere. And if ever I find out I have——pshaw, I am talking like a sentimental schoolgirl. Have I not had evidence strong as proof of Holy Writ that . . . Get out of my sight, your presence angers me. Go, and never let me see you again. Reginald, you were a fool to bring that boy here to-night. See him off the premises and fasten the door again."

"Surely," Christabel interfered, "surely at this time of the night——"

"You should be in bed," Littimer said, tartly. "My dear young lady, if you and I are to remain friends I must ask you to mind your own business. It is a dreadfully difficult thing for a woman to do, but you must try. You understand?"

Christabel was evidently putting a strong constraint on her tongue, for she merely bowed and said nothing. She had her own good reasons for the diplomacy of silence. Henson and Frank Littimer were disappearing in the direction of the staircase.

"I say nothing," Christabel said. "But at the same time I don't fancy I shall care very much for your distinguished friend Reginald Henson."

Littimer smiled. All his good humor seemed to have returned to him. Only the dark lines under his eyes were more accentuated.

"A slimy, fawning hound," he whispered. "A mean fellow. And the best of it is that he imagines that I hold the highest regard for him. Good-night."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A little later, and Christabel sat before her looking-glass with her lovely hair about her shoulders. The glasses were gone and her magnificent eyes gleamed and sparkled.

"Good night's work," she said to her smiling reflection. "Now the danger is passed and now that I am away from that dreadful house I feel a different being. Strange what a difference a few hours has made! And I hardly need my disguise—even at this moment I believe that Enid would not recognize me. She will be pleased to know that her telegram came in so usefully. Well, here I am, and I don't fancy that anybody will recognize Christabel Lee and Chris Henson for one and the same person."

She sat there brushing her hair and letting her thoughts drift along idly over the events of the evening. Reginald Henson would have felt less easy in his mind had he known what these thoughts were. Up to now that oily scoundrel hugged himself with the delusion that nobody besides Frank Littimer and himself knew that the second copy of "The Crimson Blind" had passed into Bell's possession.

But Chris was quite aware of the fact. And Chris as Chris was supposed by Henson to be dead and buried, and was, therefore, in a position to play her cards as she pleased. Up to now it seemed to her that she had played them very well indeed. A cipher telegram from Longdean had warned her that Henson was coming there, had given her more than a passing hint what Henson required, and her native wit had told her why Henson was after the Rembrandt.

Precisely why he wanted the picture she had not discovered yet. But she knew that she would before long. And she knew also that Henson would try and obtain the print without making his presence at Littimer Castle obvious. He was bringing Frank Littimer with him, and was therefore going to use the younger man in some cunning way.

That Henson would try and get into the castle surreptitiously Chris had felt from the first. Once he did so the rest would be easy, as he knew exactly where to lay his hand on the picture. Therefore he could have no better time than the dead of night. If his presence were betrayed he could turn the matter aside as a joke and trust to his native wit later on. If he had obtained the picture by stealth he would have discreetly disappeared, covering his tracks as he retreated.

Still, it had all fallen out very fortunately. Henson had been made to look ridiculous; he had been forced to admit that he was giving Littimer a lesson over the Rembrandt, and though the thing appeared innocent enough on the surface, Chris was sanguine that later on she could bring this up in evidence against him.

"So far so good," she told herself. "Watch, watch, watch, and act when the time comes. But it was hard to meet Frank to-night and be able to say nothing. And how abjectly miserable he looked! Well, let us hope that the good time is coming."

Chris was up betimes in the morning and out on the terrace. She felt no further uneasiness on the score of the disguise now. Henson was certain to be inquisitive, it was part of his nature, but he was not going to learn anything. Chris smiled as she saw Henson lumbering towards her. He seemed all the better for his night's rest.

"The rose blooms early here," he said, gallantly. "Let me express the hope that you have quite forgiven me for the fright I gave you last night."

"I guess I don't recollect the fright," Chris drawled. "And if there was any fright I calculate it was on the other side. And how are you this morning? You look as if you had been in the wars. Got some trouble with your throat, or what?"

"A slight operation," Henson said, airily. "I have been speaking too much in public lately and a little something had to be removed. I am much better."

The ready lie tripped off his tongue. Chris smiled slightly.

"Do you know, you remind me very much of somebody," he went on. "And yet I don't know why, because you are quite different. Lord Littimer tells me you are an American."

"The Stars and Stripes," Chris laughed. "I guess our nation is the first on earth. Now, if you happen to know anything about Boston——"

"I never was in Boston in my life," Henson replied, hastily. The name seemed to render him uneasy. "Have you been in England very long?"

Chris replied that she was enjoying England for the first time. But she was not there to answer questions, her role was to ask them. But she was dealing with a past-master in the art of gleaning information, and Henson was getting on her nerves. She gave a little cry of pleasure as a magnificent specimen of a bloodhound came trotting down the terrace and paused in friendly fashion before her.

"What a lovely dog," she exclaimed. "Do you like dogs, Mr. Henson?"

She looked up beamingly into his face as she spoke; she saw the heavy features darken and the eyes grow small with anger.

"I loathe them, and they loathe me," Henson growled. "Look at him!"

He pointed to the dog, who showed his teeth with an angry growl. And yet the great sleek head lay against the girl's knee in perfect confidence. Henson looked on uneasily and backed a little way. The dog marked his every movement.

"See how the brute shows his teeth at me," he said. "Please send him away, Miss Lee. I am certain he is getting ready for a spring."

Henson's face was white and hot and wet, his lips trembled. He was horribly afraid. Chris patted the silky head and dismissed the dog with a curt command. He went off instantly with a wistful, backward look in his eye.

"We are going to be great friends, that doggie and I," Chris said, gaily. "And I don't like you any the better, Mr. Henson, because you don't like dogs and they don't like you. Dogs are far better judges of character than you imagine. Dr. Bell says——"

"What Dr. Bell?" Henson demanded swiftly.

Chris had paused just in time; perhaps her successful disguise had made her a trifle reckless.

It does do good baking

This is the range that bakes better because the diffusive oven flue draws in cold air from the kitchen-floor, carries it around the oven, and pours it HOT down into the oven FROM THE TOP in a current that moves all round the whole oven and up and out the flue. When that clean, hot air leaves the oven it takes with it all the moisture, all the odors, which in OTHER ovens stay in and saturate the baking food. Perfect draft control, perfect oven, draw-out oven rack for easy basting,—all points singular to

BRITAIN'S POST OFFICE

ANNUAL BLUE BOOK PROVIDES SOME ASTOUNDING READING.

Imperial Penny Postage Now Extended to Practically the Whole Empire—Over Three and a Half Millions of Dollars In Letters Misdirected Contained Money In Various Forms—£42,300,617 Were Expended For Postal Orders.

The Postmaster-General's annual report, just issued in the form of a bluebook, provides some interesting and astounding reading.

In a few preliminary remarks Mr. Sydney Buxton desires to point out that imperial penny postage has now been extended, so far as outward letters are concerned, to the whole of the Empire, with the exception of one or two small islands, and also to Egypt and the Soudan.

And then the report, which deals with the year ended March 31, 1906, plunges into its labyrinth of facts and figures.

It is estimated that the number of postal packets delivered in the United Kingdom during the year 1905-6 was 4,686,200,000, of which 2,707,200,000 were letters. The whole total gives an average of 108.2 packets to each person for the year, says Lloyd's.

The increase in the number of letters shows an advance of 1 per cent. on that of last year. It is also interesting to note that the letters delivered in London show an increase of 3.6 per cent., instead of a decrease, as in the past two years. Strangely enough, the increase in the number of postcards is much smaller than in recent years.

The number of letters registered in the United Kingdom was 18,634,333, an increase of 7 per cent., and the number of express services was 1,578,746, as compared with 1,403,053 last year.

Cash Waiting Owners.

The number of undelivered packets handled during the year was 27,099,174, an increase of 530,434, or 2 per cent. The number of registered letters and other letters containing property with insufficient addresses was 320,041. These letters contained £16,887 in cash and banknotes, and £656,845 in bills, cheques, money orders, postal orders, and stamps.

The number of letters with valuable contents posted with no address at all was 4,599, the contents including £200 in cash. One unaddressed letter contained cheques to the value of £2,500.

Altogether, the number of insufficiently addressed letters with valuable contents shows an increase of 4,000 on the previous year, and, adds the Postmaster-General, "the value of the property thus entrusted to the postoffice by a careless public has increased by no less than £33,000." There has also been a slight increase in the number of articles found loose in the post, which included £1,380 in cash.

Postal Orders.

The number of postal orders issued during the year was 97,271,000, representing an amount of £38,770,000, an increase of 6.6 per cent. in number, and 5.7 per cent. in amount. The produce of the commission on the orders issued was £423,862, and the value of the postage stamps affixed was £215,000. The Postmaster-General incidentally adds that during the 25 years since the introduction of postal orders the sale has increased from 4 1-2 millions to nearly 100 millions per annum.

Savings Bank.

During the year ended Dec. 31, 1905, there were 16,320,204 deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank, with a total of £42,300,617, against 7,155,283 withdrawals, with a total of £42,036,037. The total amount of the deposits shows an increase of nearly £1,700,000. The net increase of accounts opened over accounts closed was 289,332. The number of depositors in the United Kingdom was 9,963,049, with a total amount to their names of £152,111,140, which leaves an average amount of £15 to each person.

Telegraphy.

During the year 89,478,000 telegrams passed over the postoffice wires—an increase of .57 per cent. The decrease in press telegrams is striking—presumably owing to the termination of the Japanese war. But in January, owing to the general election, the excess over the number in January, 1905, was no less than 133,500. Although the number of telegrams have increased, there is a decrease of £30,691 in the receipts. Foreign telegrams, however, show an increase of £19,683 in the receipts.

Telephony.

The total number of conversations over the trunk telephone wires was 17,974,000, an increase of 16.2 per cent. The gross revenue derived from the trunk service was £419,004, as compared with £381,367 in 1904-5. The number of telephones in connection with the postoffice London telephone system increased during the year from 24,351 to 32,879.

The number of persons on the establishment of the postoffice at the close of the year under review was 86,078, of whom 12,055 were women. In addition there were 109,354 persons filling unestablished situations, of whom 29,026 were women. The number of persons dismissed during the year was 831. Dishonesty accounts for 26 per cent., and intemperance for 24 per cent. of the dismissals. The number of women who retired "on marriage" in 1905 was 243, with an average age of 28, and an average service of nine years.

Finance.

The final chapter deals with the finances of the postoffice. The postal revenue of the year was £17,064,023, an increase of £789,046 on the previous year. The net profit was £5,268,914, or £440,215 more than last year. But the net deficit on telegraphs was £764,707, which, however, was £164,729 less than last year; and, altogether, including the interest on the capital expended on the purchase of the telegraphs, the net profit approximately from the postal and telegraph services was £4,235,724, or £604,947 more than last year.

A LION STORY.

Tragic Experience With One of the African Man Eaters by Ryall, an English Engineer.

"Many years ago," says a writer, "before the arrival of the railway and the sportsman in east Africa, the natives were decimated by lions. It was impossible in some districts to procure mail carriers. Appalling stories are still related of the fearless ferocity of these beast. The railway was building at Kiu. Several coolies had been carried off by an old lion, and one night Ryall, an English engineer who had seen much service in India, decided to sit up in a railway carriage on the chance of getting a shot. With him were Mr. Huebner, the German consul, and an Italian, Parenti. The night was dark, with but little moon, and after midnight Ryall commented upon the brightness of the fireflies near the carriage and also remarked that he had seen a rat repeatedly cross and recross a spot where the steel rail glinted in the moonlight.

"But the supposed fireflies were the luminous eyes of the lion they waited for, and the rat was the slow movement of his tail. If Ryall had recognized this, his life would have been saved. Tired of their vigil toward the morning, the three watchers went to sleep, Huebner on the upper berth, the two others below. The carriage was the ordinary sleeping carriage familiar to Indian travelers, with a lavatory beyond the couches. An hour had passed, the party was asleep, when the lion jumped into the carriage and seized Ryall, while in a moment Parenti had slipped into the lavatory and closed the door.

"The movements of the lion, or more probably, his weight thrown on one side, caused the door by which he had entered the car to close. Thus Huebner's experience was most terrible. The rifles were below, and on the upper berth he remained while the lion killed Mr. Ryall within three feet of him. After a few awful minutes the great beast jumped out through the window with Ryall's body in its mouth."

RIVALS THE MIKADO.

King Edward VII. Has a Well-Nigh Tri-Millennial Ancestry.

It doubtless will be news to many that Edward VII is the one king in all the world who unites in his person the oldest royal dignity in Europe with the oldest blood royal—and both Irish. For he is genealogically and indisputably the direct descendant and supreme representative of the high kings of ancient Ireland. The history of Ireland goes back to Coneirle Mor, or Conairy the Great, who 600 years before Christ ruled as high king over the clans of the Gaels of Ireland at Tara. From this Conairy the Great, the historic ancestor of the Hy Niais, to King Connor Mac Nessa, who was the contemporary of the Roman Emperors Tiberius and Augustus; from Connor Mac Nessa to King Nial of the hostages, who reigned in the generation before St. Patrick came to Ireland; from King Nial to King Malcolm Can Mor, who married Princess Margaret, sister of the Saxon king Edgar Atheling; from King Malcolm to the heroic King Bruce of Scotland; and from thence, through the Stuarts, the house of Hanover and that of Coburg, to Edward VII., the descent is as direct and as incontrovertible as any descent in ancient or modern history, says the Marquise de Fontenoy.

Of course, there are other people, some of them great Irish nobles, and others, mere commoners, besides hundreds of persons who can show descent from the ancient kings of Ireland. But all have quitted the royal caste, which King Edward is alone to retain. For all those who wish to have fuller particulars of this Irish ancestry of King Edward, I would refer to the works of the late Sir Bernard Burke, Ulster king at arms, to other eminent genealogists, and last, but not least, to that trusted associate of Parnell and former Nationalist member of Parliament, Frank Hugh O'Donnell, a recognized authority on Irish history.

This Irish ancestry of King Edward invests his dynasty with an antiquity superior to that of any reigning house of Europe. Indeed, it is necessary to seek the records of such offspring of the gods as the Mikado of Japan for a genealogy to rival the well-nigh tri-millennial ancestry of Edward VII., heir of Wettin, heir of Guelph, heir of Stuart, heir of Bruce, and heir of Nial—an ancestry which many Irishmen apparently ignore when they refuse to do honor to the present King of Ireland.

The Wedding Cheque.

An absentminded man was complaining of his infirmity when a friend said:

"You are like the old father at the wedding, eh? A young bridegroom, after the wedding was over and the bride's old father had gone off to the club, began to search anxiously among the wedding gifts.

"'What are you looking for, dear?' said the bride.

"'That $2,500 cheque of your father's,' he said anxiously. 'I don't see it anywhere.'

"'Poor papa is so absentminded,' said the bride. 'He lit his cigar with it.'"

The Merry Microbe.

The London Lancet has been warning its readers against the table implements at restaurants, the door handles of public places and vehicles and, above all, the coin of the realm. The merry microbe thrives on these unnutritious substances, it seems, and takes a malevolent delight in imparting all manner of diseases to the unwary. Knowing from experience that The Lancet approves of few things to eat and drink, a contemporary suggests the human race live in balloons and subsist on bananas and sterilized milk.

The London Cabby.

The taximeter system has been introduced in London, and one of the papers there asked a cabby how he liked it. "You see," said the cabman frankly, "most of us likes a bit o' sport. I tike my keb out in a mornin', and I don't know whether I'm going' to mike my yard money or 'ave a quid over for meself. You tike my meanin'? It's like backin' 'osses." All the cabby wants is a sporting chance."

WELSH WEDDINGS.

When One Had to Catch His Bride After Winning Her.

A wedding as it was customarily arranged in Wales some half a century ago was an interesting affair.

In those days, as soon as the young people had made up their own minds, before they could speak of a wedding the consent of the bride's parents had to be obtained. This arrangement, or, rather, consent, was called the Gofyn-y-ferch and could by no means be done by letter, a written document being considered very bad taste.

A good deal of formality surrounded the Gofyn-y-ferch, and it was not to be omitted even when the parents were known to be willing. The accepted lover had many anxieties, and among them, the necessity of which will be seen by and by, was the pace of his best horse and the pace and mettle of his friends' horses.

At last the wedding day dawned. The bride was dressed early, but over her finery she wore a long cloak, buttoned all the way down to the ground, while a hood entirely covered her head and face. In the course of the morning the bridegroom sent some of his friends to seek out the bride. Arrived at her father's house they found the door locked, and before they could be admitted they had to recite some poetry. Sometimes the fair lady's whims and caprices made the delay in unlocking the door very long. When the door was open the bride was still to be found.

She had taken refuge in some obscure corner of the house, where she was crouching out of sight, completely covered with her long cloak. This game of hide and seek was sometimes so prolonged that when the bride was found it was too late to be married that day, but this did not happen often. When the bride was really found, there was a great mounting of horses. She, in her modest cloak, was seated behind her father and all the company set off as fast as their steeds could go, all except the bride's mother, who seldom, if ever, attended her daughter's wedding.

Up hill and down dale, over smooth and rough ground, the mountain ponies galloped, and shame on the bridegroom if he and his friends did not reach the church before the bride. Service over, the bridegroom had still to keep guard over his wife, for in one country parish, if not in many, it was the custom for friends of the young man to wait outside the church until the service was over. When the happy couple appeared, the bride was seized and placed behind one of the men, who galloped off with her.

Naturally she was hotly pursued by the bridegroom, who, of course, after an exciting chase, eventually captured her. When at last the wife was secured she took her seat behind her husband and on his own horse, and the company rode off again to the bride's old home. Arrived at the house, all the party drank the health of bride and bridegroom out of the same pewter.—London Standard.

Unclaimed British Prize Money.

The days when prize money was looked upon in the navy as an ordinary source of income are recalled by a notification from the Admiralty of money waiting to be claimed—the proceeds of bounties for the destruction of pirates and of the sale of slave ships.

There is a sum of £5,000 from the sale of slaving vessels captured in the '60's awaiting claimants, also a goodly amount of naval prize money and £2,500 bounty for the destruction of pirates which nobody applies for. Some of those to whom money is due are, no doubt, still alive, but if they are dead they probably left descendants, who if the names were advertised would be forthcoming to substantiate their claims.

As it is, there is little demand for the money in hand. During twelve months dealt in with the statement issued from Whitehall under £8 has been paid out.—Court Journal.

Beit and Marriage.

Beit, the South African Croesus who died not long ago, was said to be much averse to the marriage of young men in his employ. At one time his secretary asked for a holiday to get married. Mr. Beit replied: "If you get married I shan't want your services any more. You can't serve me as I want to be served and you can't look after your wife as you ought to if you serve me properly. Come in later and let me know what you are going to do." Next day the secretary explained that he had determined to wed. His services were dispensed with then and there, but just before the wedding Mr. Beit sent for him and wished him success and handed him an envelope, not to be opened until after the wedding. It contained a cheque for $5,000 and a note admiring the young man's courage.—London Truth.

To Measure Molecules.

An apparatus for measuring the seventy millionth part of an inch has been made by Dr. P. Shaw of Nottingham University, England, says Technical World Magazine. It works upon the principle of electric touch and consists of a fine micrometer screw and six levers. The apparatus is so sensitive and delicate that it is impossible to manipulate it before an audience. It is hung by rubber bands, covered with thick felt, and must be worked at dead of night, when there is no traffic or factory working. The smallest distance that this mechanism measures is about the distance between a solid and a liquid molecule. Dr. Shaw's invention was first made in 1900, but its great improvement of late has made it the wonder of physicists throughout the world.

The Benefit.

A well-known medical man was attending an old Irish woman who lived in one of the poorer quarters of Edinburgh. She had been ill, but was convalescent, when one day she said to the doctor:

"Will ye tell me, doctor, dear, for certain, whether I'll get well again or no?"

"Oh, yes, I think you'll be all right soon now," was the answer.

"I wanted to know for sure, ye see, doctor, because I'm a lone woman, an' I subscribe to a buryin' society, an' I just wished to know if I was likely to be gettin' any benefit out of it or no."

VESPERS.

The day long have I toiled at oars,
 The river broadened as I went,
And now each herb of evening pours
 Upon the air its inmost scent.

Fast gathered to their mother hill,
 The young plantations drowse and dream,
And down the valley bright and still,
 Like golden satin, shines the stream;

While red behind their bars of elm
 The sunset fires begin to fade,
And tender mists to overwhelm
 The pastures with a silver shade.

Till presently there comes to me,
 For requiem of this good day gone,
The tranquil benedicite
 Of twilight bells from Basildon.

So silken clear, so soft and far,
 It seems the dusk has scarcely stirred,
While o'er the reeds one silver star
 Remains God's last unspoken word.

KING'S INDIAN ORDERLIES.

Curious Impressions Formed of the Mother Country.

The King's four Indian orderly officers, who have spent three very crowded months in England, sailed for India recently.

So impressed have been these fine-looking, black-bearded men with the order of things in the mother country that they admit to a certain feeling of awe when speaking of the great sights they have seen.

Londoners have become accustomed during the season now dead and gone to the spectacle of these impassive Orientals in their uniforms of black, pale blue, and red and gold; but they scarcely realized perhaps what was passing in their minds.

Last season the Indian orderly officers were Gurkhas, the year before Sikhs. The men who sailed recently were Punjaub Mahometans. They have never tasted alcohol, and their meat must be prepared for them by men of their own faith.

They have all seen much active service, and wear several medals and clasps.

The four officers were taken to the Hippodrome, and before their departure they gave, through an interpreter, some of their impressions to an Express representative.

"There is no ruler in the world like our Shanhinsha-i-Hind"—Emperor of India—"and no Empress like our Empress," said one of the turbaned giants. They never speak of the King and Queen. It is always "our Emperor and Empress."

"We have seen much—the great battleships, the arsenal at Woolwich, the Palace of Crystal," said another. "But what can be more wonderful than the order in the street of London? The London policeman has but to raise his arm, and great and small do his bidding."

Infantile Mortality.

It is a caustic commentary upon our methods that after more than twenty years of compulsory education it should be left to private initiative to instruct the young mothers of our citizens in the elementary duties of motherhood. The ignorance of working class mothers in the matter of infantile nutrition is phenomenal, a matter the more to be regretted inasmuch as the breast feeding of babies is becoming progressively less practiced. In this fact, of course, lies the root evil of the whole matter, for dietetical knowledge only becomes necessary (as far as regards the immediate life and death interests of the infant) when breast feeding is abandoned.

What is the cause of the decline in breast-feeding? In the case of the rich it is undoubtedly selfishness on the part of the mother, selfishness and lack of maternal instinct. In the case of the poor it is a combination of adverse circumstances of which the chief are the insufficient nourishment of the mothers and the frequency of married women's employment in factories and the like. This aspect of the problem was trenchantly dealt with by Mr. John Burns in his presidential address to the conference on infantile mortality. Married women's labor, he said, manufactured loafers who might be seen buttressing a beershop or French polishing the outside of a public house; married women's labor was an individual injury, a social mistake, and a commercial blunder. No one who has devoted any time to the study of this subject will hesitate to confirm Mr. Burns' dictum, and it is hoped he will be able, as he desires, to translate his sympathy into action.

In the meanwhile there is an obvious need for some organized effort to instruct young mothers in the vital exigencies of infant feeding. Much has been done in individual districts by means of visitors and sanitary inspectors, but much remains to be done. Mr. Burns truly said that nowhere in the world is young motherhood so isolated as in large cities.

A few of these women seek advice at hospitals, but many more act blindly in the light of their own ignorance, or upon the pernicious advice of others who, though as ignorant themselves, yet gather from their riper age a semblance of authority for vicious doctrines.—London Hospital.

Freak of a Golf Ball.

One has heard of morsels of straw being driven clean into solid timber by the force of a tornado. Somewhat similar and equally unexplainable was the result of a stroke at golf made by A. Wyndham on the famous Westward Ho course two or three years ago. He found his ball in a bed of rushes, actually impaled upon a rush, so that it was possible to pick up the ball and hold it suspended upon the rush. That a golf ball, which is almost as hard as wood, should be spiked in this fashion upon the point of so brittle a thing as a rush is a most remarkable phenomenon.—London Sphere.

Chinese Monopolist.

Chang Chien, of Chinkiang, has already eleven textile, flour, silk, soap, machine and other factories, says the Shanghai Commercial Intelligence, and he has nineteen new enterprises, all with steam and electric equipments, in hand. He is also building his own dockyard.

AN ETON ESCAPADE.

And the Part an English Statesman Played When the Clock Struck Twenty-Three Times.

There is a racy reminiscence of the present Home Secretary and his school contemporaries in an illustrated article in the summer number of The Pall Mall Magazine, just to hand. The first time I spoke to Herbert Gladstone (says the writer, "An Old Schoolfellow") will always remain fixed in my memory, for it was one of the most exciting moments of my Eton schooldays, and as the episode connected therewith has often been discussed by hundreds of Etonians, the solution may interest them. I refer to the memorable occasion when the dear old clock in the schoolyard went apparently off its venerable head, and struck twenty-three times without any known reason.

On a certain fateful day, I was in the company of a little friend of mine, whose nickname was "Senex," owing to his old-fashioned appearance, when, on passing the entrance to cloisters, we noticed that the door leading to the clock tower was half-open. Without a moment's hesitation we crept inside, and found ourselves facing an iron spiral staircase. It was very dark in the tower, the only light coming through little slits in the wall. Taking our courage, however, in both hands, we began to climb the stairs, and as we got higher and higher, so the noise of the mighty ticking of the clock increased and lured us to our fate, till finally we found ourselves in a sort of room, where all the works were exposed to our eager eyes. For the first few minutes we were too awed to move, but by degrees we gained confidence and began to touch various parts of the mechanism. "Senex" was particularly busy in this respect, and finally pulled a weird kind of lever. Suddenly, without a moment's warning, the clock struck! Ye gods, what a noise it made in the silence of that little room! It seemed as if the whole tower was coming about our ears, and as if the old clock in its righteous anger was proclaiming to the whole school the sacrilege perpetrated by two little lower boys.

The time was about eleven, and the schoolyard was full of boys waiting to go before their respective masters. At first we were not greatly perturbed, but when we had counted thirteen or fourteen strokes, uncontrollable panic seized us both, and we began tumbling down the stairs as hard as we could, pursued by the sound of the mad clanging of the outraged clock. And what added to our terror was the sight, through the slits in the masonry, of some two or three hundred boys and masters gazing up at the clock tower in speechless astonishment. "Senex" reached the bottom of the spiral staircase before me, and ran plump into the arms of old Holderness, the custodian of the cloisters.

Seeing the capture, I proceeded to hide in a dark corner by the door; and half an hour later, when all was quiet and the clock had ceased from troubling, I cautiously slipped out into the schoolyard. It was here I happened to meet Herbert Gladstone, who was then high up in the school and a celebrity in his way, for he played in the school football eleven, and was in "Pop." Under ordinary circumstances I would not have dared, as a lower boy, to stop him in the street; but I was laboring under great excitement, and was undecided as to what was the right thing to do so far as my loyalty to "Senex" was concerned. Accordingly I walked straight up to Gladstone, and without any prelude explained exactly what had happened, described the capture of poor "Senex" and asked if I ought to give myself up. "Tuppence" always had an exceptionally pleasant, cheery face, and on this occasion it positively beamed with merriment. He either took a certain amount of pleasure in keeping me in suspense, or else he was turning the matter carefully over in his mind, for he was some time answering. At last, to my great relief, he said: "I don't see that you will do 'Senex' any good by giving yourself up, as he is sure to be swished in any case," and then—as an after thought—he added, "You might stand him a strawberry mess after it is over!"

I offered "Senex" the best strawberry mess that could be made; but I remember he preferred ices, as you got more for the money—and, besides, he said they were cooling. My little friend is a great man in the city now, but for years after that dies nefas the striking of the school clock at Eton, and even the chimes of Big Ben, got seriously on his nerves.

His Name and His Legs.

Prof. Lyon Playfair once visited a phosphate mine whose manager, a Scotchman, desired him to leave at once and drop his specimens. Prof. Playfair addressed him in good Scotch and asked him if he thought him a mining adventurer. "Ay, that's just what ye are!" "No," replied Mr. Playfair, "I am a Scotch professor." "Then, if ye are, ye'll be havin' a name." "My name is Playfair," he responded. "Man," said the Scotchman, "are ye Lyon Playfair?" Then, looking from his six feet two inches with compassion on the five feet four of the professor, he continued: "Hoot, mon, yer name's traveled further than yer wee legs will ever carry ye!"—Christian Register.

"The flowing beard is hopelessly out of fashion and is usually worn only by people who have reached that stage of life when they have ceased to crease their trousers."—London Mail.

FOUR MAGAZINES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

CO-OPERATION IN ADVERTISING MAKES IT POSSIBLE.

Half price offers are but combinations of advertising. In a word, four magazines band together, use the same publicity and share the expenses. Four magazines working together reduce the cost of publicity about one-fourth of what it would be if taken up alone. The receipts are approximately the same as if the publicity were carried on independently. And who receives the benefits from this publicity club? The patron of the magazines, inasmuch as he secures a reduction in the subscription price made possible by economy. And thus the home can now secure three, four and five periodicals, which present-day needs require, for little more than the old-time price of a single magazine, that once was the solitary visitor to the family circle.

For instance, Combination No. 2, advertised by the Central Magazine Agency in our columns, offers The Cosmopolitan Magazine, $1.00; The Harper's Bazar, $1.00; The Home Magazine, $1.00, and The Reader Magazine, $3.00—total value, $6.00—all four for $3.00, one-half price, a saving of fifty per cent.

Another good offer is The Delineator, McClure's Magazine, The World's Work and The Home Magazine. These four may be had for just $3.50.

One of the best bargains ever offered is The Cosmopolitan Magazine, The World To-day and The Home Magazine, all three for one year for just $2.00.

For $2.00 you can secure a year's subscription to The Cosmopolitan The World To-day and The Home Magazine.

For $2.50 you can have The Cosmopolitan, $1.00; Home Magazine, $1.00; The Reader Magazine, $3.00, at one-half price, $2.50. All three for less than the price of one.

The best bargain of the year, however, is The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, Harper's Bazar and The Reader Magazine, total value, $6.00—all for half price, $3.00. This is positively the best bargain of the year.

Before subscribing to any magazines our readers should write the Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind., for prices. Further than this if you have spare time and want to earn Christmas money, the Central Magazine Agency will pay you a liberal commission on these great magazine combinations. You will be surprised to find how easy it is to make from $10.00 to $100.00 a week in securing orders from your neighbors. You can save them from 40 to 50 per cent. on their year's magazines and make a handsome commission for yourself.

To any newsdealer, druggist or agent who will act as our agent we will run their name and address at the bottom of our large display advertising. Our commission to agents or newsdealers is 35 cents an order.

Write to-day for our special offer or send your order for any of the combinations mentioned above. Remember, The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, The Reader Magazine and Harper's Bazar—all four for $3.00—total value, $6.00. You save 50 per cent. Address The Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind.

SPOTLESS SERVICE.

Service over the Lake Shore Railway may well be called spotless service. Throughout this entire system there is a noteworthy lack of dust and dirt. Sparkling linen and white-clad waiters greet the traveller in the dining cars, and this "spick and span" appearance extends throughout the train. One steps down at a journey's end over the Lake Shore as clean as when he boarded the train. Cleanliness is but one feature that has made The Lake Shore the most popular road in America. Others are its luxurious coaches, absolute safety, highest speed and punctuality. Tell the agent to have your ticket read "Via Buffalo and The Lake Shore Railway," and write for information concerning rates and routes to J. W. Daly, Chief A.G.P.A., Buffalo, N.Y.; A. J. Smith, G.P.A., Cleveland, Ohio, or W. J. Lynch, Pass'gr Traffic Mgr., Chicago, Ill.

A CONFESSION.

I bear with me where'er I go
 The image of a lady fair.
'Tis not my wife's; she does not know
 How much for that bright face I care.

I often take it out and gaze
 In rapture on its perfect lines.
It has inspired my happiest lays;
 My sun of fortune in it shines.

O classic head with fillet graced!
 O Grecian nose!—O dimpled chin!
O lips so exquisitely traced!
 O silvery hair and polished skin!

Yes; silvery hair, though still so young
 And scarcely changed by lapse of time.
This maiden fair whose praise I've sung
 Beams on me from a treasured dime!

There Are Seven

pairs of muscles provided by nature to properly control the lids and to move the eyes in unison with each other. Some of the movements of the eye-balls require (as in a running scale on a piano) a marvellously rapid succession of rhythmic contractions and relaxations of one set of eye muscles after the other. The possible combination in seven is almost infinite, yet the brain has at times to make and unmake every possible combination of the eye muscle at the proper moment with startling precision, and marvellous quickness, in order to place the two eyes in the proper relation to moving objects, so that the two retinal pictures can be fused into one conscious visual impression through the medium of the brain cells and nerve fibres; when we stop to think what we are able to see out of the window of an express train, while the objects seen are flitting past at a frightful speed; when we consider that each thing that we see has to be properly focused by two cameras at the same instant, in order to make our brain cells conscious of but one object; when we consider the strain on these muscles and brain cells are kept up for 16 hours each day, is it any wonder that so many people are suffering from a variety of nervous diseases as a result? We give "Repression Lenses," that reverse and relieve this strain and rest the muscles. Consultation free.

United Workman's Successful Banquet.

PLEASANT GATHERING AT WALLACE'S RESTAURANT LAST NIGHT — ELOQUENT SPEECHES AND MELODIOUS SONGS, AFTER A TOOTHSOME SUPPER.

The local lodge of the A. O. U. W. was last evening honored by the presence of the Grand Master of the Order, Bro. C. E. Cameron, of Iroquois, and the Past Grand Master, Bro. J. A. Gibson, of Ingersoll. A large number of the brethren, also visiting brethren from Ameliasburg, Shannonville, Plainfield and Frankford, were present to greet their executive head.

After the business at the lodge-room had been completed the company repaired to the spacious dining room at Mr. J. Wallace's establishment, where supper was partaken of. It was a dainty spread, and was most capably served up by an efficient staff of waitresses. Upwards of one hundred sat down to the repast.

Bro. W. C. Mikel, Master Workman of Belleville Lodge, occupied the chair and near him were the Grand Lodge officers, also Bros. Mayor Sulman, Rev. R. H. Leitch, Dr. Simmons, of Frankford, P.D.D., and J. Wallace, of Picton, D.D.G.M.

At the conclusion of the supper a toast list was proceeded with, the addresses given being of a high order.

The chairman in introducing them, did so in his usual capable and racy manner

"The King"—The National Anthem by the company.

"The Grand Lodge of the A. O. U. W.

The Grand Master Workman, in replying was brief. He felt it a great honor to be at the head of the A.O.U.W. of Ontario. There was no order in the Province that had within its ranks so many prominent citizens. There was no ring in the Grand Lodge and he hoped there never would be. He was doing all in his power to promote the interests of the order, and he hoped that, when he laid down the gavel the order would be in a more prosperous condition than when he accepted the position of Grand Master. He tendered his thanks for the honor done him by the members of Belleville Lodge and hoped the lodge would continue to flourish.

At this juncture a quartette composed of Messrs. S. R. Burrows, H. Wrightmyer, J. V. Doyle and K. Taylor rendered a plantation melody, which was much appreciated.

Past Grand Master Gibson also responded to the toast, and his address was to the point. He referred to the fact that the order since its existence had paid out $11,000,000 in insurance and benefits, and 5000 homes had been protected. The Society had earned its right to exist. He advised all young men to accept the golden opportunities of the hour and join such a society. It would assist them to be more useful and less selfish, and their lives would be a benediction to themselves and their fellow men.

District Deputy Grand Master Wallace spoke briefly in reference to the order, which he characterized as the best order with which he was identified.

Past District Deputy Grand Master Dr. Simmons, of Frankford, in his address referred to the order as one of great benefit. It was doing a grand work, and was destined to do greater good. This institution known as the A.O.U.W. was making forward strides and he wished it every success.

"The City" — This toast was appropriately proposed by Bro. D. Barragar and responded to by Mayor Sulman, who, in his opening remarks, extended to the visitors a hearty welcome. The city was, he was pleased to state, improving, and industries were being established. Considerable outside capital had recently been brought to the city and there were prospects of much more being brought in. It was important that the citizens as a whole should take a deep interest in municipal matters and especially as the municipal elections are drawing near. The citizens had great interests at stake, namely in the waterworks and gas works, which were now the property of the city. It was the duty of the electors to see that proper persons were elected to the Council to conduct the business in a business-like manner.

Solo. by Mr. H. Wrightmyer — "I Was Dreaming."

"Canada and the Empire" — This toast was proposed by Bro. Rev. R. H. Leitch, who spoke most fittingly of Canada and the history it had made. Canada, he said, need never be ashamed of the Rose, the Thistle or the Shamrock.

"The Maple Leaf, Forever," was sung by the company.

Bro Col. Ponton responded to the toast in his usual eloquent manner, referring more especially to his recent visit to Edinburgh and other places in Scotland, and the many interesting sights he had seen. In referring to the Chamber of Congress of the Empire, held a few weeks ago in London, the heart of the Empire, the speaker said that at least one good thing would be accomplished, namely that English literature would be brought to Canada much cheaper than formerly.

Solo by Mr. J. V. Doyle — "I Love You."

"Visiting Members of the Order," proposed by Bro. E. L. Palen and responded to by Bro. W. Clazie, of Shannonville Lodge; Bro. Frederick, of Ameliasburg Lodge, and Bro. Moore, of Plainfield Lodge.

This concluded the toast list and the singing of the National Anthem brought the pleasant and successful gathering to a close.

Presentation to "Ned" Henthorn.

An illuminated address, designed and wrought by Mist Copeland, has been sent from the choir of Christ Church to Mr. E. Henthorn, who had been connected with the choir for a number of years and is now living in Montreal. The address gave expression to the regard in which he is held by the choir and their high appreciation of the assistance which his ability and gifts qualified him to render.

Died In Minnesota.

There died recently, near Minneapolis, Minnesota, Mr. Joseph Harrison, who left this city for that state some 40 years ago. Deceased was a brother of the late Edward Harrison, Esq., who once kept a bookstore in this city, and was the last surviving member of that generation of the Harrison family, which at one time was a leading one in this district. Mr. John Harrison and Col. Edward Harrison, now of Ottawa, are nephews of the deceased gentleman, who was married to a Miss Cook, sister of Mrs Samuel White, now living in this city. Mr. Joseph Harrison, who was quite well-to-do, died of blood poisoning. He was 92 years of age, and will be remembered by many old residents of Belleville.

Another Sudden Death.

Mrs. Morton, aunt of Lieut.-Col. Ponton, died this morning suddenly of heart failure at "Sidney Cottage," the home of her girlhood. She was the daughter of the late William Hutton, whose portrait hangs in the Council Chamber as the first Warden of the County and who was at his death Deputy Minister of Agriculture, and resident at Quebec. Mrs. Jones, wife of Rev. Septimus Jones, formerly the esteemed Rector of Christ Christ here, is the only surviving sister. The late Mr. Benjamin Morton died a few years ago and will be remembered by many friends in Belleville. Mrs. Morton often revisited her old home, and a large circle of friends and relatives will mourn her loss, as she was known by many, both in Toronto and Belleville, for her kind words and good deeds.

Some say that city girls are poor, ignorant things, Some of them cannot tell a horse from a cow, but they do know that Hollister's Rocky Mountain Tea is one of the greatest beautifiers known. Tea or Tablets, 35 cents. D. M. Waters.

INSULTING LANGUAGE.

Wm. Steverson was charged with and convicted of using insulting language to Mrs. P. McCourt and her young daughter Mary. The defendant alleged that Mrs. McCourt first started the trouble by calling him names. A fine of $2 or five days in jail was imposed. Mr. Carnew appeared for the plaintiffs.

Died In Thurlow

Mrs. Nancy Griffin, wife of the late Mr. J. O. Griffin, of Westfield, Mass., died last night at the residence of her sister, Mrs. W. P. Way, 4th concession of Thurlow. Deceased, who was 69 years of age, was born at Northport, Prince Edward County. For the greater portion of her life Mrs. Griffin resided in the United States, but upon the death of Mr. Griffin, some 10 years ago, she came here to reside with her sister, who is the only surviving member of the family. Deceased had been for years a member of the Methodist Church. She was an estimable lady, beloved by all who knew her. No family survive.

Wedding Bells.

KISER — BARREAGE.

A quiet wedding took place this morning at 9.30, at the home of Mr. John Baker, North Moira St., when Mr. Nelson Kiser, of this city, was united in marriage with Mrs. Fred Barreage, also of Belleville. Rev. Geo Brown performed the ceremony. After a few days absence on a trip Mr. and Mrs. Kiser will take up their residence on Station St.

DUNNING — BURRIS.

On Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 24th, at 3.30, Mr. Fred Dunning, of Streetsville. Ont., was united in marriage to Miss Emmaline Burris, of this city. The ceremony took place at the home of the bride's father, Mr. Burris, Grove St., the Rev. Geo. Brown officiating. The bride and groom left on the 6 p.m. train for Campbellford for a brief visit. Their future home will be Streetsville.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

ROSELLE KNOTT IN TOWN.

At Kingston last night the Queen's College turned out en masse to greet Miss Roselle Knott. The faculty, occupied the boxes and the college colors were used. The receipts amounted to over one thousand dollars. The play was the most gorgeous ever seen upon the Kingston stage, and in all twenty-five curtain calls were demanded. Miss Knott had to respond to repeated calls for a speech, and effectively thanked Kingston theatregoers for their warm reception.

Miss Knott's private car and two scenery cars are at the station here, and forty-two people are registered at the various city hotels.

The "Duchess of Devonshire" is the most magnificent production ever offered in Belleville. It is too expensive for one night stands, and only week stand engagements will be played after Toronto.

A GREAT CAST.

The cast in "Charlie's Aunt," which comes to the Carman next Tuesday evening, is certainly one of the best ever seen in a farce comedy. It is headed by Etienne Girardot, who will be seen in his original creation, Lord Fancourt Babberly; Henry Warwick has been entrusted with the part of Colonel Sir Francis Chesney; Sol Aiken will play the Oxford solicitor, Stephen Pettigue; Frank Hollins and Galwey Hebert will be the undergraduates; Jacques Martin will interpret the role of Brassett, the college scout; John Norris will be the New Footman, and Nina Herbert will enact the character of Donna Lucia D'Alvadorez, Charley's aunt from Brazil. The scenic settings are the best the comedy has ever had.

Robbing the Bay of Quinte.

On the subject of obtaining eggs for the hatcheries a correspondent of The Mail and Empire says: "The Dominion Fish Department has forwarded shipping boxes from Sandwich to the Bay of Quinte, where it intends to obtain 100,000,000 whitefish eggs for the Sandwich hatchery in the closed season for whitefish. Why not obtain the eggs from the northern lakes, where the fish are plentiful and worth less than in Lake Ontario? All the residents along the Canadian shores of Lake Ontario should object. In 1905 all the hatcheries in the Dominion propagated less than 30,000,000 whitefish fry. The Sandwich hatchery was less than one-third full, and it cost as much to operate it when one-third full as if entirely filled. In 1856 no less than 57,500 whitefish were caught in the Bay of Quinte at one haul of the seine. In 1905 less than 160,000 whitefish were caught in all the lake during the entire year."

COULDN'T GET INTO "RING."

George N. Morang Tells of Non-Success in Text Book Enquiry—Much Technical Evidence.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—Questions of copyright of portions of the contents, and the comparative value of the Ontario school reading books with those of the United States, and unauthorized Canadian readers occupied the session of the Ontario School Book Commission yesterday at the Normal School. T. W. Crothers presided, and G. Lynch-Staunton examined the witnesses, who were all from the Morang Publishing Co., Limited.

Harry L. Grantham gave evidence of the cost of the Ontario reading books. Part I., First Reader, cost 3 9-10 cents, and sold for 10 cents. Part II. cost 5 1-10 cents, and sold for 15 cents. The books were poorly made. The Second Reader, selling at 20 cents, cost about 8 cents. The Third Reader cost 10 1-8 cents, and sold for 30 cents. The Fourth Reader cost 12 1-8 cents, and sold for 40 cents. It was very inferior. He contrasted the superior quality and higher cost of the Morang series, which were sold at the same prices as the others, and which were entirely produced in Canada.

A good deal of technical evidence as to the weight and quality of paper used, the style of binding, type, illustrations, and cost of electro-plates, was given, all reflecting disparagingly on the Ontario series.

Bluffed By Ross.

George N. Morang told how he tried to get a contract with the Government for the publication of the Ontario readers, he had been refused. No satisfactory explanation had been given him by the Government of his non-success in breaking into what was several times during his evidence referred to as "the ring," which consisted of the Gage Co., the Canada Publishing Co. and the Copp, Clark Co. The agreement between these companies and the Government, he understood, allowed the latter to have the books published elsewhere than with the firms in the agreement. Notwithstanding this, he failed to get any guarantee that if he printed the readers he would not be molested by people who had copyrights on various matter in the book, nor could he get a list of those holding the copyrights, so as to negotiate with them. Mr. Ross had agreed, however, to authorize the use of primers issued by the Morang Co.

J. C. Saul, with four years' experience with Morang and Co., and knowledge of conditions in Manitoba and the United States, testified in the afternoon.

The commission will sit again this morning.

THREE PERTINENT QUESTIONS.

Dr. Weldon Phases Finance Minister at the Nomination Meeting.

Liverpool, N. S., Oct. 25.—The nomination proceedings in the Shelburne-Queens bye-election took place here yesterday. A joint meeting in the afternoon was addressed by Hon. W. S. Fielding, the Liberal candidate, and Dr. R. C. Weldon, the Conservative candidate.

During Mr. Weldon's speech he put three questions to Mr. Fielding, demanding a frank answer thereto. They were:

(1) How many persons did Mr. Fielding pay sums of money to about two years after the election of 1900?

(2) How much money was so paid?

(3) How much money had been so spent?

Mr. Fielding said he had no answer to make beyond what he had stated in the court, and that was that he refused to answer any questions regarding former elections, for which he was not on trial.

Skeletons of Prehistoric Monsters For Exhibition in New York.

New York, Oct. 25.—Three big expeditions of the American Museum of Natural History arrived from the Rocky Mountain regions after several months' rough work, bringing nearly two car loads of petrified skeletons of about 500 animals mostly new to science, and which lived on earth from one and one-half to eight millions years ago.

Among the many rare finds and which caused considerable speculation and excitement among the scientists at the museum, were two dinosaurs, new to science, one of which was of huge proportions, bearing some resemblance to the great creature known as Triceratops.

The expeditions were conducted under Prof. Henry Fairfield Osborn, paleontologist of the museum and of the Governments of the United States and Canada and first vice-president of the museum.

Did Collins Talk of Selling Receipts?—Witness in London Bribery Case Says Collins Said Conservatives Would Pay From $2,000 to $2,500 For Them—Racy Brantford Incident—More Bribe Receivers.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—Richard C. Brown, shoe merchant, was the chief witness in the London bribery case yesterday morning.

Mr. Brown stated that he went to Reid and told him that Collins threatened to make trouble if not paid money said to be coming to him, but the witness said that Collins was a man who could not be satisfied, and that he had been paid the same as anyone else for his work.

Sell the Evidence.

Collins had told witness that he (Collins) could get $2,000 or $2,500 from the Conservatives by handing over his receipts in connection with the work to Meredith and Judd. Witness had hardly credited this story, and had not told it to Reid, but had said to Collins, "If you could get money I'd take it." Reid had declared that the stories of Collins were all bosh.

In reply to a question by the magistrate witness said he could not swear whether he had told Mr. Reid about Collins' threat or not.

"Tell his Worship just what Mr. Reid did say to you."

"I've told it three or four times already," said the witness, as he again related what had passed between Mr. Reid and himself relative to Collins having become apparently disgruntled and threatened to squeal.

"Did Mr. Reid tell you that Collins got $100?"

"He did not. He may have said that Collins had been paid for his services."

More Bribe Receivers.

John D. McAlpine told of getting $5 and $10 from T. McKay.

Mr. McKay was called. He had been a returning officer, but asserted that he did not remember getting money or envelopes from anyone.

John Crockett told of getting $9.50 from Collins.

William Cooper told of receiving $9.50 from Collins.

Held McAlpine's Envelope.

Wm. R. McKay, who was unsatisfactory when first called, again appeared, and said he had a slight recollection of holding an envelope for McAlpine. It was left in his store while he was out.

"I received no money from Reid or anybody else. I was chairman of the division, and I remember asking him only to send a man down to help canvass the case."

An exchange of shots between Mr. Wilkie and Mr. DuVernet followed, the former charging that no conspiracy had been proved, nor any money traced to O'Gorman or Reid. Mr. DuVernet retorted that this had been done in a number of cases.

A Brantford Episode.

At the resumption of the enquiry in the afternoon, Morris Westbrook of Brantford told of having been in a committee room in Brantford during the Heyd-Henry election, and seeing O'Gorman there. The witness was in a polling booth there when a man about 5 1-2 feet high, with greyish moustache and hair, came in and voted in the name of Cephas Brown, a man with whom Westbrook was acquainted. Witness followed the man to another polling booth, and asked if he intended to vote again. The man replied in the affirmative.

"Was that the man who afterwards turned out to be John O'Meara?"

"I can't say."

Westbrook said that he had the man arrested. The latter was freed on his personal bail of $200, and cleared out.

He Piloted Sifton.

Oscar Wootten told of having piloted Sifton up against several electors, but as he remained some distance away when the parties conversed he did not know the exact nature of the transactions. One Dewar had asked him what there was "in it," which he had taken as a tip. Witness also intimated to several voters that a visit to Lewis' hotel might prove profitable.

A Young "Lib." President.

Henry Ranahan, president of the Young Liberal Club, said the only money he had handled in the election was the payment of small sums to outside scrutineers out of his own pocket.

"I am instructed that you handled a very large sum of money. Do you swear that you didn't?"

The witness replied in a halting fashion that he "didn't remember," and was sent back to think it over.

When his name was called later in the afternoon, Mr. Armour, for the crown, stated that Ranahan had been taken ill and he had consented to allow his return to London for the present.

Mr. Cooper's Adventure.

Most important evidence was supplied by George B. Cooper, from whom, after a good deal of prodding by the crown, it was drawn forth that he had received the sum of $15 as salve to his sore feelings over being displaced in his position of deputy-returning officer. He thought it was Sifton who had spoken to him about compensation, but was unsettled as to whether the latter had paid him the money.

Didn't Print the Ballots.

Albert Talbot, publisher of The Echo, London, stated that his firm had not printed the ballots used in the bye-election, nor in the general election preceding.

"I am instructed that you held some envelopes in the election?"

"No, I did not.

He had made a subscription of $30 or $40 to the campaign fund, giving it to Mr. Reid. He had paid William Grant ten dollars and Morris another ten for work done in former elections. He had also paid $5 to a scrutineer, but beyond this hadn't dabbled financially in the election. Mr. Talbot was allowed to go, on the understanding that entries in his books relating to ballots furnished for Dominion and provincial elections for the past five years would be examined by an expert.

Robert F. Lacey, polling clerk, denied having tried to induce Axtell, a Tory voter, to go to the Liberal committee rooms.

William Jeffrey was unaware at the time of the election that corruption was afoot. He had done some canvassing along approved lines, and that was all.

The name of William Servis having been thrice called, without response, and there being no further witnesses available, court adjourned.

SETTLING WITH INDIANS.

Commissioners Return After Having Made 915 Agreements.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—Indian treaty No. 9 has been completed by Messrs. Stewart and Scott of the Dominion Indian Department, and Commissioner McMartin representing Ontario. It embraces some 90,000 square miles north of the height of land and east to the Quebec boundary.

Last year 690 Indians were treated with, and this year 915 have agreed to the terms, making 1,605 in all.

Reserves have been set aside for each band of Indians, subject to appeal of the Provincial Government. It is stated that some very choice pine timber land is included in these reserves, and there may be more to be heard about this phase of the treaty.

Besides the reserves, each Indian gets $8 for the first year, and $4 for each succeeding year, these sums to be paid by the province. The Dominion pays all the expenses of the commission and cost of education and other matters subsequently.

The Dominion was anxious to get the matter closed in order to clear the way for the G. T. P. Railway.

While at work in the north, the commissioners made a treaty also with a band of 1,400 Indians north of the Albany River.

MACHINE EDUCATION.

Hon. J. P. Whitney Speaks Against It At Cornwall High School Centenary.

Cornwall, Oct. 25.—There was a large gathering of prominent citizens in Cornwall yesterday to celebrate the centenary of the Cornwall High School, and among those who took part in the celebration were Hon. J. P. Whitney, a graduate of the school; Hon. Dr. Pyne, Minister of Education, and A. H. U. Colquhoun, Deputy-Minister, a former resident.

The celebration opened with a reception at the school, which has recently been greatly enlarged.

Dr. Pyne spoke for about half an hour, dealing with the educational policy of the Ontario Government.

Mr. Whitney's address lasted about 10 minutes, and included a brief sketch of the school from the days of its founder, Bishop Strachan, till the present day. He condemned the system of educating children by a machine system, with the object of turning out as many graduates as possible.

Mr. Colquhoun followed with a brief address, and the closing speech was made by James O'Reilly of Cornwall.

Utes Looking For Trouble.

Omaha, Neb., Oct. 25.—Word was received here yesterday from the scene of the Indian depredations in Wyoming to the effect that Capt. C. P. Johnson, with an orderly and a scout, overtook the Utes on Little Powder River. It is said the Indians absolutely refused to return to their reservation, and declared they were going to Dakota.

PILES

SUFFERED FOR 23 YEARS—TRIED EVERYTHING WITHOUT AVAIL. "PYRAMIDS" DOING THE WORK.

A TRIAL PACKAGE MAILED FREE TO ALL.

The rectum, like the mouth, is lined with that soft, satiny material known as mucous membrane. Piles is a disease of that membrane and the blood vessels that lie under it.

Fissure and fistula affect the same membrane and belong to the same family. Pyramid Pile Cure slipped into the bowel, melt and spread themselves over the diseased and painful surface and act just as a salve would if the trouble was on the outside of the body and could be easily seen and gotten at.

The immediate relief they give even in the most agonizing cases will startle you, as it has already startled many thousands of "Doubting Thomases" before you, who have tried everything and sent for the sample package, firmly convinced that they would again be disappointed.

But they weren't. Pyramid Pile Cure don't disappoint. They cure. They are for sale at all druggists' at 50 cents a box and are worth an even hundred to the person who needs them.

"This is to certify that I have used three 50c boxes of Pyramid Pile Cure and it has benefitted me more than any other pile remedy I have ever used. I used the sample which you sent me, together with the three 50c boxes, and I am so much better, but not entirely cured, as my case is one of twenty-three years' standing. I did not expect to be cured all at once. I had almost lost all hope of ever getting any remedy that would help me until I tried Pyramid Pile Cure. I believe they will entirely cure me if I continue their use, which I intend doing so long as I can get the money to pay for them. I do not think any one ever suffered very much more than I have at times. Then I would be so nervous I could not get any ease in any position I could place myself.

I cannot express my gratitude for the good your medicine has done me. I will continue to tell my friends of your merit. Yours, Emma Bodenhamer, Bedford, Ind."

Or if you want to prove this matter at our expense, before purchasing, send your name and address to the Pyramid Drug Co., 56 Pyramid Building, Marshall, Michigan, and receive a trial package free by return mail.

SUN LIFE LOST HEAVILY

Ohio Traction Bonds Did Not Prove a Money Maker.

Secretary Macaulay Said Case Proved Necessity of Company Securing Control of Any Enterprise Before Investing Largely—Would Take Sun Life Ten Years to Get Rid of Its Speculating Stocks.

Montreal, Oct. 25.—At the afternoon session of the insurance commission yesterday, the enquiry by Dominion Counsel Shepley passed from investments of the Sun Life in Illinois to those in similar traction companies in the State of Ohio. In Illinois the company made great gains from investments in interurban electric railway bonds, but in Ohio the case was reversed.

Lost Heavily in Ohio.

T. B. Macaulay, secretary of the Sun Life, attributed the losses to mismanagement of the Ohio chain by Appleyard, who controlled the system. The so-called "Appleyard System" of railways was one beginning at Dayton, Ohio, and running to Springfield and Columbus. The Sun Life bought securities from Appleyard on the understanding that he should take them back at an increase. It was really a loan to Appleyard.

When the time of repurchase came, Appleyard had no funds and so owed the company $539,000. To repay this he sold the Sun Life large blocks of bonds and stocks. Later these deteriorated in value and the company had to write almost all of them off the books. Now values have gone up again, but the company will lose the interest.

T. B. Macaulay said the case proved the necessity of the company securing control before investing largely in securities of any enterprise.

Cornwall Railway.

Mr. Shepley took up the matter of the Cornwall Street Railway, which the Sun Life finds on its hands after losing on his securities. Witness said it was an early investment and the company has more experience now.

Another case of loss was the Levis County Railway and the Montreal Terminal Railway.

Speaking of the latter security, Commissioner Kent amused the commission by asking witness whether he did not think that the Sun Life bonds in this road was not the reason why it so long continued to be a nuisance to the people of Montreal.

Witness replied that he had been converted from the idea that it was profitable to invest in securities of a competing road.

Towards the end of the session the methods of entering bonus stock holdings in books of the Sun Life were discussed.

The Illinois Venture.

Discussing the Illinois traction venture at the morning session Mr. Macaulay explained that the Sun Life financed the entire scheme except for a little aid given by Hon. T. B. McKinley of Illinois.

In 1902 the Sun Life bought a large block of Illinois Central Traction preferred stock from McKinley. A month later part of this was bought from the company by directors of the Sun Life.

The books showed only one transaction which took in the directors as well as the company.

Mr. Macaulay was called upon to explain this. He said the directors had intended to take a part in the stock, but had misunderstood the date of the deal and they simply took their share later. No written evidence is extant to show that this was the original intention of the directors.

Asked by Mr. Shepley how long it would take the Sun Life to get rid of the sort of stocks they had been investing in largely should a law be passed forbidding insurance companies such investments, Mr. Macaulay said ten years, and launched into a warm defence of the company's attitude, stating that Canada did not offer scope for investment.

WANTED TO BE JAILED.

Woman Suffragists Got Their Wish and Two Months.

London, Oct. 25.—Ten women suffragists, who were arrested Tuesday for rioting within the precincts of the House of Commons, were arraigned in a police court yesterday and were bound over to keep the peace for six months.

Such a commonplace outcome of the affair did not meet the views of the suffragists, who apparently desired to assume the roles of martyrs by being committed to jail, and they made an even greater hubbub.

When the disturbances had somewhat subsided, the police re-assembled the defendants, who were then informed by the magistrate that they must immediately find sureties for their good behavior or be imprisoned for two months.

The whole ten women refused to enter into recognizances and were removed in custody.

75 Cent Gas in Toronto.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—Yesterday the directors of the Consumers' Gas Co., on motion of Mayor Coatsworth, decided to reduce the price of gas from 80 cents to 75 cents per thousand, to go into effect at once. At the same meeting Mr. G. R. R. Cockburn announced his retirement from the presidency of the company, owing to the excited state of public opinion regarding the Ontario Bank, of which he is president.

Many Others Missing as Result of Fire at Kansas City.

Kansas City, Mo., Oct. 26.—Four persons are known to be dead, eight others are missing, two are fatally injured and fifty are suffering from hurts as the result of a fire which destroyed the Chamber of Commerce building in Kansas City early yesterday.

A single body has been recovered from the ruins, that of D. R. Young. It is known that Charles A. Lynch, a laborer, and the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. George Sparks, are dead, but their bodies have not been recovered. J. F. Branham, a wagon maker, died at an hospital yesterday.

It is thought that the total dead will be about ten.

Saves Daughter From Death.

Kingston, Oct. 26.—The Lakeview Hotel, at Portsmouth, was burned yesterday morning, due to gas in the kitchen igniting. Nothing was saved. The loss is $4,000; partly insured. A five-year-old daughter of W. B. Westlake, proprietor, was carried out by her father after she was overcome by smoke and had fallen to the floor.

Guests Barely Escape.

River Du Loup Wharf, Que., Oct. 26.—Fire broke out at about one o'clock yesterday morning in the Sanitarium Hotel, at River Du Loup Wharf, owned by J. B. E. Prenette, and quickly spread to the Hotel Venise, owned and occupied by Mrs. Pelza. The Hotel Venise and G. N. W. Telegraph office, which was therein, were completely destroyed. The stables and outhouses were also reduced to ashes. The inmates of the Hotel Venise had barely time to escape in their night clothes. The fire is said to have been caused by the explosion of a lamp in the Sanitarium.

The loss by fire is estimated at about $10,000. There is said to be only $3,000 insurance.

Totally Destroyed.

Canora, Sask., Oct. 26.—The new Imperial Hotel was burned down at four o'clock yesterday morning. The cause is unknown. The loss is $12,000, with no insurance.

To Get Into the Book Ring

Cost the Copp-Clark Co. $30,000 and Royalties.

Mr. Thomas Admits That Canada Publishing Co. Is at Least a Syndicate of Three Firms—No Competition--Copyright Payments--Evidence Which Throws Light on High Price of School Books.

Toronto, Oct. 26.—Mr. Arnold W. Thomas, secretary-treasurer of the Copp-Clark Co., stated in his evidence before the Text Book Commission that the Canada Publishing Co. was at least a syndicate composed of members of the three firms, W. J. Gage & Co., Warwick Bros. and the Copp-Clark Co., and that there was no competition. The Copp-Clark Co. paid $30,000 for the place of Thomas Nelson & Son in the syndicate, and in addition continued a royalty on the trade price varying from 2 1-2 to 5 per cent. A new agreement was made in February, 1906, by which the Nelson firm was to get 2 1-2 per cent. on first readers, and 5 per cent. on third and fourth readers.

Macmillan and other companies had the copyright for many selections which it was desired to use in the Ontario Readers, and for these the "Schoolbook ring" had to pay large sums.

Mr. Frank Wise, president of the Canadian Macmillan Co., said he did not think the fourth reader, for which 40 cents is charged, is worth more than 15 cents.

E. F. Towern and Albert Britnell spoke of the effect on the retail trade. They would like fair prices maintained.

How Firm Shared Business.

E. H. Caswell of the Methodist Book Room, said the firm published books in use in the high schools, some being authorized.

"And the other publishers came to us and threatened to compete with us unless we came to terms with them." he said.

"Did they let you into the Readers?"

"Not likely."

"So that although they have no contract they are sharing the business with you?"

"That is just it."

"Do you make a return to the Government of the number you sell?"

"Yes, but I can't say if that includes those sold by Gage and the others."

"What was your agreement with Gage & Co.?"

"I could not say off hand."

"Were there any other agreements?"

"Yes, one in connection with the Latin Primer, in which Gage took advantage of the contract law. They came to us with an ultimatum that we should either make a deal with them or they would endeavor to cut us out, and we are now selling to them at the rate of 6 1-2 cents a copy, and that includes the royalty of 2 1-2 cents.

Never Encouraged.

His firm had never been able to get a contract from the Government, because of the copyright plea.

"We wanted to get in, but on fair terms and not at the caprice of the Government, and considered, as an old house, we should have had a chance. We protested against the monopoly," said Mr. Caswell.

"And the answer was?"

"That the three firms had the exclusive right to publish."

"If you had taken a contract, it would have been at the risk of being sued in regard to copyright."

"Yes, and the Government did not offer to minimize the risk in any way."

Rose Co. Kept the Readers.

George M. Rose, manager of the Hunter-Rose Co., testified that in 1894 a five-years' contract had been received from the Government to publish the Public School Euclid and Public School Algebra. He gave considerable information about prices and royalties.

As to copyrights, a good many in the High School Reader were accorded free. The Gage Co. had wanted to break in on this, but the Hunter, Rose Co. would not stand for it. Then Mr. Gage had gone to the Premier, Mr. Ross, concerning copyright, but to no purpose.

Fred Carman said that a $1 book, which the cost the retailer 75 cents, has now to be sold at 80 cents, owing to competition.

The Commission will not meet again until next week, when Mr. Towern will again be called.

G. T. R. Fireman Killed.

Hamilton, Oct. 26.—A construction train collided Wednesday night with a light engine on the G. T. R. at Copetown, and Harry Clark, fireman on the light engine, was fatally injured. Both legs were almost cut off. He was brought to the City Hospital, where his limbs were amputated, but he died from shock a short time after the operation. He boarded at the Dominion Hotel, was 22 years of age, and unmarried.

Dies From Injuries.

Tariff Revision.

The near approach of the session of Parliament and the promised revision of the tariff, says the Montreal Gazette, finds the Laurier organs in a painfully muddled condition. There are three divisions in the party. One section would have the tariff left as it is, another would have revision postponed until after the Congress of the United States has dealt with tariff revision; the third is hopefully awaiting the announcement that Canada's tariff has been raised against the United States. The stand-patters say that as the country is prosperous and the revenue is buoyant it would be a grave error to interfere with present conditions. Those who would have revision postponed until after Congress has acted, frankly confess that they are afraid that action by Canada, which would tend to make it more difficult for the United States manufacturer to do business in this country, would mean that Congress would do what it could to return the blow. "The statesmanlike attitude," one of these journals says, "just now is one of close and intelligent observation for the next few months, perhaps for the next three years.' The third section, which yearns for an increase in the Canadian tariff which will make trade with Canada more difficult for United States manufacturers are, strangely enough, not entirely protectionist in their sentiments. They do not favor the increase, but they would not oppose it, because they imagine that its effect would be to bring United States manufacturers across the border to establish branch plants in Canada, which, having unlimited capital and the very latest equipment, would give the already established Canadian manufacturers the keenest kind of competition. They seem to think that anything that will injure the manufacturing interests of Canada would be a satisfactory substitute, for the time being, at any rate, for free trade. It is hardly necessary to point out that from a protectionist point of view neither of these factions is in the right. When the tariff of Canada requires revision, revision should be made with an eye alone to the prosperity and welfare of the people of Canada. Let the United States make its own tariff. Any concessions the United State might make to Canada would be made, not in the interests of Canadians but in those of the people of the United States. If the United States wants anything that Canada has to sell the people of the United States know where to come and get it. As for the third faction, that which apparently hopes to see the manufacturers of Canada injured by the competition of branches of United States industries established in Canada, they are mistaken if they imagine that it is a part of the scheme of protection to protect the home manufacturer who has not kept his business up to date and who is not giving the people of Canada the advantage of the march of industrial improvement. The aim of protection is not to give capital an unfair advantage; it is to afford employment to labor and business to Canadian cities and towns. It does not matter whether the capital which makes this employment and this business is home capital or foreign. With home competition the home manufacturer must take his chances. It was never intended that the measure of protection given him should be a guarantee against failure to manufacture efficiently. If he fails to do this, the fault is his own and he alone must pay the penalty. But for the country generally protection is necessary and should be accorded, no matter what is done elsewhere.

SETTING A GOOD EXAMPLE.

Considering how general is the use of Hungarian bitter waters, it is interesting that the proprietors of the Apenta water give assurance that the working of the Apenta springs, Budapest, Hungary, at which it is bottled, is carried out not on merely commercial lines, but under the scientific and hygienic supervision of Dr. Leo von Liebermann, professor at the Hygienic Institute of the Royal University at Budapest. The analysis of Apenta as published in the text-books on mineral water springs, show that the sulphates of soda and of magnesia, of which the latter is predominant, are the chief constituents. Apenta is best known as a still or non-effervescent water, but it can also be had carbonated, in small bottles called splits. It is said that the importation of this water has grown very considerably in recent years, and it is well known that Hungarian waters have been in world-wide use for many years.

TIMELY TOPICS.

The question, "Should people who live outside the city be allowed the use of Belleville's utilities?" is making quite a stir these days. The letter from "A Taxpayer for Many Years" seems to have stirred things up The general impression seems to be that outsiders should be allowed the privileges so long as there is no stint for the citizens themselves, but that the outsiders should certainly be compelled to pay extra. As one gentleman expressed it; "Suppose I live near the town line, inside the corporation. I pay 22 3-10 mills taxes, and have the use of city water. The less said about the sidewalk which passes my door the better. Within a stone's throw of me is another man who pays no taxes to the city, but he has the use of city water at the same rate at which it is furnished to me. If the waterworks run at a loss I, with other citizens, will be compelled to pay the taxes to make up the deficit. My friend across the line chuckles in his sleeve. He has all to gain and nothing to lose. The present arrangement it a very jug-handled one, to my mind."

• • •

Speaking to The Intelligencer anent this question, Mayor Sulman said he did not think the present arrangement was exactly an equitable one, but the present by-law gave the manager of the waterworks the right to instal services wherever they were applied for. It was altogether likely, His Worship said, that some action would be taken in the matter before long.

• • •

They say one of the Grit gentlemen in training for the Mayoralty race has made a fine start. He has caught a co'd already.

"Another Taxpayer" writes: "I think the objection to outsiders getting city water was a valid one. I would suggest that, in future, all people who live outside the limits, and have services installed, be required to pay double for them. In the case of outside people who have no services installed, but want them. I think they should pay for the installation of the services and a treble rate afterwards. Belleville advantages for Bellevillians is a good motto."

A despatch from Montreal announces that fourteen passenger conductors of the Grand Trunk Railway, operating between Portland and Toronto, have received their dismissal, and it is stated that some thirty others operating between Toronto and Chicago on the Grand Trunk will also be requested to hand in their resignations. The officials of the Grand Trunk, when questioned in regard to the dismissals, stated these employees' services had been dispensed with for good and sufficient reasons. It was alleged that dishonest action is the cause of most of the dismissals. Bellevillians will be pleased to see that no conductors operating between Toronto and Montreal are included in the list.

MR. REDMOND'S BOAST.

(Winnipeg Tribune.)

To believe in Home Rule for Ireland is one thing. To support such a man as John Redmond is quite another.

Redmond is the man who, in an interview with Harper's Weekly, boasted that the vaults of the British House of Commons are filled with measures favorable to Canada and the other colonies, which have been killed by the Irish Nationalist members of that House, who believe that the safest way to wreck the British Empire is to annoy the great colonies to such an extent that they will strike for Independence!

IN OLDEN TIMES

People Were Content to take Things Easier Than Now.

If our forefathers could behold the modern locomotives, automobiles and electric cars, they would hold up their hands in astonishment.

The stage-coach was fast enough then — people were more content to take things easy.

They used to be satisfied with any sort of a hair lotion that came along —if it did not prevent Baldness they thought it was because Baldness could not be prevented.

It's different now. People know that germs cause Baldness and that Newbro's Herpicide kills the germ, thus curing Dandruff and preventing Baldness.

Philharmonic Will Present "The Messiah"

Music-lovers of this city will be interested in learning that the local Philharmonic Society will shortly be reorganized and rehearsals begun for a presentation of "The Messiah" some time during the coming winter. "The Messiah" is a great work, but no doubt Belleville vocalists will do justice to it, under the capable directorship of Prof. Hunt.

Died in Prescott.

We condense from a lengthy obituary in the Prescott Messenger, the following which refers to the father of Miss Minnie Richardson, who is in charge of the C.P.R. Telegraph office in this city:

ROBERT RICHARDSON.

Mr Robert Richardson, an old and respected resident of town, died Sunday afternoon after a long sickness. Mr. Richardson, although being able to be around the house up to the day of his death, had been gradually failing for the past year, growing weaker every day.

Mr. Richardson was a man of strict integrity and was greatly respected by all who knew him. His reputation for straight-forward honest dealings will long be held as an example by all who knew him. As a friend he will long be remembered, and those who have ever enjoyed the hospitality of his home will never forget his kindly welcome. He was a man devoted to his family, and his death is felt very severely by them. In fact to every resident of town, the news of his demise, is heard with regret. In religion he was a Methodist. He was also a very loyal Orangeman. The funeral was held on Tuesday afternoon at 2.30. The service was at the house, conducted by the Rev. Robt. Smith, whose short address was delivered most feelingly. The attendance at he funeral was very large and a very representative one, all the principal business men being represented.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

Stomach Troubles and Constipation

No one can reasonably hope for good digestion when the bowels are constipated. Mr. Chas. Baldwin, of Edwardsville, Ill., says: "I suffered from chronic constipation and stomach troubles for several years. But thanks to Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets am almost cured." Why not get a package of these tablets and get well and stay well? Price 25 cents. Samples free. To be had at R. Templeton & Co., drug store.

There is a Danish proverb which runs, "No man is so tall that he need ever stretch; and none so small that he need never stoop." It might be added that no one is so rich that he need not read the advertisements.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

HOCKEY.

Some Arguments in Favor of Professionalism.

The Ottawa Citizen referring to hypocrisy in sport, says:

With the alleged amateur teams the executive is liable to be held up within five minutes of the commencement of an important game and forced to pay out money to a player before he will go on the ice or field as the case may be. Ottawa hockey crowds have had numerous experiences of sitting in a freezing rink for anywhere from an hour to an hour and a half while the management argued with members of the team who had seized the opportunity to strike them for more money just before the gong rang. Probably the most of the audience had no idea what the trouble was, but cases have occurred at critical matches where one or more of the players after putting on their uniforms have simply sat down and refused to go on the ice until their claim for cash was honored. Under the professional regime a player indulging in such tactics would run the risk of being set aside and could be prevented from playing with any other club for two years, and even then he must make a bona fide change of residence.

The action of the N.H.U. in openly adopting professionalism is to be commended for its honesty, for the better discipline which is possible and the better sport which is provided for the public. This may be put to the test during the coming hockey season. For the so-called amateur football and hockey clubs, in not one of which there are not paid men, to put on a "holier than thou" attitude and refuse to admit amateurs who have played in the N.H.U. would be rather a farce. The best thing for these clubs to do is to come out openly in recognition of professionalim as the lacrosse people have done and honestly appear before the public in their true colors.

Until this year lacrosse was conducted in the same manner as football and hockey have been and are still conducted. That is, under a hypocritical cloak of alleged amateurism the most flagrant professionalism was in vogue. Apart from the moral aspect of it which made it necessary for a player after having earned his wage to receive it clandestinely with his eyes shut and his hand behind his back, the executives of clubs which are professional in all but name are under heavy expense to players while at the same time being more or less at their mercy. When the professionalized clubs pay their players a regular salary it is a purely business transaction. Under the rules they can practically blacklist a player for two years if he try any hold-up tactics or otherwise misbehave himself

SPORTING NOTES.

Robertson, the speedy captain and rover of last year's Cobourg junior O.H.A team, well known here, has been located in Toronto since last spring, having been transferred here by the Dominion Bank. He will likely play with the Argonauts.

Manager Parkin, of the Lindsay junior hockey team has been giving an interview to the Post, in which he makes the following observations:—"The cigarette end of it troubled some of the boys last year, but those who had a few 'sub-rosa' at least cut the number down so materially that they were in pretty fair condition. This year it is no cigarettes or no hockey. If the game is not worth the cigarettes, stick to the cigarettes."

Sir Thomas Lipton, through his secretary, has stated that he had not announced his intention of again challenging for the America's Cup. He would not deny that he might challenge, but would have nothing definite to say on the subject before his conference with the officials of the New York Yacht Club.

Women and Missions.

WHAT WAS DONE AT RECENT SESSIONS OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE W. M. S. OF M. C.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

This session was opened by singing the Doxology and repeating the Lord's prayer.

Minutes of morning session were read and adopted.

Report of supply committee was read by Mrs. W. Briggs. This committee distributes bales and boxes of clothing, Christmas gifts to mission schools; books, pictures, toys, calendars, etc. Sixty-eight missions have been supplied in this way, over $7000 worth being distributed.

The hour with the missionaries was very interesting. Dr. Henry, Misses Brimstin, Crombie, Woodsworth, Wellwood and Steele were present.

Four of the young ladies will sail on the 26th November for China.

The new missionaries told of their call. Miss Wellwood stated that her first impression came when a child, reading stories of missionary life, and all through her life the call was stronger, until she was compelled to answer it. She was happy in the thought that she was now ready to go.

Miss Steele received her first impressions from her mother. Then a missionary from China had awakened her sympathy in that country.

Miss Woodsworth expressed pleasure in meeting the Board. She felt it a great honor to go to China now, but realized it to be a great responsibility She had been brought up in a home permeated with missionary influence. She asked for the prayers of the members that they might all be faithful.

Miss Crombie, who had spent a number of years in Japan, said she was glad to be a missionary. Her childhood heroes were always missionaries. She was longing for the day to come to return to her work. She wished to do her very best. She emphasized the value of One soul.

Miss Brimstin, who had served five years in the Chentu Orphanage in West China, said she had taken the promise, "Lo, I am with you alway,' with her to China, and had proved it to be true in days of discouragement and trial as well as in the bright days. She rejoiced because she was about to return. She considered it to be a great privilege to be a missionary.

Dr Henry, of China, also rejoiced in the privilege of having a part in the work. She could not magnify the great difficulties, and appealed earnestly for intercessors in prayers. In earnest words she told of the dire need of that country. Women in China had asked her to thank the W.M.S for sending them.

Miss Preston, of Japan, also felt it a great privilege to be a missionary. It was not always easy; it had many times been hard. She asked to be remembered also in prayer.

Mrs. Ross expressed the pleasure of the Board in having such daughters to send to represent them.

The communion was then dispensed to the members of the Board by the Rev. Mr. Wilson, Rev. Mr. Leitch, and Rev. Mr. Young.

THURSDAY EVENING.

Session was opened with devotional exercises, led by Mrs. Willmott and Miss Ogden.

The report of fields was continued by Mrs. Strachan.

The Work in China was considered.

Communications were read from the missionaries, giving detail regarding this work.

Dr. Henry was allowed to extend her furlough till after Christmas.

$2,000 was granted for a new building in Ren Show.

The missionaries had decided to open a school in Chentu for the instruction of Bible women, which was approved of by the Board.

It was decided to pay the registration fees and passports for the missionaries.

Re the French work, $8,000 was granted for a new building for the Orphanage.

Mrs Carman read the report from Miss Marconi, the superintendent of the Italian work in Toronto. She made 1460 visits to the homes, attended kitchen-garden classes, Women's meetings, Children's meetings and a general work in Sunday schools, etc.

Mrs. Carman spoke of the pressing need of a kindergarten in connection with this work, and estimated that $400 would be sufficient to establish the work. This grant was provided for.

The report of the literature and publication committee was presented by Mrs. Briscoe. There had been 4100 monthly letters, 1776 copies of Dux Christus, 1731 copies of Christus Liberator, 10,000 silver mite boxes and many thousands of leaflets of all kinds distributed.

The price of the monthly letter was increased to 10 cents a year.

The following statistical report was presented by Miss Ogden, secretary-treasurer of the literature depot.

GETTING ON.

(London Tribune.)

(According to Lord Rosebery, 'rush' is the chief cause of imbecility.)

'Tis neither wine nor worry
That dislocates the brain,
But our incessant hurry
In car and boat and train;
'Tis pace that kills
Our minds and wills,
And clears our topmost shelf;
He hard must ride
Who keeps beside Himself.

Emotion? Nay, 'tis motion
That doth the mind arrest.
Expression? I've a notion
'Tis how we are "expressed."
The motor car
Both fast and far
Our outward frame may bear,
But as we'light
We are not quite
All there.

In poring over vellum
In study day and night.
The human cerebellum
Preserves its balance right.
'Tis only pace
Befools the race;
So set your face, like flint,
Against the sin
Of rushing in-
To print.

Dr. John Watson already has charge of this department of the university's work. It is a peculiar situation that has grown out of the late insurance investigation and exposure in the United States. The policy-holders are organizing societies to protect themselves against being further robbed by the companies. Inasmuch as these companies exist for the avowed purpose of protecting the policy-holders, it is a curious and most ironical condition that makes it necessary for the insured to organize for protection against their protectors; yet you cannot wonder at it.

Leprosy is increasing in both North and South America. Columbia where there were only 400 lepers forty years ago, is said to have 40,000 now, and many find their way into the United States. Such a medical authority as Dr. Ashmead, who was formerly chief medical adviser to the Government of Japan, says the increase is alarming. When leprosy is brought into a new country it takes fifty years for the seeds to take root, and it becomes epidemic after some 200 years. It has been shown that mosquitoes are active in transferring the bacilli of leprosy.

The discussion rages at this moment about the question of appendicitis Prof. Dieulafoy, of the French Academy of Medicine, having delivered an opinion before a gathering of his colleagues that many persons were operated upon for the fashionable disease who did not have it at all, has let loose a flood of articles and interviews. The French doctor is not bound by the rigid etiquette of the profession in England, and talks freely to the reporter. Hence, we have a dozen different expert opinions on appendicitis and operations with which to instruct or confuse the public. The general verdict is that this is the age of operations. A few years ago surgeons did not operate enough; to-day they operate too much — that is the opinion of a leading member of the profession. If this theory be right, perhaps the day will dawn when the knife of the operator will be as rarely called in to aid the patient as the leech of the old-time apothecary.

Fifty Years Ago.

Toronto, Oct. 26.—It is fifty years ago to-day since the G. T. R. established through communication between Montreal and Stratford through Toronto.

Two Points of View.

On one occasion, at a party given by Sir John Millais, Lady Halle rose to play the violin, when to her intense amusement she heard Landseer exclaim: "Good gracious! A woman playing the fiddle!" On the other hand, an old fashioned nobleman when he saw a gentleman sit down to the piano contemptuously remarked, "I wonder if the creature can sew."

The Unwanted Sign.

A curious fact is mentioned in connection with the suicide of James Hoyle, a Preston publican. A painter was engaged in painting the sign outside and had finished the last letter of Hoyle's name when he heard the report of a pistol and found that the landlord had committed suicide.

Misleading Milestones.

At a meeting of the Roads Committee of the North Holland division of Lincolnshire, Mr. Gooch complained that the milestones on the Holbeach road were very inaccurate, and one against the churchyard wall contained six separate lies. He proposed it be re-lettered so that it was truthful, and this was agreed to.

250 Year Old Pipes.

During excavation under the council chamber of the Town Hall, Thame (Oxon), two small clay pipes were unearthed. They are believed to be the earliest form of smoking pipe, made 250 years ago.

Beards.

The plays, poems and treatises of the reigns of Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I. are full of amusing allusions to the variety of fashions in beards. We learn from them the various styles that were adopted by different wearers, such as the French, Spanish, Dutch and Italian cuts, the new, old, gentlemen's, common, court and country cuts.

East Winds.

There are twenty-two allusions in the Bible to the east wind, nineteen of them being of a disparaging character.

What is more distressing than Itching, Bleeding Piles? Some say the only cure is the knife. We say, operations are unnecessary. Read this letter:

"For years I had Piles, which protruded and bled freely. The itching pain was sometimes almost unbearable. Often I suffered so severely it was next to impossible to remain on duty. It was a hardship to walk. I tried many remedies, but with poor success.

"This winter, in New York—at the Bench Show—I suffered greatly—was almost compelled to remain in my room. I tried several remedies—without relief.

"On my return home, Mira Ointment was advised. I used it. In only a short time, all the irritation and pain ceased. I can now walk with ease and attend my duties as a member of the Fire Department.

"I strongly recommend Mira Ointment to anyone suffering from this annoying complaint.

TORONTO LIVE STOCK.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—Receipts of live stock at the city market since Tuesday, as reported by the railways, were 140 car loads, composed of 2439 cattle, 1627 hogs, 1681 sheep and lambs, 124 calves and 43 horses.

Exporters.

One load of exporters was reported sold at $4.40 per cwt. and a few bulls at $3.50 to $4 per cwt.

Feeders and Stockers.

There was an oversupply of stockers and feeders, especially of the common to medium light classes, which sold from 20c to 40c per cwt. lower. At the close of the market about ten loads were reported as being unsold.

Harry Murby, who bought about 600 this week, reports prices as follows: Best short-keep feeders, 1100 to 1200 lbs., $4 to $4.12½; best feeders, 1000 to 1100 lbs., $3.70 to $3.90; best feeders, 900 to 1000, at $3.35 to $3.75; light feeders, 800 to 900 lbs., $3 to $3.35; medium stockers, 600 to 800 lbs., $2.50 to $2.90; common stockers, $2 to $2.25 per cwt.

Milch Cows.

There was a brisk trade in milkers and springers, and altho there was a large number on sale, more good to choice milkers and forward springers would have found ready sale. Prices ranged from $35 to $65 each, only one reported at the latter figure.

The market for veal calves ruled strong at $3 to $7 per cwt., the bulk of them selling from $5.50 to $6.50. More prime calves are wanted.

Crimson Blind

BY FRED M. WHITE

Dr. Hatherly Bell," she said. "He used to be a famous man before he fell into disgrace over something or another. I heard him lecture on the animal instinct in Boston once, and he said—but as you don't care for dogs it doesn't matter what he said."

"Do you happen to know anything about him?" Henson asked.

"Very little. I never met him, if that is what you mean. But I heard that he had done something particularly disgraceful. Why do you ask?"

"Nothing more than a mere coincidence," Henson replied. "It is just a little strange that you should mention his name here, especially after what had happened last night. I suppose that, being an American, you fell in love with the Rembrandt. It was you who suggested securing it in its place, and then preventing my little jest from being successfully carried out. Of course you have heard that the print was stolen once?"

"The knowledge is as general as the spiriting away of the Gainsborough Duchess."

"Quite so. Well, the man who stole the Rembrandt was Dr. Hatherly Bell. He stole it that he might pay a gambling debt, and it was subsequently found in his luggage before he could pass it on to the purchaser. I am glad you mentioned it, because the name of Bell is not exactly a favorite at the castle."

"I am much obliged to you," said Chris, gravely. "Was Dr. Bell a favorite once?"

"Oh, immense. He had great influence over Lord Littimer. He—but here comes Littimer in one of his moods. He appears to be angry about something."

Littimer strode up, with a frown on his face and a telegram in his hand. Henson assumed to be mildly sympathetic.

"I hope it is nothing serious?" he murmured.

"Serious," Littimer cried. "The acme of audacity—yes. The telegram has just come. 'Must see you to-night on important business affecting the past. Shall hope to be with you some time after dinner!'"

"And who is the audacious aspirant to an interview?" Chris, asked, demurely.

"A man I expect you never heard of," said Littimer, "but who is quite familiar to Henson here. I am alluding to that scoundrel Hatherly Bell."

"Good heavens!" Henson burst out. "I—I mean, what colossal impudence!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

Chris gave Henson one swift searching glance before her eyes dropped demurely to the ground. Lord Littimer appeared to be taking no heed of anything but his own annoyance. But quick as Chris had been, Henson was quicker. He was smiling the slow, sad smile of the man who turns the other cheek because it is his duty to do so.

"And when does Dr. Bell arrive?" he asked.

"He won't arrive at all," Littimer said, irritably. "Do you suppose I am going to allow that scoundrel under my roof again? The amazing impudence of the fellow is beyond everything. He will probably reach Moreton Station by the ten o'clock train. The drive will take him an hour, if I choose to permit the drive, which I don't. I'll send a groom to meet the train with a letter. When Bell has read that letter he will not come here."

"I don't think I should do that," Henson said, respectfully.

"Indeed! You are really a clever fellow. And what would you do?"

"I should suffer Bell to come. As a Christian I should deem it my duty to do so. It pains me to say so, but I am afraid that I cannot contravert your suggestion that Bell is a scoundrel. It grieves me to prove any man that. And in the present instance the proofs were overpowering. But there is always a chance—a chance that we have misjudged a man on false evidence."

"False evidence! Why, the Rembrandt was actually found in Bell's portmanteau."

"Dear friend, I know it," Henson said, with the same, slow, forgiving smile. "But there have been cases of black treachery, dark conspiracies that one abhors. And Bell might have made some stupendous discovery regarding his character. I should see him, my lord; oh, yes, I should most undoubtedly see him."

"And so should I," Chris put in, swiftly.

Littimer smiled, with all traces of his ill-temper gone. He seemed to be contemplating Henson with his head on one side, as if to fathom that gentleman's intentions. There was just the suspicion of contempt in his glance.

"In the presence of so much goodness and beauty I feel quite lost," he said. "Very well, Henson, I'll see Bell. I may find the interview diverting."

Henson strolled away with a sigh of gentle pleasure. Once out of sight he flew to the library, where he scribbled a couple of telegrams. They were carefully worded and related to some apocryphal parcel required without delay, and calculated to convey nothing to the lay mind. A servant was despatched to the village with them. Henson would have been pleased had he known that the fascinating little American had waylaid his messenger and read his telegrams under the plea of verifying one of the addresses. A moment or two later and those addresses were carefully noted down in a pocket-book. It was past five before Chris found herself with a little time on her hands again. Littimer had kept her pretty busy all the afternoon, partly because there was so much to do, but partly from the pleasure that he derived from his secretary's society. He was more free with her than he had been with any of her sex for years. It was satisfactory, too, to learn that Littimer regarded Henson as a smug and oily hypocrite, and that the latter was only going to be left Littimer Castle to spite the owner's other relations.

"Now you run into the garden and get a blow," Littimer said at length. "I am telling you a lot too much. I am afraid you are a most insinuating young person."

Chris ran out into the garden gaily. Despite the crushing burden on her shoulders she felt an elation and a flow of spirits she had not been conscious of for years. The invigorating air of the place seemed to have got into her veins, the cruel depression of the House of the Silent Sorrow was passing away. Again, she had hope and youth on her side, and everything was falling out beautifully. It was a pleasanter world than Chris had anticipated.

She went along more quietly after a time. There was a tiny arbor on a terrace overlooking the sea to which Chris had taken a particular fancy. She picked her way daintily along the grass paths between the roses until she suddenly emerged upon the terrace. She had popped out of the roses swiftly as a squirrel peeps from a tree.

Somebody was in the arbor, two people talking earnestly. One man stood up with his back to Chris, one hand gripping the outside ragged bark of the arbor frame with a peculiarly nervous, restless force. Chris could see the hand turned back distinctly. A piece of bark was being crumbled under a strong thumb. Such a thumb! Chris had seen nothing like it before.

It was as if at some time it had been smashed flat with a hammer, a broad strong, cruel-looking thumb, flat and sinister-looking as the head of a snake. In the centre, like a pink pearl dropped in a filthy gutter, was one tiny, perfectly-formed nail.

The owner of the thumb stepped back the better to give way to a fit of hoarse laughter. He turned slightly aside and his eyes met those of Chris. They were small eyes set in a coarse, brutal face, the face of a criminal, Chris thought if she were a judge of such matters. It came quite as a shock to see that the stranger was in clerical garb.

"I—I beg your pardon," Chris stammered. "But I——"

Henson emerged from the arbor. For once in a way he appeared confused, there was a flush on his face that told of annoyance ill suppressed.

"Please don't go away," he said. "Mr. Merritt will think that he has alarmed you. Miss Lee, this is my very good friend and co-worker in the field, the Reverend James Merritt."

"Is Mr. Merritt a friend of Lord Littimer's?" Chris asked, demurely.

"Littimer hates the cloth," Henson replied. "Indeed, he has no sympathy whatever with my work. I met my good friend quite by accident in the village just now, and I brought him here for a chat. Mr. Merritt is taking a well-earned hioliday."

Chris replied graciously that she didn't doubt it. She did not deem it necessary to add that she knew that one of Mr. Henson's mystic telegrams had been addressed to one James Merritt at an address in Moreton Wells, a town some fifteen miles away. That the scoundrel was up to no good she knew perfectly well.

"Your work must be very interesting," she said. "Have you been in the Church long, Mr. Merritt?"

Merritt said hoarsely that he had not been in the Church very long. His dreadful grin and fog voice suggested that he was a brand plucked from the burning, and that he had only recently come over to the side of the angels. The whole time he spoke he never met Chris's glance once. The chaplain of a convict prison would have turned from him in disgust. Henson was obviously ill at ease. In his suave, diplomatic way he contrived to manoeuvre Merritt off the ground at length.

"An excellent fellow," he said, with exaggerated enthusiasm. "It was a great day for us when we won over James Merritt. He can reach a class which hitherto we have not touched."

What People You Know Say About Gin Pills

TORONTO, June 6th, 1905.

I take great satisfaction in writing to you and telling you of the splendid condition of health that I am now in, which was brought about entirely by taking your Gin Pills.

For years my kidneys have been my weak spot and kept me unhealthy, and although I knew the cause, I could not get relief. Six weeks ago I heard that Gin Pills were being widely sold in Ontario, and I concluded to try them, though I did not believe that they could entirely cure me, but they have, and I am now sure that my kidney trouble has disappeared.

I will always have some of the pills on hand, and will recommend them to my friends who are troubled with ailments due to the defective work of their kidneys.

Yours respectively,
F. H. BASKERVILLE.

Sold by druggists, 50c a box, or 6 boxes for $2.50. We send sample free if you mention this paper.

THE BOLE DRUG CO. • WINNIPEG MAN.

"He looks as if he had been in gaol," Chris said.

"Oh, he has," Henson admitted, candidly. "Many a time."

Chris deemed it just possible that the unpleasant experience might be endured again, but she only smiled and expressed herself to be deeply interested. The uneasiness in Henson's manner gradually disappeared. Evidently the girl suspected nothing. She would have liked to have asked a question or two about Mr. Merritt's thumb, but she deemed it prudent not to do so.

Dinner came at length, dinner served in the great hall in honor of the recently arrived guest, and set up in all the panoply and splendor that Littimer affected at times. The best plate was laid out on the long table. There were banks and coppices of flowers at either corner, a huge palm nodded over silver and glass and priceless china. The softly shaded electric lights made pools of amber flame on fruit and flowers and gleaming crystal. Half-a-dozen big footmen went about their work with noiseless tread.

Henson shook his head playfully at all this show and splendor. His good humor was of the elephantine order, and belied the drawn anxiety of his eyes. Luxurious and peaceful as the scene was, there seemed to Chris to be a touch of electricity in the air, the suggestion of something about to happen. Littimer glanced at her admiringly. She was dressed in white satin, and she had in her hair a single diamond star of price.

"Of course Henson pretends to condemn all this kind of thing," Littimer said. "He would have you believe that when he comes into his own the plate and wine will be sold for the benefit of the poor, and the seats of the mighty filled with decayed governesses and antiquated shop-walkers."

"I hope that time may long be deferred," Henson murmured.

"And so do I," Littimer said, drily, "which is one of the disadvantages of being conservative. By the way, who was that truculent-looking scoundrel I saw with you this afternoon?"

Henson hastened to explain. Littimer was emphatically of opinion that such visitors were better kept at a distance for the present. When all the rare plate and treasures of Littimer Castle had been disposed of for philanthropic purposes it would not matter.

"There was a time when the enterprising burglar got his knowledge of the domestic and physical geography of a house from the servants. Now he reforms, with the great advantage that he can lay his plan of campaign from personal observation. It is a much more admirable method, and tends to avert suspicion from the actual criminal."

"You would not speak thus if you knew Merritt," said Henson.

"All the same, I don't want the privilege," Littimer smiled. "A man with a face like that couldn't reform; nature would resent such an enormity. And yet you can never tell. Physically speaking, my quondam friend Hatherly Bell has a perfect face."

"I confess I am anxious to see him," Chris said. "I—I heard him lecture in America. He had the most interesting theory about dogs. Mr. Henson hates dogs."

"Yes," Henson said, shortly, "I do, and they hate me, but that does not prevent my being interested in the coming of Dr. Bell. And nobody hopes more sincerely than myself that he will succeed in clearly vindicating his character."

Littimer smiled sarcastically as he trifled with his claret glass. In his cynical way he was looking forward to the interview with a certain sense of amusement. And there was a time when he had enjoyed Bell's society immensely.

"Well, you will not have long to wait now," he said. "It is long past ten, and Bell is due at any moment after eleven. Coffee in the balcony, please."

It was a gloriously warm night, with just a faint suspicion of a breeze on the air. Down below the sea beat with a gentle sway against the cliffs; on the grassy slopes a belated lamb was bleating for its dam. Chris strolled quietly down the garden with her mind at peace for a time. She had almost forgotten her mission, for the moment. A figure slipped gently past her on the grass, but she utterly failed to notice it.

"An exceedingly nice girl, that," Littimer was saying, "and distinctly amusing. Excuse me if I leave you here—a tendency to ague and English night air don't blend together."

CHAPTER XXX.

It was the very moment that Henson had been waiting for. All his listlessness had vanished. He sprang to his feet and made his way hurriedly across the lawn. Dark as it was, he slipped along with the ease of one who is familiar with every inch of the ground. A man half his weight and half his age could have been no more active.

He advanced to what seemed to be the very edge of the cliff and disappeared. There were rocks and grassy knolls which served as landmarks to him. A slip of the foot might have resulted in a serious accident. Above the gloom a head appeared.

"That you, Merritt?" Henson asked, hoarsely.

"Oh, it's me right enough," came the muttered reply. "Good job as I'm used to a seafaring life, or I should never have got up those cliffs. Where's the girl?"

"Oh, the girl's right enough. She's standing exactly where she can hear the cry of the suffering in distress. You can leave that part of the drama to me. She's a smart girl with plenty of pluck, but all the same I am going to make use of her. Have you got the things?"

"Got everything, pardner. Got a proper wipe over the skull, too."

"How on earth did you manage to do that?"

"Meddling with Bell, of course. Why didn't you let him come and produce his picture in peace? We should have been all ready to flabbergaster him when he did come."

"My good Merritt, I have not the slightest doubt about it. My plans are too carefully laid for them to astray. But, at the same time, I firmly believe in having more than one plan of attack and more than two ways of escape. If we could have despoiled Bell of his picture it would have been utterly useless for him to have come here. He would have gone back preferring to accept defeat to arriving with a cock-and-bull story to the effect that he had been robbed of his treasure on the way. And so he got the best of you, eh?"

"Rather! I fancied that I was pretty strong, but—well, it doesn't matter. Here I am with the tools, and I ain't going to fail this time. Before Bell comes the little trap will be ready and you will be able to prove an alibi."

Henson chuckled hoarsely. He loved dramatic effect, and here was one to hand. He almost fancied that he could see the white outline of Chris's figure from where he stood.

"Get along," he said. "There is no time to lose."

Merritt nodded and began to make his way upward. Some way above him Chris was looking down. Her quick ear had detected some suspicious sound. She watched eagerly. Just below her the big electric light on the castle tower cast a band of flame athwart the cliff. Chris looked down steadily at this. Presently she saw a hand uplifted into the belt of flame, a hand grasping for a ledge of rock, and a quickly stifled cry rose to her lips. The thumb on the hand was smashed flat, there was a tiny pink nail in the centre.

Chris's heart gave one quick leap, then her senses came back to her. She needed nobody to tell her that the owner of the hand was James Merritt. Nor did she require any fine discrimination to perceive that he was up to no good. That it had something to do with the plot against Bell she felt certain. But the man was coming now, he could only reach the top of the cliffs just under the wall where she was standing. Chris peered eagerly down into the path of light until the intruder looked up. Then she jerked back, forgetting that she was in the darkness and absolutely invisible. The action was disastrous, however, for it shook Chris's diamond star from her head, and it fell gently almost at the feet of the climber. An instant later and his eyes had fallen upon it.

"What bloomin' luck," he said, hoarsely. "I suppose that girl yonder must have dropped it over. Well, it is as good as a couple of hundred pounds to me, anyway. Little missie, you'd better take a tearful farewell of your lumps of sugar, as you'll never see them again."

To Chris's quivering indignation he slipped the star into his breast-pocket. Just for the moment the girl was on the point of crying out. She was glad she had refrained a second after, for a really brilliant thought occurred to her. She had never evolved anything more clever in her life, but she did not quite realize that as yet.

Nearer and nearer the man with the maimed thumb came. Chris stepped back into the shadow. She waited till the intruder had slipped past her in the direction of the castle, and prepared to follow at a discreet distance. Whatever he was after, she felt sure he was being ordered and abetted by Reginald Henson. Two minutes, five minutes, elapsed before she moved.

What was that? Surely a voice somewhere near her moaning for help. Chris stood perfectly still, listening for the next cry. Her sense of humanity had been touched, she had forgotten Merritt entirely. Again the stifled cry for help came.

"Who are you?" Chris shouted. "And where are you?"

"Henson," came the totally unexpected reply. "I'm down below on a ledge of rock. No, I'm not particularly badly hurt, but I dare not move."

Chris paused for a moment, utterly bewildered. Henson must have been on the look-out for his accomplice, she thought, and had missed his footing and fallen. Pity he had not fallen a little farther, she murmured bitterly, and broken his neck. But this was only for a moment, and her sense of justice and humanity speedily returned.

"I cannot see anything of you," she said.

"All the same, I can see your outline," Henson said, dismally. "I don't feel quite so frightened now. I can hang on a bit longer, especially now I know assistance is at hand. At first I began to be afraid that I was a prisoner for the night. No; don't go. If I had a rope I should have the proper confidence to swarm up again. And there is a coil of rope in the arbor close by you. Hang it, straight down over that middle boulder and fasten your end round one of those iron pilasters."

The rope was there as Henson stated; indeed, he had placed it there himself. With the utmost coolness and courage Chris did as she was desired. But it took some little time to coax the rope to go over in the proper direction. There was a little mutter of triumph from below, and presently Henson, with every appearance of utter exhaustion, climbed over the ledge to the terrace. At the same moment an owl hooted twice from the long belt of trees at the bottom of the garden.

"I hope you are none the worse for your adventure?" Chris asked, politely.

Henson said sententiously that he fancied not. His familiarity with the cliffs had led him too far. If he had not fallen on a ledge of rock goodness only knows what might have happened. Would Chris be so good as to lend him the benefit of her arm back to the castle? Chris was graciously willing, but she was full of curiosity at the same time. Had Henson really been in danger, or was the whole thing some part of an elaborate and cunning plot? Henson knew perfectly well that she had taken a great fancy to the upper terrace, and he might——

Really it was difficult to know what to think. They passed slowly along till the lights here and there from the castle shone on their faces. At the same time a carriage was driven up to the hall door and a visitor was getting out. With a strange sense of eagerness and pleasure Chris recognized the handsome features and misshapen shape of Hatherly Bell.

"The expected guest has arrived," Henson said.

There was such a queer mixture of snarling anger and exulting triumph in his voice that Chris looked up. Just for an instant Henson had dropped the mask. A ray of light from the open door streamed fully across his face. The malignant pleasure of it startled Chris. Like a flash she began to see how she had been used by those miscreants.

The Lonely Life

The Tragic Confession of a Spinster, Who Realizes That No Fame or Wealth Can Compensate for the Solitude of Her Life.

In this article the author, whose name for obvious reasons we are not at liberty to disclose, drops for once the mask which she in common with other "Bachelor Maids," is accustomed to turn to the world.

Though no longer young, she frankly says she longs for the companionship of a husband and the care of children. The circumstances which have kept from her the happiness which these blessings bring are stated with the same directness which characterizes the whole article. It is the life-story of a "successful" woman, a drama of real life in which the last act is a tragedy.

He is very handsome," she contrived to say, steadily.

"Handsome is that handsome does," Henson quoted. "Let us hope that Dr. Bell will succeed in his mission. He has my best wishes."

Chris turned away and walked slowly as possible up the stairs. Another minute with that slimy hypocrite and she felt she must betray herself. Once out of sight she flew along the corridor and snapped up the electric light. She fell back with a stifled cry of dismay, but she was more sorrowful than surprised.

"I expected it," she said. "I knew that this was the thing they were after."

The precious copy of Rembrandt was no longer there!

CHAPTER XXXI.

There were more sides to the mystery than David Steel imagined. It had seemed to him that he had pretty well all the threads in his hands, but he would have been astonished to know how much more Hatherly Bell and Enid Henson could have told him.

But it seemed to Bell that there was one very important thing to be done before he proceeded any farther. He was interested in the mystery as he was interested in anything where crime and cunning played a part. But he was still more intent upon clearing his good name; besides, this would give him a wider field of action.

In the light of recent discoveries it had become imperative that he should once more be on good terms with Lord Littimer. Once this was accomplished, Bell saw his way to the clearing up of the whole complication. It was a still greater advantage to discover the hero of the cigar-case and the victim of the outrage in Steel's conservatory was the graceless scamp Van Sneck, the picture dealer, who had originally sold "The Crimson Blind" to Lord Littimer.

It was all falling out beautifully. Not only had Van Sneck turned up in the nick of time, but he was not in a position to do any further mischief. It suited Bell exactly that Van Sneck should be hors de combat for the moment.

The first thing to be done was to see Lord Littimer without delay. Bell had no idea of humbly soliciting an interview. He proceeded to a telegraph office the first thing the following morning and wired Littimer to the effect that he must see him on important business. He had an hour or two at his disposal, so he took a cab as far as Downend Terrace. He found Steel slug-hunting in the conservatory, the atmosphere of which was blue with cigarette smoke.

"So you are not working this morning?" he asked.

"How the dickens can I work?" David exclaimed, irritably. "Not that I haven't been trying. I might just as well take a long holiday till this mystery is cleared up for all the good I am. What is the next move?"

"My next move is to go to Littimer and convince him that he has done me a great wrong. I am bound to have Littimer's ear once more."

"You are going to show him the spare Rembrandt, eh?"

"That's it. I flatter myself I shall astonish him. I've sent a telegram to say I'm coming to-day, after which I shall proceed to storm the citadel. I feel all the safer because nobody knows I have the engraving."

"My dear chap somebody knows you have the picture."

"Impossible!" Bell exclaimed. "Only yourself and Enid Henson can possibly be aware that——"

"All the same, I am speaking the truth," David said. "Last night when you went into the hospital you gave me the print to take care of. At the

PRICE PROTECTION

What's to prevent a retail dealer who sells a not-priced shoe from sizing you up as a well dressed prosperous person and charge you $6.50, or $5.50, or $4.50 for a $3.50 shoe? Never thought of that, did you.

What do you know about the quality or value of a shoe? Nothing! You can't tell whether a dealer should charge you $3.50 or $6.50. Even if you were an expert you couldn't tell, as all shoes look alike when painted and polished. Paint and polish veneer cover up a multitude of shoe sins.

There's but one way you can prevent the dealer from overcharging you. There's but one way for you to know that you're paying the right price. That way is to buy a Slater in an authorized and chartered Slater Shoe Store or Agency.

That store is bound by contract to sell genuine Slater Shoes and to sell them at not one cent higher, nor one cent lower than, $3.50 and $4.00, for women and $4.00 and $5.00 for men.

Besides, the price is labelled on the lining of each and every Slater Shoe.

Moreover, our advertisements proclaim from the house tops that the price of Slater Shoes is $3.50 and $4.00 for women and $4.00 and $5.00 for Men.

You've absolute Price Protection in the Slater Shoe. Costs a dollar less than the best American makes, and is precisely the same shoe. For men and women.

Orangemen Object to Home Rule Idea.

Toronto, Oct. 25.—"Resolved, that in view of the visit of Mr. T. P. O'Connor to this city, and the demonstration that was organized in favor of home rule for Ireland, the members of this Loyal Orange Lodge of Toronto desire to place on record an expression of their profound sympathy with the Unionist cause in Great Britain, and to protest with all the emphasis of which they are capable against the adoption of any measure that will endanger the unity of the Empire."

Such was one clause of a resolution unanimously passed last evening by the County Orange Lodge. The resolution further recited:

"And be it resolved, that we declare our firm conviction that the sentiment of Canada is overwhelmingly opposed to Home Rule or devolution, knowing as we do that the adoption of resolutions by Parliament and the appearance of public men upon the platform at Home Rule demonstrations is entirely without significance beyond the fact that they desire to strengthen their position by catering to the Irish Catholic vote.

"We desire also to assure our brethren in Ireland of our deep sympathy with them in the present crisis, believing that their fears of unjust treatment under any system of Home Rule are well founded. We find warrant for this belief in the riotous and unseemly conduct of the members from the County Councils, and must conclude that an Irish Parliament elected by the same constituencies would be of the same character."

Rough Skin and Chapped Hands?

ZAM-BUK IS THE THING!

Literary Notes

ROD AND GUN FOR NOVEMBER.

A wide range of subjects, all dealing with outdoor life in Canada, find places in the November number of "Rod and Gun and Motor Sports in Canada," published by W. J. Taylor, at Woodstock, Ont. The opening paper describes a trip to Abittibi, the fine northern lake, one of the shores of which is to be traversed by the Grand Trunk Pacific. A study of the American Golden-Eye, by Mr. Bonnycastle Dale, follows. Dr. Franklin Hawley, whose paper on Scientific Deer Hunting in the October number created great interest amongst hunters on both sides of the line, follows it up with another one on "Some Common Mistakes of the Deer Hunter"—a paper which will serve to maintain the interest the first one created. How very wide is the interest felt in the subject of game protection is shown by a paper summarising the legislative attempts and achievements throughout Canada and the States during the sessions of 1906. The stir in the province of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on this subject is also dealt with in two well informed papers. The illustrations in this number are particularly fine, and include a series of western views of great interest to Alpine Club members. There are many other papers, and the whole number sustains in every page the high character which distinguishes the magazine.

Hid Marriage License

Kingston, Ont., Oct. 25.—This morning the police had a peculiar call. A foreigner on Princess street was scheduled to be married to a Picton girl, and the latter had arrived with her parents. The younger brother of the groom-to-be did not want his brother to have a wife, and he concocted a scheme to put off the wedding. Stuck behind the clock was the marriage license, and this the young man secured and hid. Consternation reigned when the time of the ceremony arrived, and the young man was accused of doing away with the license. He refused to give information. Without the license the wedding could not proceed, and it was deemed best to call the police, who succeeded in securing the document. The young brother became frightened when told he would be sent to prison, and finally, when another look came to be taken behind the clock, the license was found, having been slipped back. Then the wedding proceeded.

SELECTIONS

AN EXCITING TRIP.

The Varied Perils of Navigation on the Yukon River.

Getting on a sand bar is a part of the Yukon programme, and we reached this act early in the afternoon of the first day. The river is constantly changing, and a new channel is made each year. All steamers carry huge poles, known as shears, or sometimes called "ships' legs." When a sand bar is struck the pole is dropped off the side and stands upright in the sand. A pulley is attached at the top, the engine is started and the boat lifted and swung forward six or eight feet. This process is repeated until the vessel is clear of the bar. During the jumping off process the passengers are sent aft in order to lift the bow. When somebody stupidly asked the captain how long we were going to stay at this point he answered, "Anywhere from an hour to a week." We were lucky in being fast for only two hours. The Selkirk, which followed a day later, spent the entire night on the same obstruction. Soundings were taken with a gaudily painted pole, which suggested a Fourth of July pole vaulting exhibition. The man who did the measuring had a singsong way of speaking, and he constantly drawled, "Two feet—two and a half—three feet—no bottom—four feet," until we were in deep water.

Late in the afternoon we reached Lake La Barge. Here the ice was from ten to eighteen inches thick and spread from shore to shore like a great field of snow. We pushed on, while the sharp ice pounded savagely against the hull, which was built of inch and a half planks. It scraped and cut the sides of the boat and buckled and formed little ice mountains over the lake. We ran slower and slower until, after cutting through five miles, the captain decided that we could go no farther in safety, so the Casca tied up at an uninhabited island to wait until the sun and wind should cause the ice to break. The mosquitoes welcomed us and came aboard by the thousand. Some of the passengers rushed ashore and built a huge fire out of old logs in order to protect themselves from the pests; others climbed to the top of a hill and sat in a row like so many owls. All day Sunday we waited. The crew carried logs aboard and built an ice plow for the boat. After twenty-four hours' delay we cast off and went into the ice. The river is tortuous and muddy, and in many places the current runs nine miles an hour. Narrow gorges are entered, and at Five Finger rapids we were treated to the sensation of running the rapids between rocks scarcely twice the width of our boat apart. This place is considered extremely dangerous, and boats coming up the river, in order to avoid being dashed against the rocks, pick up a cable fastened on shore for that purpose and by winding it around the capstan pull themselves up the rapids.—Mrs. C. R. Miller in Leslie's Weekly.

Crushing a Clerk.

He was rather carelessly dressed, yet any one who is at all an observer could have seen at a glance that his clothes were of excellent material and had evidently been made by a good tailor. But the clerk in the hat shop was young, and he stood by watching the customer pull over an assortment of colored hatbands until he struck one that caught his fancy. "I'll take this one," he said, handing it to the clerk.

"That's the New York Yacht club colors," remarked the clerk, as if that settled the question. The customer looked at him sharply and repeated his statement that he would take the blue and red and white band he held in his hand.

"But you don't want that," protested the clerk. "That's only worn by members of the New York Yacht club."

"I'm one. Just put it on my hat, sonny," said the man dryly. The clerk wilted at once.—New York Press.

The Power of Gasoline.

In the tests recently made over country roads between New York and New Haven to determine how far two gallons of gasoline are capable of driving an automobile sixty-five machines of many sizes and types were used. The best performance was by a four cylinder machine of twelve horsepower, which ran eighty-seven miles. Another machine of the same make and same pattern ran only fifty-eight miles. The Iron Age points out that a weight of 1,500 pounds was moved eighty-seven miles on two pounds of gasoline, which means a ton mile for half a cent.

The Eiffel Tower.

"An immense nail disgracefully transfixing the sky" is the effective description of the Eiffel tower with which a band of aesthetics have started a crusade against the offending structure. They have consecrated themselves to preserving and increasing the beauty of Paris and cry loudly for the destruction of the ridiculous eyesore as their first effort in that direction. The Eiffel tower was originally regarded as a great wonder.

Monks as Automobilists.

The monks of St. Bernard, in the Alps, are soon to appear as automobilists. They have received permission to run automobiles between the hospices of Grand St. Bernhard and Simplon and Domo d'Ossola and Aosta. The chauffeurs will be chosen from the monks themselves, who will wear cowls.—London Mail.

VOLUNTEER CYCLISTS.

Cycle Proves of Remarkable Value In Military Manoeuvres—Cyclist Soldiers Unchasable and Destructive.

Of late years we have become quite accustomed to see great gatherings of troops on and around Salisbury Plain, more especially during the early days of August, but this year the authorities had arranged a novelty. For three days great bodies of cyclist soldiers scoured and fought over the downland and pedalled silently through the tiny townlets that lie slumbering under the hills of the south country.

They are fine fellows, these cyclist-volunteers; longer of limb and broader in the chest for the most part than their brethren of the infantry battalions. They are also, to judge by their faces, younger, and look full of energy of the wiry description.

In their eyes is the sparkle that reminds one of the colonial troopers who fought with us in South Africa. This is perhaps due to their military training as scouts, or perhaps to the intelligence of the class from which they are recruited.

Splendid Qualities.

Their bodies and their minds harmonize wonderfully well together. During the three days' campaigning, when they constantly underwent much privation and endured real hardship and discomfort, I never heard a man grumble at his lot, nor saw one try to shirk his task.

Dog-tired, hungry, with eyes red from want of sleep, these young citizen soldiers were always ready to "jump" at the word of command, or to mount sentry in the night without a word of complaint. Such is the material to our hand. Do we know how to make the most of it?

Unhappily, neither their present organization nor their training is calculated to get the best value out of their splendid qualities. The cyclist company is a farce—a farce invented to pander to the pride of the colonel who commands the infantry battalion of which it is a part.

The colonel's only desire is to have as many men as possible with cycles to march on parade in front of the band while the battalion goes through evolutions to the admiration of the onlookers. He cannot drill them on his parade ground, because their movements would upset those of the infantry—nor would it do the cyclists much good if he could.

Casual Methods.

To tell the truth, he does not really know what to do with them except at inspection, so he hands them over to the care of some more or less competent infantry subaltern, and tells him to take them away and do what he likes with them.

Some cyclist companies have been lucky in the choice of the officer thus detached, and then all goes smoothly and the best results are obtained. But in most cases the officer chosen has no particular qualifications for the post. An infantryman himself, he knows little of cyclist tactics, and as he does not propose to remain in the cyclist company for the remainder of his service, he does not think it worth his while to acquire the knowledge which he does not possess.

There is but one way to overcome this state of affairs, and that way is sufficiently obvious. It is the way which has for years past been advised by all cyclist officers who are interested in the future of military cycling—to abolish cyclist companies, as such, and to replace them by cyclist battalions commanded and officered throughout by men prepared to specialize in the subject.

Superior to Horse.

Then and only then, shall we be able to reap the full benefit of the magnificent material that lies ready to our hand. Nor would such a scheme of reorganization cost the country a penny-piece; the whole evolution can be brought about by a scratch of the pen in Pall Mall, and by a few months' assiduous labor on the part of a few enthusiastic officers.

So much for the men, their officers and their organization. I would turn for a moment to consider what these cyclist manoeuvres have taught us as to the tactical value of the cycle as a means of locomotion.

The cycle has proved itself infinitely superior to the horse. It requires no rest, no vast supplies of forage, no sentries in the horse-lines. When the cyclist's day is completed he throws his machine under a hedge and gives it not another moment's thought until it is time to be off again.

True, at times he has to dismount and mend a puncture, but critics are prone vastly to over-estimate this disadvantage. It should be remembered that no puncture takes more than fifteen minutes to mend, and it is a model horse that never casts a shoe or suffers from saddle galls.

The cyclist can cover comfortably, day in and day out, 50 miles, and still be game to put up a very pretty fight at the other end.

At present the English army can only boast of some 5,000 cyclists—all volunteers. It should make a general shudder to think what havoc such a body of men might work against him—operating now on one flank, now on the other, cutting up his communications; ten times as elusive as any DeWet, intangible, unchasable and destructive.

France has realized their value and is raising 18 battalions. Germany is sitting, undecided, upon the fence. Here in England we have the men, but, alas, we must wait as usual, for the organization.

Was Benefit to England.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid, the American ambassador, delivered the inaugural address at the summer meeting of extension students in the Senate House at Cambridge, his subject being the rise of the United States and tendencies of its development.

He suggested that by the separation from England both the British people and their colonizing sons had profited. The triumph of America checked a reaction in England, and the British Government of the nineteenth century was distinctly more advantageous to the people, more glorious for the nation, and a greater beneficence to Europe and the world, because of this struggle with the colonists in the last quarter of the eighteenth.

A HILLTOP BAPTISM.

Strange Religious Ceremony In An Old Druid Haunt.

A remarkable christening has recently taken place in a remote part of Derbyshire, Harborough Hill, in the western portion of the county, said to have been a haunt of the Druids, and apparently used both for worship and as a place of burial.

Some years ago a number of human skulls, which had been compactly buried there in some distant century, were unearthed at the summit of this lofty ridge, which commands a view over six counties, terminating in the peak of Snowden, the latter being easily visible on a clear day. The hill bristles with fantastic dolomite crags, some of which were, it is supposed, shaped by the Druids for ceremonial purposes.

A big block of limestone has been carved into a capacious chair; another rock, with a flat top, appears to have been used as an altar, and an adjacent monolith, in which a semicircular bowl has been scooped out, looks like a rude font. It was with water from this ancient rock bowl that the child — the daughter of a farmer in the district—was lately christened. The little girl, three months old, was carried up to this wild, bleak spot, accompanied by numerous relatives, including, of course, the necessary godfather and godmother, and there, with the wind howling among the crags, baptism was administered by a lay reader.

There is no record of any similar rite having been celebrated on Harborough Hill, and the conditions of this picturesque baptism appear to be quite unique.

At School 107 Years Ago.

The vicar and the schoolmaster at Church Minshull, England, have been examining the papers relating to the day school, and they have discovered the following document:

Rules to be observed by the scholars of the Free School of Church Minshull.

Rule the First—Every boy and girl shall appear at school precisely at seven in summer and at eight in winter; and for every morning in the week that he is absent from school at prayers he shall have a task of ten lines, to be got the succeeding night; and if absent more than once in one week an addition of five lines to be made to his former task for not getting of which he shall be punished.

2. For the support of neatness and decency every boy shall come clean washed and combed.

3. Every one shall be provided with pens, ink, and a book for reading, or be sent home till they be provided.

4. If anyone absents himself from school without leave from his master or a note from his friends, for the first offence he shall have a task, for the second he shall be severely punished.

5. He that tells a lie, swears, steals, or is guilty of profane or debauched language, shall for the first offence be admonished, and for the second be severely punished.

6. If anyone breaks a window he shall pay for it; if it be not done he shall be excluded the school.

7. Every boy that is idle and talkative in school hours shall be spoke to once or twice, and if persisting be corrected accordingly.

8. Two impositors shall be chosen by weekly rotation, whose office shall be to keep the keys, acquaint the master when coals are wanting, and see that the school be kept clean. For every omission of his duty he shall be punished.

9. That justice may be impartially distributed, and to prevent complaints of severity, if any boy pleads not guilty to any rules, he shall be tried by five of his schoolfellows and condemned or acquitted.

10. And to encourage diligence two books will be given every Christmas by the master to the two boys who in their several classes have behaved best, and made the greatest improvement in learning.

Lastly. That as one may plead ignorance, or expect indulgencies allowed, these rules shall be read over by the master four times in the year, at the commencement of every quarter, and a copy of them also shall be placed on the wall in the most conspicuous part of the school, and no one shall be admitted into this school who will not submit to be governed by them.

Terms: Reading free, after children have learned words of three letters; writing, per quarter, 5s.; writing and arithmetic, 7.s 6d.; entrance, 1.s 6.; cock-pence, 6d.

18 day of Sep., 1799.

We approve of the above rules.

For Lovers of Dickens.

Readers of "Nicholas Nickleby" will remember the "little cottage at Bow," where the hero took his mother and sister to live whilst he served the genial Brothers Cheeryble. The Dickens Fellowship, to whose labors the public owe so much of reminiscence, have identified the spot with the Grove Hall Estate, which was, until recently, the site of a private lunatic asylum. The estate is surrounded by a high wall, upon which to this day the back gardens of some cottage abut, so that here we have the origin of the comical story of Mrs. Nickleby's lunatic admirer. The Council of the Fellowship whose address is Whitcomb House, Whitcomb street, W. C., now suggest that the estate, which is in the market, and comprises a dozen acres of nicely wooded land, might be acquired as a public recreation ground. Dickens himself would have been delighted at such a proposal, and crowded Bow would be equally pleased.—London Chronicle.

Sermon Stealers.

"Sermon stealers," said a minister, "ought to be careful. They ought to read over several times the sermons that they steal before delivering them.

"I know a young man of twenty-one or twenty-two who preached a stolen sermon he had not read over, and in a most impressive part he found himself declaiming, 'My friends, when I first came among you more than forty years ago these thin, white locks were thick and brown and this bent back,' etc.

"Another sermon stealer, preaching in a village of about 100 souls, said, before he could check himself, 'In the teeming streets of this great metropolis.'"—London Mail.

Has Taken a Thousand

Zutoo

Always Cured Headache.
Never Affected her Heart.

Here is a testimonial from the wife of Doctor W. L. Shurtleff, K.C., of Coaticook, Que., who has taken a thousand Zutoo Tablets (the Japanese Vegetable Headache remedy.)

It should convince any doubting one, that while the tablets cure headache, they do not, like the drug cures, affect the heart, nerves or stomach. No one would or could take such a number if they were not perfectly harmless. Mrs. Shurtleff herself had to discard the drug cures.

Here is what she says:

I have always been a great sufferer from headache, and have taken a great many headache cures. I found that after taking them for a time they caused palpitation of the heart. Three years ago I began using Zutoo. I have likely taken over a thousand tablets. I have never yet felt the least ill-effect from using them and they cure my headaches as quickly as any remedy I ever took.

They are Harmless as Soda.

There Are Seven

pairs of muscles provided by nature to properly control the lids and to move the eyes in unison with each other. Some of the movements of the eye-balls require (as in a running scale on a piano) a marvellously rapid succession of rhythmic contractions and relaxations of one set of eye muscles after the other. The possible combination in seven is almost infinite, yet the brain has at times to make and unmake every possible combination of the eye muscle at the proper moment with startling precision, and marvellous quickness, in order to place the two eyes in the proper relation to moving objects, so that the two retinal pictures can be fused into one conscious visual impression through the medium of the brain cells and nerve fibres; when we stop to think what we are able to see out of the window of an express train, while the objects seen are flitting past at a frightful speed; when we consider that each thing that we see has to be properly focused by two cameras at the same instant, in order to make our brain cells conscious of but one object; when we consider the strain on these muscles and brain cells are kept up for 16 hours each day, is it any wonder that so many people are suffering from a variety of nervous diseases as a result? We give "Repression Lenses," that reverse and relieve this strain and rest the muscles. Consultation free.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

ROSELLE KNOTT AS THE "DUCHESS OF DEVONSHIRE."

A good house, but by no means so large as the attraction deserved, greeted Miss Roselle Knott and her fine company at the Carman last night, when they presented the romantic comedy drama, by Mrs. Charles E. Doremus, "The Duchess of Devonshire." A well-written play, splendidly staged, handsomely costumed and exceedingly well acted, was what Belleville theatre-goers got for their money last night. It is safe to say, without a particle of exaggeration, that no better attraction, in any sense, has been seen in this city for years—if ever. Undoubtedly a small fortune has been expended on the costumes and appointments, which were nothing short of perfect. The authoress, Mrs. C. A. Doremus, has, in the past, had much good work to her credit, but nothing better than "The Duchess of Devonshire." And the part of the Duchess, who before her marriage was Lady Georgina Spencer, and who is best known perhaps for having won a vote for Charles James Fox by having bought it from a butcher with a kiss, and who later sat for a portrait, the theft of which made modern police history on two continents, was played to the life by Miss Roselle Knott, who throughout acted in a way which amply sustained the great reputation she has enjoyed in Canada. As before stated, the company was a large and distinctly capable one. If one began to point the actors out for commendation, he would be compelled, in common honesty, to mention the whole cast. Suffice it, therefore, to say that Miss Knott's support was quite worthy of her own splendid acting, and that no better-pleased audience ever left a Belleville playhouse than that which saw "The Duchess of Devonshire" last night. Manager Carman certainly deserves the thanks of local theatre-goers for excellent attractions he has given them so far this season.

"CHARLIE'S AUNT."

An elaborate revival of the best farcical comedy seen in this country in twenty years, "Charlie's Aunt," with the jolly mirth inciter, Etienne Girardot, in his original role, will be the offering at the Carman next Tuesday night, and both the merry farce and jolly comedian will doubtless be received with shouts of approval and uproarious laughter, for both are big favorites everywhere, and Mr. Girardot's faculties for creating laughter are potent. An unusually strong company has been engaged to support Mr. Girardot, and the same artistic stage settings seen in the phenomenally successful revival in New York last spring will be used in the presentation here.

A COUNTY CASE.

The attention of the Magistrate was occupied yesterday afternoon in hearing evidence in a case from the County. A boy named Percy Jackman, aged about 12 years, was charged with causing bodily harm to a lad named Thos. McQuigge. It appears that the boys attended school together near Wellman's Corners, and a few days ago McQuigge was kicked by Jackman and the result was somewhat serious. After hearing the evidence the case was dismissed, as it was shown that it was purely an accident whilst the boys were at play upon the school grounds. Mr. Anderson represented the Crown and Mr. Porter appeared for the defendant.

The Last Rites

The remains of the late Mr. W. D. Chisholm were yesterday afternoon consigned to the tomb. Many citizens were in attendance at the obsequies. Services at the house were conducted by the Rev. R. S. Wallbridge, W. Thomson, A. Gillen, J. Caidwell and W. S. Morden.

Amongst those at the funeral were Messrs. W. E. Foster, E. Donald and W. Waterson, former associates of the deceased in the late Mr. John Bell's office, but at present in the legal department of the G. T. R. at Montreal.

Elevator Accident.

MR CHARLES DULMAGE HAD A PAINFUL EXPERIENCE THIS MORNING.

Mr Charles Dulmage, a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Laidlaw & Ketcheson, this morning sustained painful, but fortunately not serious, injuries. He was upon the second floor of the firm's premises, and, desirous of reaching the third floor, jumped upon the elevator as it was moving upwards. The result was that in some manner his face came in contact with a glass partition, and, the glass being broken, cut the young man's face badly. He was removed to the hospital, where his injuries were attended to by two physicians. No blame is attached to any one for the accident but the unfortunate victim, as he was disobeying rules in getting upon the elevator when in motion Mr. Dulmage is a well known young man of this city and is a son of Mr. M. C. Dulmage, residing on Lewis street.

Mr. Cameron Explains His Peculiarity.

To the Editor of The Intelligencer:

Sir,—In regard to your recent criticism of the Thanksgiving concert in Bridge Street Church, Monday evening, I wish through your valuable columns to suggest to your capable musical critic some few points which have evidently been assimilated by him in a rather distorted manner. I did not sing well Monday evening for a very good reason—having been informed by a specialist in Toronto that it would be necessary for me to undergo an operation on my head, the obstruction of the nasal passages preventing my tone being properly resonant, and keeping my throat constantly irritated.

I am at present merely filling engagements previously contracted for, and for the reason given, the favorable remarks in regard to "Flexibility and richness of tone," almost border on satire. My remarks are particularly in regard to the added criticism offered in regard to an evidently portable article, "The vibrato," which I am accused of attaching to my person at times. In the first place the term used is entirely erroneous, signifying a very different phase of vocalization. What is referred to is evidently a "tremolo," or a disagreeable shaking of the voice, and in regard to which I have questioned many eminent singing teachers, and been assured in each case of entire freedom from any such affectation.

There is in the singing world a term "tone wave," signifying a broad wave in one's voice coming from an entirely unrestricted production, of which I have been informed by one of the world's greatest artists I am the happy possessor, the result of singing with a loose and open throat (an absolute requirement, and which, with proper breathing power, forms the basis of the great Italian school of singing.) The study of physics teaches us that all free vibrations travel in waves, and the same law applies to the human voice. A long wave in a sustained full tone, without disturbing the pitch, is proper, and no full, perfectly produced voice is without it, but of course a rapid wavering of the voice, preventing the listener from readily discerning on what particular note the singer has pitched the voice, is objectionable and unpardonable. (I might mention one of Belleville's prominent singers, Miss Bawden, in whom I am only interested as the possessor of a beautiful full voice, who possesses the proper "tone wave.") After Madame Albani's concert last spring, I fully expected to see in your columns voluminous remarks in regard to the vocalists possessing the heinous virtue of a "vibrato," as in each case they were possessed of perfectly free middle voices, at least. Doubtless space forbade their being scored on this point, to their unquestioned satisfaction. In many cases nervousness will cause a slight trembling of the voice and who knows but some subtle hyper-sensitive warning of the dread presence of the august musical critic of The Intelligencer has been conveyed to the unfortunate vocalist interested, and detracted from the cornet production preferred.

The "judge not" phrase in Scripture might be in this instance supplemented by some such remark as "unless you are at least slightly acquainted with the subject," or, "unless your schooling along certain lines has been of a nature to enable you to do so intelligently" (this is not a pun), and this reminds me of one of Dr. Torrington's stories of an English collier, who, when asked if he could tell the time, said, "No, I cawnt, but I cawn feight and can stand a thoomp as well as any mon," evidently possessing his capabilities as well as limitations. My intentions are of the most amiable and unwarlike character, but if I can do anything to straighten out the tangle of wrong ideals, without questioning too closely the judgment of our most prominent "second violin," I shall be happy to have spent even his time in doing so. I do not intend to start a controversy and shall not waste any more time on the subject.

Yours very truly,
DAN A. CAMERON.

EDITOR'S NOTE. — Mr. Cameron seems to think The Intelligencer gave him credit to which he is not entitled — a really sad state of affairs. Few people have to complain of such injustice. In the present case Mr. Cameron's ponderous and withering sarcasm has completely crushed the unfortunate "musical critic," who has not studied "sound waves" and "open throats," but is disposed to call a discord a discord, whether it be made by a professor or a ploughboy. As Mr. Cameron acknowledges that his peculiarity is a natural one, and not acquired, he is entitled to our sympathy. He claims he has not "the vibrato." As he seems fond of anecdotes we might tell a story of a party who went to a drug store and asked for a certain article. The urbane clerk said; "No, we don't keep that, but we have something just as good." But we admit Mr. Cameron's naivete. After indulging in personal references, the cheapest and most obnoxious form of argument, he disclaims any intentions of being "warlike." This reminds one of the native of the Emerald Isle, who used to knock his friends down with bricks, as a joke. One word in conclusion; Mr. Cameron seems to try to convey the impression that shaking of the voice is with him involuntary — something which cannot be helped. If one dared to dispute the statement of such an authority as Mr. Cameron he might refer to the last production of the local Philharmonic Society, when Mr. Cameron sang one of the leading roles, with a smooth and even tone which would have delighted that arch-enemy of the "vibrato," Mr. Watkin-Mills. Many people in the audience remarked the absence of the "tremolo," and all agreed that Mr. Cameron had never sung so well in Belleville. The Intelligencer begs to hope that the ailment with which Mr. Cameron is suffering may soon yield to treatment. Its remarks in regard to him were meant in the kindliest spirit. Au revoir.

It was unanimously decided to appoint an additional Field Secretary to look after the Elementary Department; to publish a newspaper monthly, and to get $4,000 more than usual to send a Field Secretary for two years to the Northwest. Mr. Wm. Johnson, of Belleville, was appointed the Chairman of a special committee to attend to this Forward Movement.

Progressive Platform of Dr. Weldon, Conservative Candidate in Queen's-Shelburne—Text of His Manifesto.

Halifax, N. S., Oct 26.—Dr. Weldon, Conservative candidate in Queen's and Shelburne, has issued a manifesto as follows:

"Gentlemen,—Having accepted the nomination of the Liberal-Conservatives of your constituency as candidate for the election to be held on Oct. 31. I beg leave to ask the support of all who are in sympathy with the views herein set forth, and who believe that, in the event of victory we will do our best to keep our word.

"I regret that the Government has allowed so few days to hear the candidates and their friends discuss the momentous issues which are before us. It will be impossible for me in the short time allowed to meet personally any considerable part of the electors, but we shall hold as many meetings and see as many of the electors as possible.

"If elected I will use my influence in Parliament to secure clean elections and thereby lessen the influence of unscrupulous corporations; lighten the burdens of the common people; check the shameful waste of the people's money; drive out of the public service the many thieves whom the Laurier Government has allowed to fatten at our expense; help our fishermen to secure better markets; bring into the eastern provinces immigrants where needed; amend the life insurance laws and ensure safer policies and lower premiums; and secure the repeal of the Indemnity Act of 1905."

Representation Concerning Labor Immigration to Canada.

London, Oct. 26.—W. L. Mackenzie King had a lengthy interview with Lord Elgin as to the possibility of introducing legislation on the subject of false representation to induce or deter immigration to Canada.

It has been the subject of a conference between the Home and Colonial Offices. It is understood the matter is being further considered by the Cabinet, and Mr. King is to have another interview with Lord Elgin, when it is expected the intentions of the Government will be made known.

Mr. King had an interview with Hon. John Burns and Hon. Sydney Buxton. The latter, who was the author of the fair wages resolution in the Commons, asked Mr. King to forward for his consideration copies of the regulations and fair wages schedules as adopted by the Canadian Government.

Notable Feature of Manoeuvres Was Portable Wireless Outfit.

Changtofu, Oct. 26.—A notable feature of the autumn manoeuvres of the Chinese imperial army has been the presence in the field of portable wireless telegraphy apparatus carried upon light wagons and so adjusted that it can be erected in less than 30 minutes.

Experienced military observers are of the opinion that with the exception of certain minor defects and making allowances for the fact that these operations were an experiment, the manoeuvres were almost equal to those conducted in European countries.

The artillery and the principal equipment of the troops were manufactured in Japan.

It is estimated that the manoeuvres cost $500,000.

Rubber Factory Sold.

Montreal, Oct. 26.—The Maple Leaf Rubber Co. of Port Dalhousie, Ont., has been purchased out and out by the Canadian Consolidated Rubber Co., possession being taken yesterday. The capital of the Maple Leaf Co. is $300,000, but the Consolidated decline to state the purchase price, except that it was a cash transaction.

Labor's Threat.

Montreal, Oct. 26.—Alphonse Verville, M. P. for Maissonneuve, declared last evening that if the Government placed a candidate in the field in St. Mary's he would oppose their nominee to the bitter end.

Wrecked On Pacific Coast.

Victoria, B. C., Oct. 26.—News of the wreck of the barkentine Shagit has been received here. Captain Voss volunteered to go to the rescue, and the crew were brought ashore.

Bury Rifles In Sea.

Havana, Oct. 26.—The statement made by Secretary of War Taft on the eve of his departure from Cuba that he would put all the arms surrendered by the insurgents where they would do no further harm was verified Wednesday when a company of the Cuban artillery spent the afternoon throwing these weapons into the sea from the outer bastion of Morro Castle. Thousands of rifles and carbines were sunk in thirty fathoms of water.

Boys Find Dead Body.

Ayton, Oct. 26.—As two boys were walking through a small bush on Koehler's farm yesterday morning they came across the dead body of Duncan McPhee, a farmer, who lived near Alsfeldt, who has been missing from home for two weeks, the body was badly decomposed.

FINISHES SUN LIFE CO.

Actuarial Methods of the Company Probed by Commission.

Secretary Macaulay Comes Out In Favor of Strict Legislation Against Rebating—Suggests, Instead of High Standard of Reserve, That British System Be Followed in Canada—The Salaries of the Officers.

Montreal, Oct. 26.—The examination of the Sun Life was concluded yesterday afternoon here by the insurance commission. To-day the last company to figure in the proceedings in Montreal, the Royal Victoria, will come up.

Dominion Counsel Shepley said that to-day would finish the work of the commission in this city.

The commission will meet in Ottawa on Wednesday next to conclude necessary preliminaries before making up their report to Parliament.

The last session of the Sun Life examination was interesting, as showing the actuarial methods of that company, which differ materially from those of other companies in Canada. It was marked by a vigorous protest from T. B. Macaulay, secretary of the company, against the form issued by the commission to ascertain profit and loss to insurance companies.

Expense of New Business.

Witness insisted that loading was not the only item to be charged against the expense of new business, but that lapse gains and other natural sources should be added. Mr. Macaulay was one of the few witnesses yet heard by the commission to say that he was in favor of strict legislation against rebating. The law was made necessary, he said, by exposures of the prevalence of the evil, as everybody will now ask for rebate.

He also protested against the law requiring insurance companies to keep up a very high standard of reserve, and suggested something more like the British system, where companies are left more or less to their own initiative.

Mr. Shepley questioned the Sun Life secretary as to salaries in the company. For president and secretary there has been an arrangement for $1,000 increase each year since 1902. Next year the president will be getting $20,000 and the secretary $15,000.

At the conclusion of the examination by Mr. Shepley, Ald. Geary of Toronto, junior counsel for Ontario, took witness over several technical points in the evidence.

Deferred Policies.

The interests of policyholders in connection with deferred policies was the matter under discussion in the morning.

It was in 1886 that policies deferring for stock began to be shown. Mr. Macaulay said that there was nothing wrong, or immoral or objectionable in the system. He maintained that thousands of persons now insured would never have been so but for the fact that the companies have this system of insurance. The popularizing features of the scheme were that investments for the future were made far more permanent. The mortality, after five years, was marvelously low. Yet there were cases of deceit in connection with medical inspection. People had been squeezed through by the help of the doctors. In the earlier years the death rate was abnormally low. The feature in favor of deferred dividends was of persons hanging on to their policies. It made insurance more persistent.

Mr. Macaulay, in answer to the query that he appealed to the speculative interest, said he would not call it speculative.

A MANAGER RESIGNS

P. Marshall Ostrom Writes to the Insurance Commission and Retires From the Field.

Winnipeg, Oct. 26.—Announcement was made here that P. Marshall Ostrom, of Toronto managing director of the Monarch Life Insurance Co., had resigned. His resignation is the direct outcome of insurance investigations.

Mr. Ostrom has sent the following communication to the insurance commission, which holds all stock that had been issued to him by Acting Vice-President Dr. Graham, which action caused so much comment before the commission:

"I desire to advise you that since testifying before your commission I have arranged with the executive of the Monarch Life Insurance Co. to retire from the company. I have also arranged with the company that all the stock filed with you, and which was issued to me, shall be handed back to Hon. Robert Rogers, chairman of the executive, and I have also arranged with the company and have surrendered all contracts of every nature and kind made by me with the company. This is to authorize you to deliver to Hon. Robert Rogers, or his appointee, all papers, etc., filed by me with the commission, also all the contracts."

Dies From Scalds.

Peterboro, Oct. 26.—Lucy Lemoire, aged 16, of Hastings, died in St. Joseph's Hospital, from injuries received by her dress catching fire several days ago. The young lady stepped on a match, which ignited and set fire to her clothes. In the excitement her sister threw a pot of boiling water on the girl in an attempt to put out the flames. As a result, in addition to being burned, Miss Lemoire was badly scalded.

Judge of Victoria County.

Lindsay, Oct. 26.—The vacancy in the position of police magistrate for Victoria County, caused by the death of the late J. McSweyne, has been filled by the appointment of F. D. Moore.

Claim Files From Archives.

Kingston, Oct. 26.—The Kingston News will seek to recover from the Provincial Archives files of The Kingston Gazette, which, it is alleged, were taken from The News office.

Major Dreyfus' Command.

Paris, Oct. 26.—Major Dreyfus, who was detailed for duty with one of the artillery regiments at Vincennes, has been given an independent artillery command at St. Denis.

BORDEN IN NORTH BRUCE.

Conservative Leader Scores On Aylesworth—Importance of Public Opinion in Corruption Revelations.

Wiarton, Oct. 26.—A fine meeting in the interest of Abram McLellan, the Conservative candidate in the bye-election, was held here last night and was addressed by R. L. Borden, leader of the Opposition in the Commons, Dr. Sproule, M.P. (South Grey), and William Jackson, M.P. (West Elgin), were also present and delivered short speeches. The chair was occupied by James Hunter.

Mr. Borden's speech was one of the most forcible arraignments of electoral and administrative corruption ever heard in this riding. He devoted some attention to Mr. Aylesworth's speech of Wednesday night and was loudly applauded when he declared that Mr. Aylesworth would some day learn that the demands of public opinion were of more importance than the carrying into effect of the exact letter of the law.

The exposures of the last session at Ottawa formed the text of Mr. Borden's speech, and he characterized them as more scandalous than anything that had ever taken place in the history of Canada.

He did not blame the Government because some of its Ministers had indulged in work of this kind or in scandalous extravagance and granting of rake-offs to middlemen, but when these matters were brought to the attention of Parliament and of the Government by an Opposition; that Government would be derelict in its duty if it did not have them probed to the bottom. The fault should be placed in the right quarter and justice meted out.

O'MEARA ARRESTED.

Was In Company With Tom Lewis—Perjury Charge Against Him.

Toronto, Oct. 26.—John O'Meara, who is wanted in Toronto in connection with the bribery investigation, was arrested in London yesterday afternoon by Detective Wallace of Brantford.

Wallace was walking alone on the street when he saw O'Meara with Tom Lewis. He knew his man, as he arrested him in Brantford for impersonating a voter at the Heyd-Henry election some years ago. Wallace positively identified O'Meara.

The prisoner was taken to the police station and handed over to Detective Reburn. He will be brought to Toronto this morning by Detective Newton.

Major Beattie will come to Toronto to identify O'Meara in the police court. Another man, Joseph Piggott, who saw the prisoner in the police station in Brantford, will also be asked to identify him.

The charge is perjury, and Mr. DuVernet will assist in the prosecution.

It will be remembered that on Monday O'Meara, who had been arrested in London on Saturday as a material witness, swore positively that he was not the O'Meara who took part in the Brantford election. He protested in strong language against the treatment accorded "an innocent man," and so stoutly did he deny all accusations that the crown let him go, apologizing for having made a mistake.

Catarrh of the Stomach

A PLEASANT, SIMPLE, BUT SAFE AND EFFECTUAL CURE FOR IT.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Catarrh of the stomach has long been considered the next thing to incurable. The usual symptoms are a full or bloating sensation after eating, accompanied sometimes with sour or watery risings, a formation of gases, causing pressure on the heart and lungs, and difficult breathing, headaches, fickle appetite, nervousness and a general played out, languid feeling.

There is often a foul taste in the mouth, coated tongue, and if the interior of the stomach could be seen it would show a slimy, inflamed condition.

The cure for this common and obstinate trouble is found in a treatment which causes the food to be readily, thoroughly digested before it has time to ferment and irritate the delicate mucous surfaces of the stomach. To secure a prompt and healthy digestion is the one necessary thing to do and when normal digestion is secured the catarrhal condition will have disappeared.

According to Dr. Harlanson, the safest and best treatment is to use after each meal a tablet composed of Diastase, Aseptic Pepsin, a little Nux, Golden Seal and Fruit Acids. These tablets can now be found at all drug stores under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and not being a patent medicine can be used with perfect safety and assurance that healthy appetite and thorough digestion will follow their regular use after meals.

Mr. R. S. Workman, Chicago, Ill., writes: "Catarrh is a local condition resulting from a neglected cold in the head, whereby the lining membrane of the nose becomes inflamed and the poisonous discharge therefrom passing backward into the throat, reaches the stomach, thus producing catarrh of the stomach. Medical authorities prescribed for me for three years for catarrh of stomach without cure, but to-day I am the happiest of men after using only one box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I cannot find appropriate words to express my good feeling. I have found flesh, appetite and sound rest from their use."

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the safest preparation, as well as the simplest and most convenient remedy for any form of indigestion, Catarrh of Stomach, biliousness, sour stomach, heartburn and bloating after meals.

A THREE-WEEKS' BATTLE

Begins in House of Lords Over Education Bill.

Bristles With Contentions Points Relating to Religious Instructions—Unionists, Under Leadership of Church Dignitaries, Determined to Amend It to Provide for Denominational Instruction in Schools.

London, Oct. 26.—The crucial stage of the education bill was reached yesterday, when the measure came before the House of Lords for detailed debate.

Unless the peers should decide to postpone consideration of the bill until a judicial decision is rendered upon the question of the liability of local educational bodies for the expenses of religious education, the Upper House is likely to be the scene for some time to come of the bitterest legislative fight witnessed in the British Parliament of recent years.

Contentious Points Bristle.

The bill bristles with contentious points, but the main battle centres on the clauses relating to religious instruction.

The Liberals are allegedly immovably pledged that there shall be no denominational teaching at the public expense, while the Unionists, under the leadership of great church dignitaries, both Church of England and Catholic, are outwardly as unalterably determined to amend it so that children of parents belonging to these churches shall have denominational religious instruction during school hours.

The debate is expected to last three weeks.

WOMAN DETERMINED TO DIE.

Escapes From Hospital and Ends Her Life in River.

Peterboro, Oct. 26.—Mrs. Andrew Johnson, the wife of a Smith Township farmer, committed suicide yesterday morning at 6 o'clock by jumping into the Otonabee River at Argyle street, in this city.

A few days ago Mrs. Johnson attempted to kill herself by taking carbolic acid, but was caught in time to prevent her from taking very much of the poison. She was brought to the Nicholls Hospital here and was apparently fully recovered.

Yesterday morning, when the night and day nurses were changing, she gathered up a bundle of clothes and escaped down the fire escape from the third storey. At 6.45 her body was found in three feet of water at the end of Argyle street.

The unfortunate woman had suffered from nervous prostration over money matters.

She leaves a husband and three children, and was 40 years of age.

JAPS EXCLUDED FROM SCHOOL.

Action of 'Frisco Authorities Leads to Unpleasant Feeling.

Washington, D. C., Oct. 26.—Viscount Aoki, the Japanese ambassador, at a conference with Secretary Root yesterday, made the request in behalf of his Government, that the United States see that the Japanese subjects in California were accorded their full rights under the treaty of 1894, including the public schools of San Francisco.

Secretary Root will take the matter up with the President, and it is likely that representation will be made to the authorities of California.

The ambassador said the exclusion of Japanese children from San Francisco schools was the chief cause of the harsh criticism of the United States.

Feeling Not General.

Tokio, Oct. 26.—It is definitely believed here that the anti-Japanese feeling existing in America is confined to the labor element in California. The tone of the Japanese press is sobering down.

NEWFOUNDLAND CONSULTED.

Kept Informed of Negotiations, But Didn't Concur in Agreement.

London, Oct. 26.—The Parliamentary Secretary of the Colonial Office, Winston Spencer Churchill, when questioned in the House of Commons yesterday on the subject of the recent Anglo-American agreement in regard to the Newfoundland fisheries, said that the Government of Newfoundland had been consulted before any negotiations were begun and was fully informed of their progress at each stage.

The British Government, however, the Secretary added, was not so fortunate as to obtain a concurrence of Newfoundland in the provisional agreement, which the circumstances rendered necessary.

His Death Was Sudden.

Toronto, Oct. 26.—"I wish to God I was dead!" said William Coleman, when Consatble Hamilton took him in charge at 9 o'clock yesterday morning. Two hours later his wish was gratified in the ambulance while on his way from No. 1 police station. William, or "Bill" Coleman, as his acquaintances called him, has been a well known character in Toronto for years. He was about 64 years of age and leaves a widow, who resides in Oxford street. John B. Anderson, 22 1-2 Alice street, is a brother-in-law. Some 30 years ago he organized an amateur minstrel organization, which became popular. Coroner Johnson will hold an inquest.

After Unbiased Verdict.

Ottawa, Oct. 26.—The inquest on the dead strikers, Belanger and Theriault, at Buckingham, will commence to-day. Coroner McMahon of Montreal arrived there yesterday and gave instructions for empaneling a jury of eight English and eight French-speaking men, none of whom were on the Warner inquest or are strikers or Maclaren employes.

Three Miners Asphyxiated.

New Philadelphia, O., Oct. 26.—The bodies of three miners, who had died by inhaling gas, were found yesterday, as the day shift of miners went to work in the James Mullen Mine, No. 1, near this city.

REBELLIOUS CLERGY.

Must Yield to France or Property Will Be Sequestered.

Paris, Oct. 27.—The Cabinet has reached a decision regarding the application of the law providing for the separation of church and state, by which the property for revenues of the churches, in the event of the clergy persisting in their present rebellious attitude, will be sequestered Dec. 11, but the churches themselves will remain open for public worship under the law of assembly of 1881 during the ensuing year before the law goes finally into effect.

In the meantime, should the clergy refuse to yield, a Ministerial declaration will be issued, indicating very clearly the intention of the Cabinet to ask Parliament for special legislation to meet the situation.

Give Impetus to Schism.

Some of the newspapers declare that the Council of State is prepared to render a decision that only associations formed with the consent of the former church wardens and parish priests are legally entitled to take over church property, those formed by outsiders having no previous connection with the church wardens or parish priests being irregular. If this proves to be correct, the decision will give an impetus to schism, as of all the associations thus far constituted but two have the concurrence of both the parish priest and church wardens, and these have been formally interdicted by the bishops.

Threat to Priests.

Bordeaux, Oct. 27.—Cardinal Lecot, Archbishop of Bordeaux, has issued an appeal to the faithful not to join "false Catholics and bad priests" in the formation of associations to take over church property; warned the parishioners who disobey his injunction that they will loose the right to confess and receive the sacrament, and notified the priests that they will be prohibited from preaching and administering the sacrament, adding that those "who thus wrongfully acquire church property will not only die in a state of sin, but the obligation will rest upon their posterity so long as the memory of the robbery endures."

New York, Oct. 27.—The World prints a story that the Duke and Duchess of Marlboro have finally parted. The King interferred in the affair and a settlement has been arrived at.

The duke's infatuation with a beautiful society woman is given as the principal cause of the trouble.

The duchess was Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt of New York.

R.L. Borden Answers Aylesworth on School Question.

It Was Not Justice or Wisdom To Force Upon the Millions of the Great West a Tentative Agreement That Had Been Entered Into Many Years Ago Previously When the Population Was Only About Five Hundred.

Kincardine, Oct. 27.—R. L. Borden was the chief speaker at a great Conservative rally in the opera house last night. The theatre was filled to the doors, and the utmost enthusiasm prevailed. Mr. Borden was given a splendid reception.

Col. Hugh Clark, M. P. P., for North Bruce, also spoke. Mr. Loscombe, K. C., was chairman, and also on the platform were Mayor Temple and Rev. Messrs. Ryan and Miles.

Col. Clark spoke of the record of the Government as one of a series of practically uninterrupted broken promises. They had promised economy, but the only instance outstanding of economy had been of Hon. Clifton Sifton, who, out of his small salary as Minister of the Interior, had been able to save a million dollars. (Laughter.)

Vulgar Bribery.

Bribery, wholesale and retail, had been experienced. Whenever there was an election on, the Government suddenly discovered that there was need of a fish hatchery at Wiarton. The hatchery was a good thing, but its introduction at this time was vulgar bribery. Hon. Mr. Hyman's appearance at lake ports in the company of the Liberal candidate, inspecting wharves and suggesting others, could only be construed as cheap and nasty politics.

Mr. Borden dealt with the prosperity cry, the school question, and the scandals which had alarmed the country. He had challenged the Government to place a finger upon one act of theirs which had been conducive to the present prosperity. Had Sir Wilfrid Laurier brought about the prosperity existing in Great Britain, in Germany or the United States?

The School Question.

Taking up the school question Mr. Borden said he had not desired to touch upon this matter. Hon. Mr. Aylesworth had, however, thrown down the gauntlet and he was impelled to take it up, and to repeat what he had contended for in the House of Commons. He held that it was not justice or wisdom to force upon the millions of the great West a tentative agreement that had been entered into many years ago previously when the population was only about 500. His solution of the matter was the true solution. He was not opposed to separate schools.

An address of welcome on behalf of the town was read by Mayor Temple, and Mr. Loscombe also presented an address to Mr. Borden on behalf of the Liberal-Conservative Association of North Bruce. The meeting broke up with the customary cheers.

Mr. Maclean At Tara.

Tara, Oct. 27.—W. F. Maclean, M.P., addressed a large meeting here last night in the interest of Abram McLellan, the Conservative candidate in North Bruce.

THE ROYAL VICTORIA.

Cost Little to Organize This Life Company—Insurance Investigation Concludes at Montreal.

Montreal, Oct. 27.—Evidence in the investigation of the Royal Victoria Assurance Co. of Montreal was concluded yesterday, and with it ended the session of the Insurance Commission in Montreal.

Chief emphasis was laid in the evidence of David Burke, general manager, on the small cost with which the company had been organized. He stated that the entire cost of stock, Parliamentary expenses, etc., had been only $1,700, and the Royal Victoria, unlike many new companies, had never had any bonuses or gifts from shareholders or directors.

No Dividends For Long Time.

Mr. Burke had organized the company. The men he sought to interest in the first place were A. F. Gault, James Crathern, Senator Forget, Senator Mackay and S. Finley. In the matter of inducements there was nothing of a personal character held whatever. The witness had pointed out to the stockholders that a considerable period must elapse before there could be any dividend. He had never felt safe in naming any definite period, and he had never discounted any notes.

The capital stock authorized was a million dollars, and the sum was now subscribed. No premium had been charged for the stock, but the cost of obtaining business was not so great then as now.

Rebates Prohibited.

The policyholders took no part in the annual meetings. It was true that if the directors were so determined, no policyholders could participate in person except at meetings called to increase the capital stock. The matter had never been discussed by the directors. No compensation was given to agents, where they had to give a rebate. In every instance it was prohibited.

Estimates were readjusted in 1900, judgment of surrounding conditions and previous experience setting the rate. A comparison of different insurance in different years was then gone into. The Royal Victoria estimate had been lowered in recent years annually.

The Commission adjourned until 11 o'clock Wednesday next in Ottawa, when the I. O. F. will be resumed.

THE SAME O'MEARA.

Four Witnesses Testify to His Identity—Magistrate Refuses Bail.

Toronto, Oct. 27.—Yesterday John O'Meara of London, who on Monday in the Police Court swore he had no connection whatever with the Brantford election of some years ago and that he had never met John O'Gorman, now on trial for election conspiracy, during the Heyd-Henry election in 1897, was brought before Magistrate Denison on a charge of perjury and postively identified by four witnesses as the man arrested in Brantford for impersonation.

J. Walter Curry, K. C., has been retained with Robinette, Godfrey & Phelan for the defence. O'Meara was locked up last night, as no argument could induce the magistrate to grant bail. The case will be continued on Wednesday when the bribery cases are resumed.

TWO PRISONERS ESCAPE.

Use Iron Pump to Scale Wall and Jump to Liberty.

Brampton, Oct. 27.—A man named Macdonald, who is in jail on a charge of attempted murder, escaped from jail last night. A prisoner charged with a minor offence also escaped. They slipped out of the corridor door, which had been left open, pulled up an iron pump about 25 feet long, stood it against the wall, climbed to the top and dropped over.

The sheriff offers a substantial reward for recapture.

Decides What is "Dead Animal."

Hamilton, Oct. 27.—The decision of Justice Anglin in the Stroud case caused general rejoicing last evening amongst the members of the Board of Health. The Police Court decision was to the effect that offal from slaughtered animals might be fed to hogs. Judge Anglin upset that finding and ruled that a slaughtered animal came under the meaning of "dead" animals in the act.

Two Duels at Havana.

Havana, Oct. 27.—Two duels, in which three of the combatants received injuries which disabled them, were fought in Havana Thursday. City Councilman Ramon Mandosa challenged Eduardo Alonzo, an editorial writer on El Mundo, alleging offensive editorial expressions. They fought with broadswords, and each sustained a severe cut in the arm.

Dr. Manuel Secades, a former insurgent officer, challenged Capt. Poey, at one time aide-de-camp to ex-President Palma, because of an insult during a political discussion. Poey was badly wounded by a sword thrust in the leg.

FREE TO YOU—MY SISTER

FREE TO YOU AND EVERY SISTER SUFFERING FROM WOMEN'S AILMENTS.

I am a woman.
I know woman's sufferings.
I have found the cure.

I will mail, free of any charge, my home treatment with full instructions to any sufferer from women's ailments. I want to tell all women about this cure—you, my reader, for yourself, your daughter, your mother, or your sister. I want to tell you how to cure yourselves at home without the help of a doctor. Men cannot understand women's sufferings. What we women know from experience, we know better than any doctor. I know that my home treatment is a safe and sure cure for Leucorrhoea or Whitish discharges, Ulceration, Displacement or Falling of the Womb, Profuse, Scanty or Painful Periods, Uterine or Ovarian Tumors or Growths, also pains in the head; back and bowels, bearing down feelings, nervousness, creeping feeling up the spine, melancholy, desire to cry, hot flashes, weariness, kidney and bladder troubles where caused by weaknesses peculiar to our sex.

I want to send you a complete 10 days' treatment entirely free to prove to you that you can cure yourself at home, easily, quickly and surely. Remember, that it will cost you nothing to give the treatment a complete trial; and if you should wish to continue, it will cost you only about 12 cents a week, or less than two cents a day. It will not interfere with your work or occupation. Just send me your name and address, tell me how you suffer, if you wish, and I will send you the treatment for your case, entirely free, in plain wrapper, by return mail. I will also send you free of cost, my book—"WOMAN'S OWN MEDICAL ADVISER" with explanatory illustrations showing why women suffer, and how they can easily cure themselves at home. Every woman should have it, and learn to think for herself. Then when the doctor says—"You must have an operation," you can decide for yourself. Thousands of women have cured themselves with my home remedy. It cures all, old or young. To Mothers of Daughters, I will explain a simple home treatment which speedily and effectually cures Leucorrhœa, Green Sickness and Painful or Irregular Menstruation in Young Ladies. Plumpness and health always result from its use.

Wherever you live, I can refer you to ladies of your own locality who know and will gladly tell any sufferer that this Home Treatment really cures all woman's diseases and makes women well, strong, plump and robust. Just send me your address, and the free ten days' treatment is yours, also the book. Write to-day, as you may not see this offer again. Address:

Railway Madness

While in London the Minister of Militia was entertained at dinner with many other guests by Mr. C. H. Wilkinson. In reply to the toast of his health, Sir F. W. Borden referred to Mr. Wilkinson as a real friend of Canada. His many friends, he said, "had not forgotten his important part in bringing about partial, at least, railway communication between the outer world and the great Yukon country. As a matter of fact, he was looked upon as the pioneer of that great work, the White Pass and Yukon Railway."

This was doubtless a deserved tribute. As all know, once the Yukon became established as a gold country no trouble was found in getting private capital to open railway communications. The difficulties of the route dissolved like magic in a short time, and prospectors, miners and tourists were able to pass in and out of the territory in luxurious cars. If Mr. Wilkinson early saw his way to engage in this enterprise as a good investment for British capital it spoke well for his business foresight, as the road has been very profitable, and Sir Frederick Borden paid him a just tribute on the London occasion referred to.

The incident, says the London Free Press, recalls to Canadians the hysterical bargain which the Laurier Government entered into with Mackenzie and Mann to build a railway to the Yukon, at the cost of about one hundred millions of dollars to the country. The deal was made overnight, in what might be called a dark-lantern session of the Cabinet, and the news of its completion was sprung with exclusive and amazing suddenness in the columns of the leading organ in Toronto. That was the first the people heard of the gigantic, improvident and utterly reckless and scandalous bargain by which the pick of the gold country was given over to a railway corporation. To the lasting credit of the Senate Chamber, the contract was vetoed, thrown out and disallowed. And the Laurier Government dared not complain because the deal was so obviously reckless, if not outrageously corrupt.

The lesson, however, was completely wasted upon the Government, which in 1903 made a still more extravagant deal with the Grand Trunk Railway. This company was given enormous subsidies in land and money to build a railway across the prairie, which lay with business temptations far beyond those of the Yukon country to private capital. Mr. J. J. Hill proposes to do with the means under his own control what the G.T. P. has received enormous subsidies for. Mr. Hill rejects with scorn the suggestion of aid from the Canadian public, either governmental or municipal, while the G. T. P. has not only been assisted by the Laurier Government, but has held up the municipalities for bonuses to the full extent of their financial capacity.

Sir Frederick's predecessors in office called it "railway madness" to bonus the Canadian Pacific at a time when the country was unknown, and private capital would not touch it otherwise. But what of the railway frenzy which alienates both land and money to assist a competitive railway long after the Northwest has been proven a veritable Golconda?

The Situation in Quebec.

The sweeping victory of the anti-Laurier candidate, Mr. Robitaille, in Quebec indicates, as the leading English Liberal journal put it the other day, that the Laurier boom has been overworked. In a constituency which returned the present Chief Justice, Mr Fitzpatrick, by two thousand of a majority, a candidate nominated by Laurier and energetically supported on the hustings by the Premier and his Ministers, has been defeated by seven hundred. That it was a bad blow for the Government is generally admitted. Le Canada, the Government organ, says that the Liberal party has received an undoubted check, and it begs the adherents of the Government to put an end to the party divisions and discords, resulting from petty rivalries. The same paper reads Henri Bourassa out of the party. Mr. Bourassa gave Mr. Robitaille hearty support throughout the contest.

The defeat of the Laurier candidate in a Liberal hive is all the more remarkable when we consider the efforts that were put forth to secure his election. Sir Wilfrid was early on the now stricken field. He named Mr. Amyot as Mr. Fitzpatrick's successor and thought that would settle the matter. But there were others—three of them—and they persisted in fighting it out to a finish. Sir Wilfrid twice visited the constituency and pleaded, and when pleading failed, demanded the withdrawal of the independent Liberals. Finally two of them yielded to the pressure, but the third remained and he is now the member-elect for Quebec County. During the campaign the Ministers spared no effort on behalf of Mr. Amyot. The Cabinet was represented at every meeting and every appeal that could possibly influence the electors was resorted to. Here is a sample:

"Surely no one is foolish enough to imagine that Mr. Robitaille, if elected, would dictate to the Government and compel it to do anything he wanted. On the contrary, far from doing good to the county, Mr. Robitaille, by antagonizing the Government, would do it harm. He would be entitled to no favors at the Government's hands, and he would receive none. Are the electors who have, in connection with the bridge and new transcontinental everything to lose and nothing to gain by antagonizing the Government, willing to accept this situation?"

But Laurier's sunny ways and Laurier's honeyed words, and Laurier's open threats were all of no avail; and a constituency, almost unanimously Liberal in the past, has joined in the revolt against the condition of affairs at Ottawa.

Farming Has Its Drawbacks.

A farmer has a hard life. Working in all weathers, feet wet, exposed to strain, he is too often mighty careless about his health.

James Abbott, a Markham farmer, neglected his kidneys until laid up with rheumatism. For seven years he could not work. He never imagined his kidneys were at the bottom of the trouble. A friend advised Bu-Ju. He took it. And began to mend at once. A few months, and he was strong as ever.

Don't let yourself run down. Use Bu-Ju. Money refunded if not satisfied.

The record of fatalities and injuries naturally raises the question as to whether or not Rugby football is a game for adults. That some Methodist ladies desire representation at the General Conference and in other Councils of the church is pretty plain by the resolution introduced yesterday afternoon at the final meeting of the Board of Managers of the W.M.S. And, without pretending to be a prophet or the son of a prophet, a man in the middle of the road would be safe in hazarding the prediction that if the ladies want to get into the General Conference they will. Talking of Councils, it's about time people were waking up to the fact mentioned by Mayor Sulman at the Workmen's dinner the other night—Municipal elections are drawing near, and it's time citizens were casting about for candidates for the Council. That there will be several new faces at the board is no secret. Who will succeed those who withdraw? The city has large interests involved in its gas and water utilities, and it is to the interest of every citizen to see that those utilities are properly managed. There may be changes in the chairmanship, and good men must be secured to take the places of those who withdraw. Think it over, good people.

We in Canada so often have to hold elections on lists so hoary that the graveyards and the "exodus" are well represented, that we appreciate a voters' list made up while the voting is in sight. This late registration has the effect, too, of winnowing out the indifferent voters who will not go to the polls. What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

SUNLIGHT SOAP

is better than other Soaps but is best when used in the Sunlight way. Follow directions.

SUNLIGHT WAY OF WASHING

FIRST.—Dip the article to be washed in a tub of lukewarm water, draw it out on a washboard and rub the soap lightly over it. Be particular not to miss soaping all over. THEN roll it in a tight roll, lay in the tub under the water, and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on, and are rolled up.

Then go away for thirty minutes to one hour and let the "Sunlight" Soap do its work.

NEXT.—After soaking the full time rub the clothes lightly out on a wash board, and the dirt will drop out; turn the garment inside out to get at the seams, but don't use any more soap; don't scald or boil a single piece, and don't wash through two suds. If the water gets too dirty, pour a little out and add fresh. If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more soap on it, and throw the piece back into the suds for a few minutes.

LASTLY COMES THE RINSING, which is to be done in lukewarm water, taking special care to get all the dirty suds away, then wring out and hang up to dry.

For Woolens and Flannels proceed as follows:—Shake the articles free from dust. Cut a tablet of SUNLIGHT SOAP into shavings, pour into a gallon of boiling water and whisk into a lather. When just lukewarm, work articles in the lather without rubbing. Squeeze out dirty water without twisting and rinse thoroughly in two relays of lukewarm water. Squeeze out water without twisting and hang in the open air.

☞ The most delicate colors may be safely washed in the "Sunlight" way.

$5,000 REWARD will be paid to any person who proves that Sunlight Soap contains any injurious chemicals or any form of adulteration.

5c. Buy it and follow directions. 5c.

A Visit to the Home Of Their Mother

THE BARCROFTS OF NUTTAL FARM, IN LANCASHIRE, ENGLAND.

(From The Ramsbottom, Lancashire, Observer.)

The old-timer's love of home was very pronounced in the case of a member of an old and well-known local family who was named Christie, nee Barcroft, whose forbears farmed at Old Nuttall for many years. Mrs. Christie went out to Canada with her husband a long time ago, but her affection for the old place at Ramsbottom remained one of her strongest attachments to the end, which came as far back as twenty-five years ago in the land of her adoption. It is interesting as indicating the firm hold her earliest years exercised upon her that this love of what grew to be only a dim memory was quickly communicated to the children, and as time went on an irresistible desire possessed the daughters to visit the spot revered by their mother, and so, seventeen years ago, one of them crossed to this country, and again this week accompanied a younger sister through the almost deserted village of Nuttall, to look upon the unfamiliar scenes that had been foremost in their mother's imagination. Few, if any, home-dwellers can share the thoughts and feelings of those who have left us and returned.

Having heard their parents, and particularly their mother speak so frequently and tenderly of the town of Ramsbottom as it used to be in that distant day, Mrs. Mathison, Belleville, and Mrs. Herron, Beamsville, determined to pay a visit to this neighborhood from their home in Ontario, Canada. They arrived a few weeks ago, after seeing the sights of various places, passed on to Ramsbottom at the beginning of the present week. The ladies are the daughters of the late Mr. and Mrs. Robert Christie, their mother being Sarah Barcroft, whose grandfather and father, we are assured by Mrs. Mathison—with whom we chatted the other day—farmed old Nuttall Farm for many years. Mr. Christie was fond of reciting his recollections of the Grant family and of their associations with Ramsbottom and Nuttall, and this coupled with Mrs. Christie's stories of her earliest home, inspired in the family a great longing to visit the Old Country and look upon the scenes which were of such sacredness to their parents, now dead a full quarter of a century. Mr. Christie was a Scotsman, and his children always believed that he met the Grants in Manchester. At any rate, he was engaged on the erection of St. Andrew's Church for the Grants, and Mrs. Mathison informs us that most of the fine woodcarving in the interior of the edifice was the handiwork of her father, and that he was employed by the family for whom the church was built. It was while engaged on St. Andrew's that he became acquainted with his subsequent wife, whose grandfather lived at Old Nuttall before the Grants purchased it. The Grants were the originals of Dickens' "Cheeryble Brothers." Mr. and Mrs. Christie resided for a short time in Ramsbottom after their marriage, and had three children before setting out for Canada, where Mrs. Mathison and another child were born. Mrs. Herron was born in Manchester and visited Ramsbottom for the first time seventeen years ago. Both father and mother lie buried in Burlington cemetery, Hamilton, Ontario, Mr. Christie predeceasing his wife by eight years, thirty-three years ago. The sisters have been greatly delighted with their visit to Ramsbottom. It lies in a beautiful valley and the surrounding hills are good to gaze upon, since they invite comparison with the plan of the district of Belleville, which is generally of a flat description. They have visited Scotland, whose beautiful scenery has left an indelible impression on their minds. "But I guess I just love the Belleville section of Ontario and the Quinte district," exclaimed Mrs. Mathison. For the same reason we suppose that her mother loved England and Ramsbottom: it is her native land. Mr. Mathison is now Superintendent of an Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and many years ago edited a Canadian weekly paper known as the Brantford Expositor, now a daily organ. Belleville, although its population is only ten thousand, publishes two newspapers daily. Mrs. Mathison and Mrs. Herron are proud of the Nuttall village for the associations it has for them, and among the most treasured souvenirs of this country which they carried back to-day on board the S.S. "Empress of Ireland" are photographic views of Nuttall Farm and its surroundings.

FOUR MAGAZINES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

CO-OPERATION IN ADVERTISING MAKES IT POSSIBLE.

Half price offers are but combinations of advertising. In a word, four magazines band together, use the same publicity and share the expenses. Four magazines working together reduce the cost of publicity about one-fourth of what it would be if taken up alone. The receipts are approximately the same as if the publicity were carried on independently. And who receives the benefits from this publicity club? The patron of the magazines, inasmuch as he secures a reduction in the subscription price made possible by economy. And thus the home can now secure three, four and five periodicals, which present-day needs require, for little more than the oldtime price of a single magazine, that once was the solitary visitor to the family circle.

For instance, Combination No. 2, advertised by the Central Magazine Agency in our columns, offers The Cosmopolitan Magazine, $1.00; The Harper's Bazar, $1.00; The Home Magazine, $1.00, and The Reader Magazine, $3.00—total value, $6.00—all four for $3.00, one-half price, a saving of fifty per cent.

Another good offer is The Delineator, McClure's Magazine, The World's Work and The Home Magazine. These four may be had for just $3.50.

One of the best bargains ever offered is The Cosmopolitan Magazine, The World To-day and The Home Magazine, all three for one year for just $2.00.

For $2.00 you can secure a year's subscription to The Cosmopolitan The World To-day and The Home Magazine.

For $2.50 you can have The Cosmopolitan, $1.00; Home Magazine, $1.00; The Reader Magazine, $3.00, at one-half price, $2.50. All three for less than the price of one.

The best bargain of the year, however, is The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, Harper's Bazar and The Reader Magazine, total value, $6.00—all for half price, $3.00. This is positively the best bargain of the year.

Before subscribing to any magazines our readers should write the Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind., for prices. Further than this if you have spare time and want to earn Christmas money, the Central Magazine Agency will pay you a liberal commission on these great magazine combinations. You will be surprised to find how easy it is to make from $10.00 to $100.00 a week in securing orders from your neighbors. You can save them from 40 to 50 per cent. on their year's magazines and make a handsome commission for yourself.

To any newsdealer, druggist or agent who will act as our agent we will run their name and address at the bottom of our large display advertising. Our commission to agents or newsdealers is 35 cents an order.

Write to-day for our special offer or send your order for any of the combinations mentioned above. Remember, The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, The Reader Magazine and Harper's Bazar—all four for $3.00—total value, $6.00. You save 50 per cent. Address The Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind. t-t-s-3w

SAFETY.

Never in all the history of transportation has travel been safer than it is to-day. Seated in perfect comfort in any of the mile-a-minute trains of the Lake Shore Railway you are in less danger by far than was your grandfather in the lumbering six-mile-an-hour stage of a half or three-quarters of a century ago. Trains over this line are protected and guarded in a way that is but little short of marvellous. Every device that skill or money can provide is used without regard to the expense and in spite of the high speed—the fastest in the world—you are as safe here as in your own home. Combined with safety and high speed are luxurious comfort and punctuality, all combined to make a service unequaled the world over. See that your ticket reads "via Buffalo and The Lake Shore Railway," and write for full information to J. W. Daly, Chief Ass't G. P. A., Buffalo, N.Y.; A. J. Smith, G. P. A., Cleveland, Ohio, or W. "Grand Peninsular" has an all-steel oven.

Steel is more uniform in thickness and radiates heat more quickly than cast iron. For that reason most cast iron ranges have steel oven bottoms.

In my new range—GRAND PENINSULAR—I have gone farther and made the WHOLE OVEN—top, bottom and sides—of STEEL PLATE. That is the reason the "Grand Peninsular" is such a quick, even baker—and saves so much fuel.

I have perfected a perfect system of Ventilation, too. All the vapor and odor of cooking are driven off—and a constant current of fresh, heated air fills the oven.

I also put a Thermometer in the oven door, so you can tell the exact temperature of the oven. It does away with all guess work and insures perfect cooking.

These are a few of the helpful features that make my new GRAND PENINSULAR the ideal range for Canadian homes. 41

Out in Ohio one afternoon I was standing near the box-office window, a few minutes before the beginning of a matinee given by a friend's combination. A fine old boy from the country—one of the kind that see about one show in two years — approached the window, his roll in hand, and delivered himself [illegible] following:

"'Say, young feller!' (in a voice loud enough to be heard a block away), 'Gimme a good seat! I want it right down the middle lane and close up to the exercises!'"

SPEED, COMFORT AND SAFETY

Nothing that skill or money can provide that tends to greater comfort, convenience or safety is lacking. The famous Lake Shore roadbed eliminates all jolts and jars and there is a notable absence of all dust, dirt and unnecessary noise.

WET-WEATHER TALK.

It hain't no use to grumble and complain,
It's just as cheap and easy to rejoice;
When God sorts out the weather and sends rain,
W'y, rain's my choice.

Men gingerly, to all intents—
Although they're apt to grumble some—
Puts most their trust in Providence,
And takes things as they come;
That is, the commonality
Of men that's lived as long as me
Has watched the world enough to learn
They're not the boss of this concern.

With some, of course, it's different—
I've seen young men that knowed it all,
And didn't like the way things went
On this terrestchul ball.
But all the same, the rain, some way,
Rained just as hard on picnic day;
Er when they railly wanted it,
It maybe wouldn't rain a bit!

In this existuence, dry and wet
Will overtake the best of men:
Some little skift o' clouds'll shet
The sun off now and then.
And mayby, whilse you're wundern who
You've fool-like lent your umbrell' to,
And want it—out'll pop the sun,
And you'll be glad you hain't got none!

It aggervates the farmers, too—
They's too much wet, er too much sun.
Er work, er waitin' round to do
Before the plowing's done.
An' maybe, whilste you're wunderin', wheat,
Jest as it's lookin' hard to beat,
Will ketch the storm — and jest about
The time the corn's a-jintin out.

These here cy-clones a-foolin' round—
And back-ard crops—and wind and rain—
And yit the corn that's wallered down
May elbow up again!
They hain't no sense, as I can see,
Fer mortuls, sich as us, to be,
A'faultin' Natchur's wise intents
And lockin' horns with Providence!

It hain't no use to grumble and complain,
It's jest as cheap and easy to rejoice;
When God sorts out the weather and sends rain,
W'y, rain's my choice.

To get the cream of railway humor you must go to Ireland. An Irish railway porter simply can't help being funny. Only the other day a zealous luggage smasher wrathfully pulled a gentleman out of a third-class carriage because he had a first-class ticket. "Cheating the company," he called it. It must have been a relative of his who walked down a platform, put his head into each carriage of a train, and asked—"Is there anything there for here?" But even this genius was eclipsed by a brother on the line, who, before the departure of an express, fiercely rang a bell, and bellowed in gloomy warning—"This train stops nowhere at all!"

Premier Whitney stated that there was nothing to be said until after November 1. "There is nothing to trouble the Government in the affairs at the Soo," was Premier Whitney's declaration. There is a belief in some circles that a partial renewal of the loan may be expected.

Charcoal Kills Bad Breath.

BAD ODOR OF INDIGESTION SMOKING, DRINKING OR EATING CAN BE INSTANTLY STOPPED.

Sample Package Mailed Free.

Other people notice your bad breath where you would not notice it at all. It is nauseating to other people to stand before them and while you are talking give them a whiff or two of your bad breath. It usually comes from food fermenting on your stomach. Sometimes you have it in the morning,—that awful sour, bilious, bad breath. You can stop that at once by swallowing one or two Stuart Charcoal Lozengers, the most powerful gas and odor absorbers ever prepared.

Sometimes your meals will reveal themselves in your breath to those who talk with you. "You've had onions," or "You've been eating cabbage," and all of a sudden you belch in the face of your friend. Charcoal is a wonderful absorber of odors, as every one knows. That is why Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are so quick to stop all gases and odors of odorous foods, or gas from indigestion.

Don't use breath perfumes. They never conceal the odor, and never absorb the gas that causes the odor. Besides, the very fact of using them reveals the reason for their use. Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges in the first place stop for good all sour brash and belching of gas, and make your breath pure, fresh and sweet, just after you've eaten. Then no one will turn his face away from you when you breathe or talk; your breath will be pure and fresh, and besides your food will taste so much better to you at your next meal. Just try it.

Charcoal does other wonderful things, too. It carries away from your stomach and intestines, all the impurities there massed together and which causes the bad breath. Charcoal is a purifier as well as an absorber.

Charcoal is now by far the best, most easy and mild laxative known. A whole boxful will do no harm; in fact, the more you take the better. Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made of pure willow charcoal and mixed with just a faint flavor of honey to make them palatable for you, but not too sweet. You just chew them like candy. They are absolutely harmless.

Get a new, pure, sweet breath, freshen your stomach for your next meal, and keep the intestines in good working order. These two things are the secret of good health and long life. You can get all the charcoal necessary to do these wonderful but simple things by getting Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges. We want you to test these little wonder workers yourself before you buy them. So send us your full name and address for a free sample of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges. Then after you have tried the sample, and been convinced, go to your druggist and get a 25c box of them. You'll feel better all over, more comfortable, and "cleaner" inside.

Send us your name and address today and we will at once send you by mail a sample package, free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 60 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

LACK OF ENERGY.

A COMMON TROUBLE AMONG GROWING BOYS—A NEW BLOOD SUPPLY IS NEEDED—DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS ACTUALLY MAKE NEW BLOOD.

There are thousands of young men just approaching manhood who have no energy, who tire out at the least exertion, and who feel by the time they have done their day's work as though the day was a week long. In some of these cases there is a further sign of warning in the pimples and disfiguring eruptions which break out on the face. These are certain signs that the blood is out of order, and unless it is promptly enriched a complete breakdown, or perhaps consumption may be the result. All these young men should take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. These pills actually make rich, red blood, clear the skin of pimples and eruptions, and bring health, strength and energy. Here is a bit of proof. Adolphe Itoiland St. Jerome, Que., is a young man of 19 years, who says: "For more than a year I suffered from general weakness, and I gradually grew so weak that I was forced to abandon my work as a clerk. My appetite failed me, I had occasional violent headaches, and I began to suffer from indigestion. I was failing so rapidly that I began to fear that consumption was fastening itself upon me. Our family doctor treated me, but I did not gain under his care. I was in a very discouraged state when a friend from Montreal came to see me. He strongly advised me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I did so and inside of three weeks I began to feel better, my appetite began to improve and I seemed to have a feeling of new courage. I continued the pills until I had taken ten boxes and I am now enjoying the best of health I ever had. My cure surprised many of my friends who began to regard me as incurable, and I strongly advise other young men who are weak to follow my example and give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a fair trial."

There is no mystery about the cures Dr. Williams' Pink Pills make. These pills actually make rich, red blood, which braces and strengthens every organ and every nerve in the body. That is why these pills cure all common ailments like anaemia, rheumatism, indigestion, neuralgia, St. Vitus' dance, headaches and backaches and the special ailments of women and growing girls. You can get these pills from any dealer in medicine or from The Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont., at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50.

same time I noticed a rough-looking man presumedly asleep on the seat in the road facing the hospital. Afterwards when I looked round he had disappeared. At the time I thought nothing of it. When I came in here I placed the precious roll of paper on my writing-table under the window yonder. The window is a small one, as you can see, and was opened about a foot at the top. I sat here with the light down and the room faintly illuminated by the light in the conservatory. After a little time I saw a hand and arm groping for something on the table, and I'm quite sure the hand and arm were groping for your Rembrandt. The fellow muttered something that I failed to understand, and I made a grab for him and got him. Then the other hand made a dash for my head with an ugly piece of gas-piping, and I had to let go."

"And you saw no more of the fellow?"

"No; I didn't expect to. I couldn't see his face, but there was one peculiarity he had that I might tell you for your future guidance. He had a thumb smashed as flat as the head of a snake, with one tiny pink nail in the middle of it. So, if you meet a man like that on your journey to-day, look to yourself. On the whole, you see that our enemies are a little more awake than you give them credit for."

Bell nodded thoughtfully. The information was of the greatest possible value to him. It told him quite plainly that Reginald Henson knew exactly what had happened. Under ordinary circumstances by this time Henson would be on his way to Littimer Castle, there to checkmate the man he had so deeply injured. But fortunately Henson was laid by the heels, or so Bell imagined.

"I am really obliged to you," Bell said. "Your information is likely to be of the greatest possible service to me. I'm sorry you can't work."

"Don't worry about me," David said, grimly. "I'm gaining a vast quantity of experience that will be the greatest value to me later on. Besides, I can go and compare notes with Miss Ruth Gates whilst you are away. She is soothing."

"So I should imagine," Bell said, drily. "No, I must be off. I'll let you know what happens at Littimer Castle. Good luck to you here."

And Bell bustled off. He was pleased to find a recent telegram of acceptance from Littimer awaiting him, and before five o'clock he was in the train for London. It was only after he left London that he began to crawl along. Thanks to slow local lines and a badly fitting cross service it was nearly eleven o'clock before he reached Moreton Station. It did not matter much, because Littimer had said that a carriage should meet him.

However, there was no conveyance of any kind outside the station. One sleepy porter had already departed, and the other one, who took Bell's ticket, and was obviously waiting to lock up, deposed that a carriage from the castle had come to the station, but that some clerical gentleman had come along and countermanded it. Whereupon the dog-cart departed.

"Very strange," Bell muttered. "What sort of a parson was it?"

"I only just saw his face," the porter yawned. "Dressed in black, with a white tie and a straw hat. Walked in a slouching kind of way with his hands down; new curate from St. Albans, perhaps. Looked like a chap as could take care of himself in a row."

"Thanks," Bell said, curtly. "I'll manage the walk; it's only two miles. Good-night."

Bell's face was grim and set as he stepped out into the road. He knew fairly well what this meant. It was pretty evident that his arch-enemy knew his movements perfectly well, and that a vigorous attempt was being made to prevent him reaching the castle. He called back to the porter.

"How long since the carriage went?" he asked.

A voice from the darkness said "Ten minutes," and Bell trudged on with the knowledge that one of his enemies at least was close at hand. That Reginald Henson was at the castle he had not the remotest idea. Nor did he fear personal violence. Despite his figure, he was a man of enormous strength and courage. But he had not long to wait.

Somebody was coming down the lonely road towards him, somebody in clerical attire. The stranger stopped and politely, if a little huskily, inquired if he was on the right way to Moreton Station. Bell responded as politely that he was, and asked to know the time. Not that he cared anything about the time: what he really wanted was to see the stranger's hands. The little ruse was successful. In the dim light Bell could see a flattened, hideous thumb with the pink parody of a nail upon it.

"Thanks, very much," he said, crisply. "Keep straight on."

He half turned as the stranger swung round. The latter darted at Bell, but he came too late. Bell's fist shot out and caught him fairly on the forehead. Then the stick in Bell's left hand came down with crushing force on the prostrate man's skull. So utterly dazed and surprised was he that he lay on the ground for a moment, panting heavily.

"You murderous ruffian," Bell gasped. "You escaped convict in an honest man's clothes. Get up! So you are the fellow——"

He paused suddenly, undesirous of letting the rascal see that he knew too much. The other man rolled over suddenly like a cat and made a dash for a gap in the hedge. He was gone like a flash. Pursuit would be useless, for pace was not Bell's strong point. And he was not fearful of being attacked again.

"Henson seems to be pretty well served," he muttered, grimly.

Meanwhile, the man with the thumb was flying over the fields in the direction of Littimer. He made his way across country to the cliffs with the assured air of one who knows every inch of the ground. He had failed in the first part of his instructions, and there was no time to be lost if he was to carry out the second part successfully.

He struck the cliffs at length a mile or so away, and proceeded to scramble along them till he lay hidden just under the terraces at Littimer Castle. He knew that he was in time for this part of the program, despite the fact that his head ached considerably from the force and vigor of Bell's assault. He lay there, panting and breathing heavily, waiting for the signal to come.

Meanwhile, Bell was jogging along placidly and with no fear in his heart at all. He did not need anybody to tell him what was the object of his late antagonist's attack. He knew perfectly well that if the ruffian had got the better of him he would never have seen the Rembrandt again. Henson's hounds were on the track; but it would go hard if they pulled the quarry down just as the sanctuary was in sight. Presently Bell could see the lights of the castle.

By the lodge-gates stood a dog-cart; in the flare of the lamps Bell recognized the features of the driver, a very old servant of Littimer's. Bell took in the situation at a glance.

"Is this the way you come for me, Lund?" he asked.

"I'm very sorry, sir," Lund replied. "But a clergyman near the station said you had gone another way, so I turned back. And when I got here I couldn't make top nor tail of the story. Blest if I wasn't a bit nervous that it might have been some plot to rob you. And I was going to drive slowly along to the station again when you turned up."

"Oh, there's nothing wrong," said Bell, cheerfully. "And I don't look as if I'd come to any harm. Anybody staying at the castle, Lund?"

"Only Mr. Reginald Henson, sir," Lund said, disparagingly.

Bell started, but his emotion was lost in the darkness. It came as a great surprise to him to find that the enemy was actually in the field. And how apprehensive of danger he must be to come so far with his health in so shattered a condition. Bell smiled to himself as he pictured Henson's face on seeing him once more under that roof.

"How long has Mr. Henson been here?" he asked.

"Only came yesterday, sir. Shall I drive you up to the house? And if you wouldn't mind saying nothing to his lordship about my mistake, sir——"

"Make your mind easy on that score," Bell said, drily. "His lordship shall know nothing whatever about it. On the whole, I had better drive up to the house. How familiar it all looks, to be sure."

A minute later and Bell stood within the walls of the castle.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Chris crossed the corridor like one who walks in a dream. She had not enough energy left to be astonished even. Her mind traveled quickly over the events of the past hour, and she began to see the way clear. But how had somebody or other managed to remove the picture? Chris examined the spot on the wall where the Rembrandt had been with the eye of a detective.

That part of the mystery was explained in a moment. A sharp cutting instrument, probably a pair of steel pliers with a lever attachment, had been applied to the head of the four stays, and the flat heads had been pinched off as clean as if they had been string. After that it was merely necessary to remove the frame, and a child could have done the rest.

"How clever I am," Chris told herself, bitterly. "I'm like the astute people who put Chubb locks on Russia leather jewel-cases that anybody could rip open with a sixpenny penknife. And in my conceit I deemed the Rembrandt to be absolutely safe. Now what—what is the game?"

It was much easier to ask the question than to answer it. But there were some facts sufficiently obvious to Chris. In the first place she knew that Reginald Henson was at the bottom of the whole thing; she knew that he had traded on the fact that she had taken a fancy to the terrace as an after-dinner lounge; indeed, she had told him so earlier in the day. He had traded on the knowlege that he could prove an alibi if any suspicions attached to him. The fact that he was in danger owing to a slip on the edge of the cliff was all nonsense. He had not been in any danger at all; he had seen Chris there, and he had made all that parade with an eye to the future. As a matter of course, he was down there settling matters with his accomplice of the maimed thumb, who had chosen the cliff way of getting into the castle as the swiftest and the surest from detection.

Yes, it was pretty obvious that the man with the thumb had stolen the print, and that by this time he was far away with his possession. While Chris was helping Henson the latter's accomplice had slipped into the castle and effected the burglary. Chris flicked out the light in the alcove as a servant came along. It was not policy for any of the domestics to be too wise. Chris forced a smile to her face as the maid came along.

"Allen," she asked, "are there many owls about here?"

"Never a one as I know, miss," the maid responded confidently. "I've been here for eleven years, and I never heard of such a thing. Clifford, the head keeper, couldn't sleep at nights if he thought as there was such a thing on the estate. Have you heard one, miss?"

"I was evidently mistaken," Chris said. "Of course you would know best."

So the cry of the owl had been a signal of success. Chris sat in the gloom there resolved to see the comedy played through. The events of the night were not over yet.

"I'd give something to know what has taken place in the dining-room," Chris murmured.

She was going to know before long. The lights were being extinguished all over the house. Henson came up to bed heavily, as one who is utterly worn out. At the same time he looked perfectly satisfied with himself. He might have been a vigilant officer who had settled all his plans and was going to seek a well-earned rest before the enemy came on to his destruction. In sooth Henson was utterly worn out.

All Household Roads Lead to Kitchen Work

NINE-TENTHS of kitchen labor and worry is caused by ill-working cook stoves and ranges; by ranges that draw poorly; that have such complicated drafts that only a skilled mechanic can manage them; whose grates are so constructed that it is a strong man's work to shake them down; ranges which work well when the wind is in a certain direction, but act like a fiend at other times; ranges whose work is so unreliable that the housekeeper is in a constant nerve-racking worry lest the meals be late or the baking spoiled.

The Pandora range is built to make work easy, a child can shake it down; its drafts are so simple that one learns them in a minute; its heat is kept in the range so effectively that you can do a big baking and hardly know there is a fire in it two feet away; it keeps the kitchen cool; it saves you worry; it saves you time and money; it saves you backaches and headaches, because it is so easy to manage and so reliable.

The Pandora makes kitchen work easy.

American Yarns In Paris.

Parisian correspondents have been listening to some queer yarns told by members of Sarah Bernhardt's company after their return from the United States. One gentleman declared that on the banks of the Mississippi he saw a child riding an alligator. In place of a whip the infant had a long stick with a piece of meat at the end of it, which he held just in front of the alligator's smile to induce him to hurry. At Chattanooga the inhabitants offered to lynch a colored citizen if Sarah and her troupe would wait and see it done. At San Francisco one of the troupe had a long talk with a young woman who had been living on the top floor of a hotel when the earthquake occurred. The earth opened and swallowed up all the hotel except the chimneys, and it was through the chimney of her room that the young woman escaped.

The Old Santa Fe Trail.

The old Santa Fe trail is to be marked this summer. The school children of Kansas have contributed nearly $3,700 to buy markers for the route. The trail dates from 1540, but was chiefly used in the building up of the southwest. The distance from Kansas City to Santa Fe was 800 miles, and a round trip consumed about 110 days. Day and night in all seasons the caravans pushed their way. In spite of strong military escort the trail was blood soaked for many years and was marked by hundreds of graves of the victims of the murderous Apaches and other tribes. Nearly every mile of the trail has had its ambush, its surprise, its attack and torture. The last wagons were sent out in 1865. Since then the trail has been a memory.

Cautious Senator Platt.

Senator Platt of New York was asked to write his personal reminiscences of politics for the last half century. "Would you want me to write this history as I know it to be or as somebody else might imagine it to be?" he said. The reply came, "I want the exact truth." To this Platt answered: "My young friend, come around about twenty-five years after I am dead. It might be safe and proper to do it then, but not now—by all means, not now."

Breadcrumb Modeling.

France's government has bought for the Luxembourg gallery an apple tree in bloom fashioned by Mlle. Suzanne Meyer out of soaked breadcrumbs. Mlle. Meyer has cultivated the art of breadcrumb modeling for three years. She soaks the crumbs in liquids of various colors and then works with the paste from a palette. She has invented a process for making the crumbs elastic and virtually unbreakable.

All Household Roads Lead to Kitchen Work

NINE-TENTHS of kitchen labor and worry is caused by ill-working cook stoves and ranges; by ranges that draw poorly; that have such complicated drafts that only a skilled mechanic can manage them; whose grates are so constructed that it is a strong man's work to shake them down; ranges which work well when the wind is in a certain direction, but act like a fiend at other times; ranges whose work is so unreliable that the housekeeper is in a constant nerve-racking worry lest the meals be late or the baking spoiled.

The Pandora range is built to make work easy, a child can shake it down; its drafts are so simple that one learns them in a minute; its heat is kept in the range so effectively that you can do a big baking and hardly know there is a fire in it two feet away; it keeps the kitchen cool; it saves you worry; it saves you time and money; it saves you backaches and headaches, because it is so easy to manage and so reliable.

The Pandora makes kitchen work easy.

Talks on Orange Meat
(THE PURE FOOD)
Never touched by human hands.

From the time the wheat is unloaded from the steamers, until you open the package in your own dining room—human hands never touch Orange Meat. Sifting, brushing and washing the wheat—steam cooking—malting—flaking and toasting—filling the cartons—carrying and packing—everything is done by machinery.

So careful are we to insure Orange Meat being not only clean but with all its rich, nutty flavor retained, that each package is lined with specially made mercerized paper.

American Yarns in Paris.

Parisian correspondents have been listening to some queer yarns told by members of Sarah Bernhardt's company after their return from the United States. One gentleman declared that on the banks of the Mississippi he saw a child riding an alligator. In place of a whip the infant had a long stick with a piece of meat at the end of it, which he held just in front of the alligator's smile to induce him to hurry. At Chattanooga the inhabitants offered to lynch a colored citizen if Sarah and her troupe would wait and see it done. At San Francisco one of the troupe had a long talk with a young woman who had been living on the top floor of a hotel when the earthquake occurred. The earth opened and swallowed up all the hotel except the chimneys, and it was through the chimney of her room that the young woman escaped.

The Old Santa Fe Trail.

The old Santa Fe trail is to be marked this summer. The school children of Kansas have contributed nearly $3,700 to buy markers for the route. The trail dates from 1540, but was chiefly used in the building up of the southwest. The distance from Kansas City to Santa Fe was 800 miles, and a round trip consumed about 110 days. Day and night in all seasons the caravans pushed their way. In spite of strong military escort the trail was blood soaked for many years and was marked by hundreds of graves of the victims of the murderous Apaches and other tribes. Nearly every mile of the trail has had its ambush, its surprise, its attack and torture. The last wagons were sent out in 1865. Since then the trail has been a memory.

Cautious Senator Platt.

Senator Platt of New York was asked to write his personal reminiscences of politics for the last half century. "Would you want me to write this history as I know it to be or as somebody else might imagine it to be?" he said. The reply came, "I want the exact truth." To this Platt answered: "My young friend, come around about twenty-five years after I am dead. It might be safe and proper to do it then, but not now—by all means, not now."

Breadcrumb Modeling.

France's government has bought for the Luxembourg gallery an apple tree in bloom fashioned by Mlle. Suzanne Meyer out of soaked breadcrumbs. Mlle. Meyer has cultivated the art of breadcrumb modeling for three years. She soaks the crumbs in liquids of various colors and then works with the paste from a palette. She has invented a process for making the crumbs elastic and virtually unbreakable.

NEWBRO'S HERPICIDE

"It is high time that the oft repeated claim that—"chronic baldness can be cured" be filed away with the old announcement that the moon is made of green cheese. The claim is untrue, and aside from this it induces many people to ignore the chances they have to prevent baldness.

The greatest stride toward the ultimate elimination of baldness was the discovery by Prof. Unna, of Hamburg, Germany (ask your doctor about him), that most hair loss is due to an invisible growth, of vegetable character, in the scalp—literally a "dandruff germ," producing a highly contagious disease. The greatest stride toward the prevention of baldness was the recent discovery of a prophylactic fluid called NEWBRO'S HERPICIDE, which, if intelligently used—will destroy the dandruff germ and prevent baldness.

Herpicide is the original dandruff germ destroyer and its extraordinary success—for dandruff and falling hair, also dull, brittle and lustreless hair—has brought out many imitations. Even the old line hair "growers" and hair "tonics" now claim to kill the dandruff germ. Quite a tribute to Herpicide, isn't it? An exquisite hair dressing. Stops itching of the scalp almost instantly. Don't wait; try it now.

JESUS ANOINTED IN BETHANY—GOLDEN TEXT IS: "SHE HATH WROUGHT A GOOD WORK UPON ME."

HISTORICAL SETTING.

Time.—Saturday evening (the evening after the Jewish Sabbath). April 1, A.D. 30.

It was the Saturday previous to our last lesson.

Place.—Bethany, on the Mount of Olives, at the house of Simon, who had been a leper.

Place in the life of Christ.— Just after his arrival at Bethany, six days before the crucifixion. It is reported in Matthew in connection with the betrayal, as furnishing one reason why Judas betrayed Jesus.

6. When Jesus was in Bethany. "The traditional house of Martha and Mary is in ruins. No native Christian lives in Bethany. Only the hills, valleys and the unchanging mountains remain as Jesus saw them."

In the house of Simon the leper. There were many Simons and this one is distinguished from the others by the fact that he had been a leper. Of course, he must have been free from it at this time, probably a monument of the healing power of Jesus. To him this would be a thanksgiving feast.

Looking upon the scene were "the common people," probably those who had come to attend the Passover. In Oriental fashion they gathered in the house to look on, attracted by the desire to see Jesus, the great prophet, and the man whom he had raised from the dead (John 12: 9.)

"The supper usually consists of one large and common dish, from which each person helps himself by means of a crude spoon or fork, or more frequently, perhaps, by a bit of bread. The chief article of food for a meal may be lentils, a kind of bean, cooked with onions, wheat and rice, or a stew made of small pieces of meat cooked with tomatoes, beans, etc. Occasionally a lamb is roasted whole, and served on an immense platter, from which each person takes such a portion of the flesh as attracts him. Such a meal, however, is unusual, on account of the expense attached to it. Bread is eaten with everything — not bread cut in slices, as we serve ours, but thin, flat loaves, broken as used. After each meal the hands are washed by pouring over them water from an ewer or pitcher.

7. There came unto him a woman. "This woman was Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus (John 12:0) not the woman in Luke 7, who was a sinner. The latter person is generally, but without reason, identified with Mary Magdalene, and the three women confounded."

John tells us that Martha was one of those who waited on the table. Doubtless Mary performed the same service, though her greater deed overshadowed this lesser service.

Having an alabaster box, rather, a cruse or flask. "Literally, an alabaster, just as we call a drinking vessel made of glass a glass. Pliny compares these vessels to a close rosebud." These alabasters were usually made of "the Oriental or onyx alabaster, with long, narrow necks, which let the oil escape drop by drop, and could easily be broken." According to Herodotus (Her. 3:20) an alabaster of fragrant oil was sent among royal gifts by Cambyses to the king of Ethiopia. Of very (exceedingly) precious ointment. "By the ointment we are to understand rather a liquid perfume than what we commonly know as ointment." Schaff. John (12:3) says there was a pound of it. He also says it was ointment of spikenard, literally, "ointment of pistic nard, "pistic" meaning either "genuine" or "liquid." It was pure nard, like attar of roses, unadulterated, in full strength. Its costliness made it peculiarly liable to adulteration. Spikenard (spike-nard) was a plant closely allied to valerian, and now found in the Himalayan region. It was so strong that it filled the whole house with its odor (John.) Very precious

8. When His disciples saw it, they had indignation. John tells us that Judas Iscariot was the leader and the mouth-piece of the indignation against Mary. And he found fault because he was the treasurer of the disciples' small fund, and was a thief. He was too selfish to appreciate Mary's sacrifice. And he intensified the somewhat natural feeling of the good men who were with him. Probably all the disciples disapproved more or less. It was a woman's act, and they were men. She was a poet, and they were somewhat prosaic. To what purpose is this waste? This useless squandering of what could have been used to a better purpose? "Waste" is literally "perdition." So Judas is afterwards called "a son of perdition," a man who had utterly wasted his life. The other disciples were sincere, but had too narrow or distorted a vision as to what were real values.

9. Sold for much. Three hundred pence, denarii (Mark.) And given to the poor, feeding them for months, instead of being thrown away on a single act that lasted but a brief hour.

10. When Jesus understood it. The R. V. is much more correct here, "But Jesus perceiving it," at the moment; he knew their thoughts at once. He hath wrought a good work on me. "A noble, heroic work; a deed done under inspiration of uncalculating love." "Costliness is an external sign of love and obedience." "It is not the church we want, but the sacrifice; not the emotion of admiration, but the act of adoration; not the gift, but the giving." This spirit is the source and fountain of all good, for ourselves, for the kingdom of God and for the world. From it flow the choicest and most abundant blessings to all.

11. For ye have the poor always with you. They would have plenty of opportunity to help the poor. But Me ye have not always. The opportunity of making such expressions of love directly to Jesus would not occur again. Hereafter they could through the generations express it in gifts to his poor.

It was the act of a noble soul expressing its noblest emotions. The form it took is expressed in v. 12, she did it for my burial: R.V., "to prepare me for burial." You do not think it extravagant to be lavish with flowers and monuments to express your love for the dead: but this act of Mary's is her memorial to Me. "Jesus was at a crisis of His life when it was of the utmost value to Him to know that He had won a place in the human heart."

13. Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, etc. This story has been told in every known tongue, and is now being related in four hundred different languages to every great nation on the earth. No monuments, not even the pyramids, are as enduring. She is still pouring out the precious nard in an endless living stream, the fragrance thereof still is filling human hearts and lives all over the world with the desire to honor Jesus and help the poor. Like Abel, "being dead, she yet speaketh."

The gift of Mary direct to Christ did a hundredfold more for the poor than if she had given the same amount directly to them. It is the want of love, not the want of money, that allows any poor to suffer; so that all gifts to Christ which increase our loves will increase the gifts to the poor.

She Hath Done What She Could. (Mark 14-8)—"I imagine that there was no small stir when Mary of Bethany entered heaven. She stands as high on the page of Christian history as any woman that ever lived. . . . I can see her coming up to the throne, and Jesus rises and says; "Father, this is Mary that anointed Me for My burial." I imagine when Mary died, if God had sent an angel to write her epitaph he couldn't have done better than to put over her grave what Christ said: "She Hath Done What She Could."

A Contrast: Selfishness Incarnate. —Vs. 14 16. In these verses we learn that Judas—possibly angered by the reproof of Jesus, perhaps realizing more clearly than ever that his principles were in opposition to those of the Kingdom of Heaven, feeling that if Jesus died as he had declared, all visions of a high place in worldly pomp and glory had vanished—betrayed his Lord for thirty pieces of silver, skeis each worth four of Mary's "pence," or 64 cents. The whole amount was 120 denari, two-fifths of the value of her perfume, or about $20.

A RELIC OF PAST

THE HABIT OF THROWING RICE AT BRIDAL COUPLES SHOULD BE STOPPED.

Continually there has been dispute regarding the common sense of rice-throwing at weddings, says the Kingston News. Some days the Grand Trunk stations, both city and outer depots, have been a mass of rice and confetti which did bride and groom no good, and caused endless trouble to the railway building caretakers. The custom, however, seems to be passing away, and there will be no sorrow because of it. From Glencoe, Ontario comes a story which may serve as a warning locally.

A Grand Trunk Railway detective caused summonses to be served on some eighteen or twenty young men and maidens to answer before the magistrate for their conduct at the depot a few nights ago. On the occasion of a recent marriage the festivities at the Grand Trunk station in honor of the bridal couple were hilarious. The appearance of the bride and groom simultaneously with the arrival of the train was the signal for the shower to begin. And it began in earnest, almost assuming the proportions of a hail storm, and not ceasing even when some fifty pounds of rice had been spent, some boys substituting gravel for rice when the latter gave out. So strenuous was the demonstration that the conductor on the train had his eye-glasses reduced to fragments. The case was opened before Magistrate French, and at the request of the prosecution was adjourned until yesterday.

The Professor on Church-Going.

(Goldwin Smith.)

Clergymen deplore the decrease of attendance at church. It is not very striking, nor is there anything like the absence of the male sex which is the ominous sign in France. Funds do not appear to be failing. Something may be due to the increase of rival attractions, especially in summer, when the pleasure resorts tempt out of town. Ministers are exhorted to address themselves to the laboring class, and in so doing they would obey the gospel command, provided there is no appeal to class feeling. But the disturbance of the traditional faith which prevails among the upper classes has undeniably worked downwards, as it was sure to do, and prevails, especially among the quick-witted and leading artisans. The only permanent remedy is theological reconstruction, and to this the only road is through freedom of theological enquiry unfettered by ordination tests. For preachers of the truth the first qualification must be assurance that it is the truth they preach.

It is really one of the most wonderful tonics for developing the figure and soothing the nerves ever offered to the American people. Hollister's Rocky Mountain Tea or Tablets, 35 cents. D. M. Waters.

The Marvels of Science.

When we hear of rays of light capable of achieving photography through a foot thickness of solid iron, of the charting of the sky itself on such a scale that a thousand million members of the firmament can be recorded each in its appointed place, of the discovery of something like the sense organs of human knowledge on the roots, stems and leaves of plants; of the tracking of diseases which decimate humanity to their obscure source in the parasite of a parasite and of the process by which two patient and humble scientists working upon a few grains of an element in a mere secondary form managed to revolutionize our whole conception of the most stupendous forces of the physical world it seems indeed a mystery that the appetite for surprise and sensation should turn aside from what the pursuit of truth can offer and prefer to regale itself with the petty products of trumpery, invention and ingenuity. — Pall Mall Gazette.

Beauty of Clouds.

It is not of first sight easy to say why people so rarely give more than a passing glance to the realm of air above them. Is it because we cannot have a finger in this department of the wonders of nature, cannot net and label anything in those blue fields, pin it down on cork or fatten it in Canada balsam; cannot here annihilate distance with our ingenious instruments, that we neglect the phenomena of the sky? There above us, always ours for a lift of the eyes, is beauty in endless change for the contented mind and for the restless one the challenge of the ceaseless thaumaturgy which seems little nearer being found out than when the world began, and yet in comparison with such lines of research as are offered by cuckoo's eggs or the "protective devices" of caterpillars the region of the clouds may be said to be unexplored.

Stilt Marks on China.

Hunting for stilt marks on old china is often good fun in itself. Almost every old piece of flatware—i. e., plates, platters, saucers, etc.—shows three little rough spots more or less clearly marked on both sides, usually on the margin. These spots were made in the firing by the cockspur of stilts, the little tripods used between the plates in piling them up in the kiln. The three points where the cockspur touched the plate caused a defect in the glaze. Unfortunately stilt marks are not as sure a guarantee of authenticity as some collectors have supposed, for they are not only easy to imitate, but they are sometimes imperceptible on the old Staffordshire. Furthermore, they appear very frequently on modern tableware of the cheaper sort and so are no sign of antiquity.

Weighing Common Air.

The weight of air has often been tested by compressing it in receptacles by the air pump. That it really has weight when so compressed is shown by the fact that the weight of the vessels is increased slightly by filling them with compressed air and that such vessels become specifically "lighter" as soon as the air contained in them is exhausted. Many elaborate experiments on the weight of air have proved that the cubic foot weighs 536 grains, or something less than one and a quarter ounces. The above experiment on the weight of air is supposed to be made at the surface of the earth with the temperature at 50 degrees F. Heated air or air at high elevations is much lighter.

A Deferred Call.

In a certain town in the county of Wexford there is a house the door of which must be raised a little to be opened, and for this purpose the hatchet is generally used. One night lately a knock came to the door, and a youngster was sent to see who was there.

"Who is there?" he inquired.

"Me," said a voice outside.

The youngster, knowing the voice, shouted back (in such a tone that the person outside could hear him):

"It's Mrs. Murphy. Get the hatchet!"

Needless to say Mrs. Murphy didn't wait.

He Wouldn't Wake.

One evening last week Mr. Poindexter, a travelling man, had a remarkable dream. He seemed to be exploring an old and unusued attic in his dwelling house. Presently he uncovered an ancient chest. He opened it and found it full of gold and silver.

So strong was the impression upon him that he realized at once the utter folly of waking up. Thereupon he slept on and continued to dream.

Bad Error.

"That was a rather serious mistake the types made in speaking of young Golightly."

"In what way?"

"Changed a 'u' into an 'a' and said he was a ragged specimen of athletic manhood."

An Exception.

"I never heard such a lot of gossip. The walls in that boarding house have ears, haven't they?"

"Yes, everywhere except about the dumb waiter."

In the Swiss Mountains.

"Ethel, that awfully handsome guide kissed me a moment ago. Do you think I ought to deduct something from his pay or add to it?"

Those edges soonest turn that are most keen. A sober moderation stands sure. No violent extremes endure.—Aleyn.

A High Couraged Horse

feels the will, as well as the support, of his driver through the reins by means of the bit. Although his course and rate of speed are changed from time to time at the will of the driver, the reins are never slackened; the horse becomes acquainted with the desires of his master by a sense of increased or diminished tension upon the reins. So it is with the normal eye. It is both controlled and supported, while performing its movements within the orbit, by the eye muscles (the reins.) The brain is the driver. At its command the eye revolves or remains stationary at any desired point; the tension of muscles opposed to any required movement of the eye is so modified by the brain as to insure the requisite support to the eye-ball and to steady it as it moves.

A House Warming

Quite a pleasant little affair took place on Thursday evening last, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. David Harrison, Moira St., who have just moved into their new home. The occasion was a "house warming," and between 50 and 60 guests were present. There were dainty refreshments, music and games, and those present enjoyed themselves greatly. An immense bouquet of American Beauty roses, which filled the centre of the table, was greatly admired. It was sent from Toronto by a friend of the host and hostess. The guests dispersed at an early hour, voting Mr. and Mrs. Harrison ideal entertainers.

Died In Indiana.

Word was received in the city to-day announcing the death of Dr. Fred Fanning, which occurred at Adrian, Ind., yesterday. Deceased, who was about 62 years of age, was born in the Township of Sidney, where he spent his boyhood days, and also married a Miss Meyers, of that township. He had been living in Indiana for years. A wife and two sons survive. Mr. Walter Fanning, of this city, is a cousin of the deceased.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

LADIES DESIRE REPRESENTATION.

The following resolution was presented by Mrs. Gordon Wright:

Whereas, it has been stated by members of the General Conference that the women of the church do not desire ecclesiastical enfranchisement, and whereas, we believe that the principle of sex discrimination in this particular, as from the organization of our church until the present, its womanhood has ever evidenced an intelligent and vital interest in all departments; and whereas we believe that the enfranchisement of the women by church courts will be the entering wedge to a national and civic enfranchisement, whereby we hope to more speedily secure the outlawing of the liquor traffic in Canada,

Resolved, That the Board of Managers of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Church respectfully memorialize the General Conference that at its next sitting it so amend its constitution re the composition of all church councils, by substituting the words "lay members" for the word "laymen,' believing that the highest interests of our church will be best served by an equal recognition of its united membership."

CLOSING BUSINESS.

The Courtesy Committee reported through Mrs. Knox, and the thanks the church boards and hostesses, the the churhe boards and hostesses, the Superintendent of the Deaf and Dumb Institute, the Principal of Albert College, the choir, and to all who had in any way contributed to the pleasure and entertainment of the Board.

So ended a session which the members declare to have been highly profitable and pleasant.

Foresters Felicitate Bro. Robt. Mathison.

ON HIS RECENT APPOINTMENT — AN APPRECIATIVE RESOLUTION CARRIED WITH ACCLAIM.

The members of Court Moira, No. 33, I. O. F. turned out in force last night, in order to do honor to the newly-appointed Supreme Secretary of the order, Bro. R. Mathison.

The meeting opened at 8.30 with Chief Ranger, A. R. Walker, presiding, supported by the High Chief Ranger of Eastern Ontario, Bro. Dr. Wade, of Wooler.

After the routine business had been completed P. C. R. Bro. Arthur McGinnis, moved, seconded by Bro. W. S. Morden, the following resolution:

"That the officers and members of Court Moira, No. 33, I.O.F., desire to express and place on record their deep sense of regret at parting from their esteemed brother, Robert Mathison, Esq., on the occasion of his leaving Belleville, to assume the distinguished and responsible duties of Supreme Secretary of the Order. They desire to cordially acknowledge his valued services to this Court and to the Order generally, during the years he has been their companion, guide, and familiar friend, and they feel that the whole Order is to be congratulated, as well as himself, on his appointment as Supreme Secretary, believing that he will be an added strength to, and a further guarantee of confidence in, the Supreme Councils of the Order.

"In wishing him, Mrs. Mathison and his esteemed family godspeed, they express the earnest hope that he may often revisit this Court, receiving their friendly welcome and giving them the counsel and encouragement which it has been their privilege in the past to enjoy."

The hearty and spontaneous way in which the members endorsed this resolution was ample testimony to the popularity of Bro. Mathison, and the confidence which his appointment inspires. The mover and seconder, Bros. Campbell, Milburn, London, Mallory, Mikel, Brown and the High Chief Ranger, each in an appropriate speech eulogized Bro. Mathison, who made a characteristic reply, in the course of which he stated that he felt very much flattered by the warm welcome accorded him by his brothers of Court Moira, and assured his hearers that although he was proud of the honor of being appointed Supreme Secretary, he had not sought the position, and that he would bring his very best energies to bear upon the duties of that office, so that his tenure of the same would be productive of the best results to their noble order.

The following telegram was read during the evening:

To Arthur McGinnis, Belleville:

"Sorry I cannot be with you tonight. Greetings to brethren. Heartiest congratulations to Court on unanimous election of Brother Mathison to his new position. Best wishes for his success, which I know is assured.

(Sgd.) "ORONHYATEKA."

Refreshments were served at the close of the meeting, and the usual toasts were duly honored.

Another Milk Test.

As will be seen by the table presented, and the remarks appended by Dr. Yeomans, Medical Health Officer, there is an improvement in the quality of milk supplied in the city by the various milk vendors. Yesterday a test was made of the milk supplied by the various vendors, and the result was as follows;

No.	Name	Temperature	Lactometer Reading	Butter Fat	Remarks
18	Jno. Callaghan	61	33.6	3.2	Not clean flavor.
19.	Wm. Rose	64	31.	5.1	Not clean flavor.
17.	Andrews	62	30.3	3.5	Good.
11.	Mrs. Doran	62	29.5	5.	Good.
13.	Waldron	62	29.3	4.4	Good.
9.	Boyd	61	30.5	5.	Good.
15.	Mrs. Bird	62	30.8	3.9	Not clean flavor.
21.	Mrs Flagler	62	32.5	4.5	Good.
2.	Rushworth	62	30.	3.6	Good.
12	Meagher	64	30.5	3.4	Good.
23	Crunk	64	30.5	4.5	Good.
3.	J Thompson	64	33.6	6.1	Good.
8.	Jno. Little	66	26.7	6.5	Not fair sample—mer. milk
5.	Bailey	64	33.	4.7	Old flavor.
1.	Cook	66	32.9	4.4	Good.
16.	Andrews	65	31.	3.9	Good.
7.	Plumpten	65	30.	4.7	Good.
4.	Haight	66	31.1	3.4	Good.
6.	Gay	65	30.7	4.3	Good.
14.	Demorest	64	30.5	4.7	Good.
10.	Fenn	65	31.	4.3	Good.
20	Vandervoort	66	31.5	4.	Good.

The Medical Health Officer adds the following remarks to the report;

"There is a continued improvement in the quality of the milk supplied by the different vendors, both in higher per cent. of butter fat, cleanliness, and freedom from adulteration. Milk should test at least 4 per cent. of butter fat at this time of the year and there are a few samples that are still too low in this respect. This season of the year is most favorable to the milk vendors, as with the lower temperature the milk is necessarily better cooled and kept. I would again impress on milk vendors the necessity of the proper cooling and care of milk, particularly during the hot season, and I purpose advising the Board of Health that during the coming year no license be issued to anyone for the sale of milk in the city of Belleville until it be shown that such applicant has a sufficient quantity of ice in store and clean, sanitary surroundings, so that the proper treatment and care of milk will be reasonably assured."

"CHARLIE'S AUNT."

The phenomenal success of the revival of "Charley's Aunt," in New York last spring was due in no little measure to the artistic work of Etienne Girardot, and the clever supporting company engaged by Manager North. "Charley's Aunt' is a delightful exemplar of innocent diversion, and its originality and ingeniousness add to the amusing character of the entertainment. Arrangements have been made to present Mr. Girardot in "Charley's Aunt" at the Carman on Tuesday evening next.

Fifty-Seven Conductors Have Been Dismissed.

G. T. R. IT IS SAID, HAS HAD DETECTIVES ON TRACK OF WRONG-DOERS FOR MONTHS.

Montreal, Oct. 26. — Absolute silence prevails in official G.T.R. circles here as to the dismissal of conductors from the service.

Messrs. F. H. McGuigan and Blacklock, the two heads of the department concerned, are out of the city, and other subordinates will not make any statement.

Mr. Hays returned from New York this morning, but declined to discuss the position of conductors, on plea of ignorance of details.

However, it has leaked out that about fifty-seven conductors on lines between Montreal and Port Huron, will lose their jobs. Detectives have been on their track for some months, and it is said the men have been caught receiving bribes for free passages.

Consternation reigns among the conductors here. One of them stated to-day that the Railway Conductors' Association would take the matter up and fight the case for the men.

An entirely different system of auditing car receipts has been in force on the Grand Trunk System than on the C.P.R., and as a result of the present trouble the Conductors' Association will recommend the G.T.R. to adopt the same one as now in force on the C.P.R. On the latter line there is a very rigid watch kept in all car receipts, and immediately on any discrepancy being found the conductor is called upon to account for it.

The G.T.R., according to their conductors, have no close watch on receipts, but from time to time use men and women detectives to gather evidence against conductors.

The men claim that for years past it was known that conductors on certain trains collected fares, but that the system was to blame for most of the losses, as it left the men too much latitude.

Up to a late hour to-day no more men had received notice of dismissal, but more are looked for in the next few days.

No range can bake so well as the Imperial Oxford, because no other range has the Diffusive Oven Flue that draws in pure air constantly, heats it just as hot as you want it heated, and sends it through every part of the whole oven every second. That flue, found only in this perfect range, keeps that heated pure air—DRY air—constantly moving DOWNWARD through the oven, over the baking food, and out up the chimney. When it enters the oven it's hot and dry; when it leaves it, it's wet air,—carries with it all the moisture, all the odors, but NONE of the juices of the food that's being baked.

Please visit any of our stores and see why this is the right range for your kitchen.

McINTOSH BROS.

BULLET THAT KILLED

Belanger Was Fired by Alex. Maclaren of Lumber Co.

Such Was Evidence Given In Buckingham Inquest Before Coroner McMahon — Three Bullets Passed Through Belanger, But 32 Calibre One Remained In Theriault's Body—Why Riot Act Was Not Read.

Buckingham, Oct. 27.—At the enquiry before Coroner McMahon of Montreal into the deaths of Belanger and Theriault, who were killed in the strike riots here, one of the witnesses swore that the shot that killed Belanger was fired by Alex. Maclaren of the Maclaren Lumber Co.

Drs. Wallace and Secord, who made the autopsies, gave evidence that the bullet wound in Theriault's body was from a 32 calibre revolver. He died one shot. Belanger had three bullet wounds, but all the bullets passed through him and were not found.

Dr. Rodrigue was put under severe examination by M. Maylen, counsel for the Maclaren Co., as to his presence in the buggy with the rifles. The doctor denied that he knew anything about the rifles being in the vehicle until he heard it by rumor afterwards. He also denied that he told any persons there would be bloodshed that afternoon. He swore Albert Maclaren used a revolver.

Why Riot Act Was Not Read.

Coroner McMahon said he would examine all the magistrates to learn why they did not read the Riot Act.

Magistrate Pearson explained that he was out of the town, and Magistrate Gorman, who was at the affray, said he did not anticipate serious trouble until the firing became furious.

J. B. Clement, a striker, swore that Belanger did not have a revolver, and that Alex. Maclaren fired the shot which killed Belanger. He was positive that the police fired the first shot.

Louis Landry, in whose rig the rifles were found, said that he did not know the names of the men who had the rifles. He is secretary of the union, and said that the strikers' rifles were not loaded, being designed as a bluff to frighten them.

DEPORT INSANE PEOPLE.

Estimated Saving to the Province of $2,000 for Each Patient Deported.

Toronto, Oct. 27.—The deportation of lunatics who have lived less than two years in Ontario is a work which is now being systematically carried out under the direction of Mr. S. A. Armstrong, Inspector of Asylums. The Dominion immigration act provides the authority for this action.

All the lunatics recently deported and several awaiting deportation have either arrived in this province in their present unsound mental condition or have gone insane soon after their arrival. In all cases where their condition is ascertained within the two-year limit mentioned the transportation companies which brought them here must bear the expense of taking them back to the countries whence they came.

The estimated saving to the province by each deportation is $2,000, this being based on the actual cost per year per patient, which in Ontario is $135, and the statistical evidence that the average life of a patient resident in an asylum is thirteen years.

Wins Case Against Crown.

Toronto, Oct. 27.—"A contract which is ratified by the Legislature does not amount to a statute and the Lieutenant-Governor and his executive council can, by order in council, make any changes in the contract," was the judgment of Chief Justice Meredith yesterday afternoon at the non-jury Assizes in the action brought by the Independent Cordage Co. against the Whitney Government, in which they claimed $13,000 in lieu of a full settlement of the contract given the company by the Ross Government in 1895 for the manufacture of binder twine at the Central Prison, and which was ratified by the Legislature. In 1897 another contract was made by the Cabinet without consent of the Legislature. The Government maintained that the order-in-council was not operative, and that instead of owing the company, the company was indebted to the present Government for over $50,000.

Railway Conductors Discharged.

Toronto, Oct. 27.—Having "spotted" for conductors who were not giving the company a square deal, the G. T. R. yesterday—if rumor be quite correct—asked for the resignations of between 50 and 60 conductors. No statement is forthcoming from headquarters at Montreal, and local officials profess a blissful ignorance either of the causes leading up to the discharges or the men affected. The conductors claim that they have been arbitrarily dealt with in not being allowed an opportunity to clear themselves, and it is their intention to bring the matter before the executive of the Order of Railway Conductors and Trainmen.

Pacific Coast Mail Subsidies.

Wellington, N.Z., Oct. 27.—The House of Representatives yesterday approved the renewal of the San Francisco mail subsidy for three years, with the proviso that now steamships shall be provided within two years. The House also authorized the making of a contract for the Vancouver service, giving $3,000 to steamers making the trip in eighteen days, the maximum subsidy to be $100,000.

Must Not Marry Divorcees.

New York, Oct. 27.—At the meeting Thursday night of the Union American Methodist Episcopal conference, which is in session here, the committee on divorce brought in a report forbidding any pastor in the connection marrying divorced persons. The resolution was passed unanimously by the general conference.

JAP SITUATION GRAVE

Exclusion of Japanese May Lead to Open Rupture With U. S.

Question Requires the Most Delicate Treatment Says a Member of Roosevelt's Cabinet—Action at San Francisco Attributed to Present Electoral Campaign In the U. S.—Jap Restaurant Windows Broken.

Washington, Oct. 27.—At yesterday's Cabinet meeting, among the important matters discussed was the situation growing out of the anti-American sentiment in Japan and the exclusion of Japanese children from the public schools of San Francisco.

It was stated by a member of the Cabinet, after the meeting, that the general opinion of the members was that the Japanese situation was exceedingly grave and would require the most delicate treatement to avoid an open rupture.

It developed yesterday that proceedings initiated in San Francisco Thursday, to compel the authorities to receive Japanese pupils into the public schools, were directed by the Department of Justice.

Telling In Japan.

London, Oct. 27.—In a despatch from Tokio, the correspondent of The Daily Telegraph says the Japanese Foreign Office has received a reply, through Ambassador Viscount Siuze Aoki, at Washington, to the effect that the exclusion of Japanese children from the schools of San Francisco was quite a local affair.

The American Government was not aware of the details of the incident until after the receipt of the cablegrams from Japan. The American ambassador at Tokio, Luke E. Wright, has given a pledge that the United States will not discriminate between Japanese and other foreign children, and that she undertakes to protect Japanese interests fully.

Lamentable Incident.

Baron Kentare Kaneko, a member of the Privy Council, the correspondent continues in the course of an interview on this subject, said the incident was lamentable in view of the ever-increasing friendship between Japan and the United States. He applauded the moderate tone of the Japanese press, which he declared to be based upon gratitude.

He said further, there was undoubted evidence that Japan was deeply pained at the action of San Francisco, but it was universally held that the exclusion of Japanese children from San Francisco schools was an outcome of the present electoral campaign in the United States.

Jap Restaurants Suffer.

Japanese restaurant-keepers have suffered indignities in San Francisco as well as Japanese school children, according to reports received by the Japanese ambassador from the Japanese consular officials in that city.

At least seven or eight reports have been made concerning a boycott inaugurated against Japanese restaurants in the California city. Agents have been posted to prevent patrons from entering the restaurants, and in several instances stones have been thrown and windows broken, according to the statements of Japanese officials.

Aggression Is Purely Local.

These cases have been brought to the attention of Secretary Root by Viscount Aoki, who says it is with great reluctance that he brings to the attention of the central Government demonstrations against the Japanese, which are purely local in their nature.

Viscount Aoki said that all the trouble has been confined to San Francisco. The ambassador assured his Government again yesterday that the outbreak against the Japanese is purely local, and was much gratified at receiving despatches which showed that the Japanese press is for the most part attempting to check the feeling against Americans.

COLORED COOK THE HERO.

Gave Life In Vain Effort to Save Aged Captain of Skagit.

Victoria, B.C., Oct. 27.—The steamer Salvor returned last evening from the scene of the Skagit wreck, reporting the barkentine rapidly breaking up, and landing here the eight survivors of the disaster—E. Lankow, first mate; J. Schluelle, second mate; O. Kruger, Dan Dovani, H. Johnson, John Weston, T. Sullivan and T. Siiose.

All had a hard fight for life and are badly cut and bruised. The colored cook, Pete, is admitted the hero of the occasion, giving his life in a vain attempt to save Capt. Rosewell, who was advanced in years. His body was recovered and brought by the Salvor for burial here.

N. S. Ship Given Up.

Halifax, N.S., Oct. 27.—The barkentine Milton, Captain Jas. Manthorn, owned in Liverpool, N.S., on her passage from Havana to Mobile, has been out 32 days, and as the trip should be made in six days all hopes for her safe arrival are given up. The Milton was in ballast, and it is supposed she foundered with all on board. She was fully insured.

Proof in Belleville.

Mrs. Green, of East James street, has proven what Anti-Pill can and will do.

"I think Dr. Leonhardt's Anti-Pill is the best medicine I have ever known," says Mrs. A. V. Green. "For years I have suffered with constipation, and I got so bad at last that no ordinary dose of medicine would help me. I suffered with piles a great deal.

"I am a working woman and always very busy, and I got nothing to help me till I tried Dr. Leonhardt's Anti-Pill. I found this a very satisfactory remedy and can cheerfully recommend it to any who may be suffering as I did."

Right at home here in Belleville is this case, and Mrs. Green will cheerfully testify to anyone in earnest what she knows of Anti-Pill, the Twentieth Century Cure for Constipation.

STROUD'S

NATION IS ABOVE STATE

Elihu Root Finds Way Out of Japanese-U. S. Difficulty.

Sixth Article of the Federal Constitution to Be Invoked—Treaties Come Under Class of "Supreme Law of the Land"—States Rights to Receive Severest Blow Since Civil War—A Momentous Decision.

New York, Oct. 29.—Washington advices to The Tribune point out that for the first time in the history of the United States the sixth article of the constitution is to be invoked to compel local authorities within a state to respect the provisions of a treaty, and the doctrine of states' rights seems destined to receive the severest blow it has experienced since the civil war.

Previous administrations have remained helpless in the face of local action, which has seriously embarrassed the nation in its relations with foreign powers, and outrages within the boundaries of the states have gone unpunished by the Federal Government because of the belief that the Federal Government was without jurisdiction.

It has remained for Elihu Root, the present Secretary of State, to enunciate the principle that the constitution of the United States affords ample authority to compel observance by a state of the provisions of an international treaty.

Article 6 of the constitution of the U.S. declares:

"This constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary, notwithstanding."

Confident that Secretary of State Root is correct in his belief that there is full authority under the constitution, the administration will promptly endeavor to put a stop to those discriminations against Japanese citizens which local authorities within the State of California have been and are practising in violation of article 1 of the treaty of 1894, between the Japanese Empire and the United States of America.

Japs Won't Boycott.

Tokio, Oct. 28.—The course of action pursued by the United States, with the view of protecting the treaty rights of Japanese has been somewhat effective in soothing the feelings of the Japanese people, injured by the San Francisco school incident, and it is altogether unlikely, and there is yet no sign whatever, that the Japanese will imitate the Chinese in boycotting American goods.

Victory Was Astounding.

Russia's Protected Treasury Wagon Looted by Terrorists.

Two Bombs Thrown and Highwaymen Get $193,000 From Government Wagon In the Centre of St. Petersburg About Noon on Saturday--Daring Exploit Results In Wounds For Bystanders --Preparing For Stolypin.

St. Petersburg. Oct. 29.—The revolutionary terrorists achieved Saturday in the heart of St. Petersburg an astounding victory over the Government's protected treasury. The scene was behind the Kazan Cathedral on the street leading to the Catherine quay.

The daring robbery was committed at about noon by which a number of terrorist highwaymen got away with $193,000 from a wagon which was conveying the cash from the Custom Department to the State Treasury.

Two Bombs Thrown.

Two bombs were thrown in quick succession at the vehicle as it was passing close to a branch of the treasury, after which a rush was made at the wagon by a number of armed men who, after exchanging a hot fire with the gendarmes escorting it, managed to secure the booty and fled across a small footbridge over the Ekaterinsk Canal, leaving five of their number in the hands of the police.

Many bystanders sustained slight injuries as a result of the explosions.

Preparing For Stolypin.

One of those captured was a boy named White, who, when interviewed at the hospital, said: "We got the money; we are preparing for Stolypin."

The act was unquestionably one of revolutionary terrorism and not common robbery.

AGED MAN SHOOTS WIFE.

Tragedy on the Quebec Esplanade—Has Been Acting Strangely.

Quebec, Oct. 29.—Saturday morning a man named George Lecouteur shot and instantly killed his wife on the Esplanade here.

The pair, it seems, were sitting on one of the benches facing St. Louis street, near the Garrison Club, when Lecouteur suddenly drew his revolver and fired, the bullet entering his wife's left cheek and passing through the brain, causing instant death.

No cause is assigned for this dreadful act, but, it is said, by Lecouteur's friends that he has been acting strangely of late, and it is thought he was mentally deranged.

Lecouteur was immediately arrested and lodged in central police headquarters. The body of his victim, a lady of about 60 years of age, was removed to the morgue, where an inquest will be held.

Lecouteur is a man about 65 years old, and is the father of Donald Lecouteur, who was killed in the Transvaal after the South African war.

Shirking Responsibility

Early in the month of October a great deal of attention was attracted by the case of the proprietor of a licensed hotel in a village near Aylmer, in West Elgin, who was found guilty of and fined for keeping a disorderly house. The case was unique because the Grit candidate in the East Elgin bye-election was forced to withdraw from the contest at a late hour on account of his connection with the affair. The evidence in the case was so conflicting that the Magistrate before whom the case was tried aptly termed it a contest of liars.

But apart from the party political aspect of the case the comments made by the Magistrate, Mr. Hunt, a man of thirty years' experience as a magistrate made a decided sensation. After disposing of the case Mr. Hunt addressed the audience in the courtroom and expressed his strong opinion that all hotels, licensed or unlicensed, should be conducted in a moral way. But he stated that as a result of local option elections there had come into existence in that part of the country a number of unlicensed disorderly houses which had a most corrupting influence upon the community. He said that he himself had seen from ten to thirty rigs tied up at these places and that in these rigs have been a man and woman. Magistrate Hunt added;

"A man came to me the other day and he said, Squire, there is a local option hotel in my neighborhood and I am sorry to say that my boy is going there at nights. I see many girls going there almost every night from the city (St. Thomas), and many young men, too, I want you to put a stop to it

"I said, How do you know this?"

"He answered, I have watched it with my own eyes."

"I said to him, 'You lay the information and I will take care to look after the matter.'

"But," continued the Magistrate, "he did not want to do this for fear he said of creating bad-feelings. Then I told him to lay the information, anyway, and I would subpoena his boy. His answer was, Squire, I am afraid my boy would not tell the truth,' and he declined to lay the information.

"Two or three nights later there was a prayer meeting, and this same man asked Almighty God to close up that bawdy house. I am afraid that in the day of judgment the Almighty will want to rule him out of court for contempt. In place of asking the Almighty to shut up that house that man and his friends should have got a hustle on, secured the evidence necessary to convict the keeper of that house, laid an information, and I would have done the rest."

As might be expected Magistrate Hunt's charges created considerable stir in his locality and among the local option party. Mr. Hunt stands by his statements, however, and defies successful contradiction. There must be some grounds for his serious statements or a man in his position and of his experience would not have made them.

There are two points in this case, very pertinently says the Brockville Times, which will be agreed upon generally. The first is that all places for the accommodation of the travelling public ought to be under provincial government supervision; the second is that those who are mainly instrumental in having moral laws passed should be prepared to help actively in the enforcement of the same, and should be prepared to shoulder their share of responsibility.

Every newspaper knows full well how many people shirk responsibility in public affairs. People come to a newspaper time after time and want the newspaper to fire some shot which they dare not. The editor asks them to sign their names to certain charges or statements which they wish made in the press, and it is astonishing how quickly they crawl back into their shells. Plenty of ardent party men want the newspaper to criticize this, that and the other person or thing but they will not do it themselves lest they might "lose business." Has a newspaper no business to lose also? And we can well believe the incident quoted by Magistrate Hunt. We must all bear our share of the burden if we do our duty. If the local option people about St. Thomas desire to cleanse the morals of that district, they must be prepared to bear possible trouble, expense or odium.

Four Years For Assault.

St. Thomas, Oct. 29.—James H. Jordan, who pleaded guilty to the charge of knocking down and robbing Edward Gable, a Yarmouth farmer, near the Dominion Hotel, was Saturday sentenced by Police Magistrate Glenn to four years at hard labor in the Kingston Penitentiary. Jordan was formerly a Wabash brakeman, and had not been arrested before.

Success to the rolling mills, which to-day began operations in earnest May they roll all sorts of iron and cause all sorts of money to roll into the pockets of their owners. They can't do that without helping Belleville.

Everyone who heard 'The Creation" last time the Philharmonic sang will be delighted to see that they will soon begin rehearsals for another oratorio. Entre nous, great things are promised this time. Don't whisper it to a soul, but they do say that Mr. R. Watkin-Mills, one of the greatest singers that ever crossed the pond, will sing the leading role in "The Messiah." He will be in Canada at the time, on one of his tours. The next Philharmonic Concert promises to be one of the greatest musical events ever held in Belleville. Everybody who can do anything at all to help it along should certainly do so.

A remarkable showing was made this year in municipal ownership by the Port Arthur Council. Although a great deal of public work was done, incidental to the growing municipality, earnings of the various franchises have been so great that the Council is able to strike a general rate of nine mills on the dollar The net earnings of the street railway, light, plants, telephone and water system were sufficient to take care of the total debenture debt.

Hardly anybody will look at Front street just now and decline to admit that the question "How can good roads be built? should be one which all Bellevillians would like to hear discussed. Just at present our main thoroughfare is a terrible eyesore — it generally is at this time of the year. Other seasons during which it is often in poor condition are spring and summer. It is admitted by nearly everybody that something must be done to improve Front St. What shall it be?

The Scientific American, New York, is a recognized authority on all matters appertaining to the arts and crafts, and to the scientific development of everything connected with the welfare of the community in general. Recently this journal has been taking up the question of the good roads movement. In a late issue it editorially says;

"Of all the works of man that come in the province of the civil engineer, there are few, if any, which call for more careful attention and more immediate repair on the first signs of disintegration, than the common road. Perhaps the nearest to it in this respect is the roadbed of the steam railway; though we doubt if even that heavily worked system shows the lack of upkeep so quickly as does a frequently travelled highway. The amount of ignorance or indifference displayed in the neglect of new macadamized roads would scarcely be creditable to a European, who has been accustomed to witness the watchful care with which the famous roads of Europe are maintained and the very first signs of wear corrected. Instead of keeping a gang of men employed in the constant day by day repair of weak spots, hollows and ruts, our authorities seem to think in many cases that it is sufficient to spread a few loads of top dressing over the surface of the road annually or biennially, as the case may be, and let it go at that. Under this method the solid portions of the road receive just as much care as those which have developed soft spots and shown the need of some extended repair. The top dressing serves no better purpose then to temporarily cover up the damage of the last season's travel and in a few weeks' time the surface is about as badly, if not more, broken up than before. Matters go from bad to worse until there is a call for drastic remedies. In nine cases out of ten the drastic remedy consists in breaking up the entire surface, and practically rebuilding the road.

"Now it has been proved to a demonstration not merely in Europe but in certain sections of this country where the maintenance of roads is intelligently and conscientiously carried on, that if a macadamized road is properly built in the first instance, with firm foundation, adequate drainage, and an ample crown to shed the water from its surface; and if a small force of men, answering to the section gang on a steam railroad, be kept constantly employed in repairing any incipient wear of the road, such a highway need never be rebuilt, but will be good for all time. That is the great lesson which needs to be enforced by the advocates of good roads."

The Scientific American generally knows what it is talking about, and it would appear, according to that journal, that what Bellevillians need on Front St. is a PROPERLY BUILT macadamized road, "with firm foundation, adequate drainage, and ample crown to shed the water from the surface," and then section gangs to repair the incipient wear of the road. Until we adopt some recognized system, such as outlined above, we can never hope to have a good roadway on Front street. For years and decades the old system of building a roadway of rotten limestone has prevailed. Thousands and thousands of dollars have been wasted. The sensible way now would be for the Council to import proper material and lay a macadam road in the manner described by the Scientific American — after steps have been taken to see that the everlasting excavation work comes to an end. Then we can look for a creditable roadway on Front street, and not before.

It is to be hoped that none of the delegates in this city last week had such an experience as the two ladies in the following incident, which is related by the Kingston News;

An odd incident of the Sunday School convention was related to the News this morning. Two lady delegates were handed the address of the place at which they were to stay They found the house and gently knocked upon the door. In about two minutes the door opened A woman's head was thrust out as though to make a survey of her guests.

"Bah! you won't suit.'

That was all she said, and bang went the door closed in their faces.

The ladies returned to the committee rooms for another address.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

"CHARLEY'S AUNT" TO-MORROW

Etienne Girardot, one of the best light comedians on the stage to-day, is making an elaborate revival of the famous farce comedy, "Charley's Aunt," and will present it at the Carman to-morrow night. "Charley's Aunt" is beyond a doubt the greatest comedy presented in this country in twenty years. It ran for an entire year in New York and was equally successful in all the large cities of the United States. In London it was the single attraction at one of the principal theatres for over five years, and this long engagement alone made its author a millionaire.

"THE MAN OF HER CHOICE."

"The Man of Her Choice," written and produced by that rising young author-manager, Mr. Edw. W. Simmonds, which comes to the Carman on Friday next, has been discussed and criticized at great length wherever it has played, and has met with unqualified endorsement of many eminent divines, several of whom have declared that were more plays of like character produced the antagonism and prejudice against the stage which is sometimes displayed by the pulpit would quickly disappear. Its moral is pointed and has often served as a text. The story is plain, and is simply told.

"GIRLS WILL BE GIRLS."

One of the most amusing scenes in "Girls Will be Girls," William A. Brady's big musical production, with Al. Leech and the Three Rosebuds, which comes to the Carman next Saturday, is the cook fight at the close of the second act. Real prize game cocks are used, and while the birds are protected from injuring each other, all the excitement of a real cock fight is indulged in. It is certainly one of the most amusing acts that has been seen on the stage for a long time. "Girls Will be Girls" should please all theatregoers.

Death Of a Child.

Mr. and Mrs. "Bert" Ketcheson, who reside on Henry street, will receive the sincere sympathy of many friends in the death of their little son, Charles Wilmot Ketcheson, who passed away this morning of croup. The little fellow, who was a general favorite in the neighborhood, was very bright and lovable, being about a year and a half old. His illness was not of long duration.

The hold-up man's rule of three is 'Put up, give up and shut up."

DEAF MUTES OBJECT

WILL WAIT ON PREMIER RE APPOINTMENT OF DR. COUGHLIN.

Toronto, Oct. 29. — The Toronto members of the Ontario Deaf Mute Association met at Afton Hall Saturday evening, with their president, Geo. W. Reeves, in the chair. J. T. Shilton was appointed acting secretary The attendance was very large. Several important matters pertaining to the welfare of the deaf were brought up and discussed at full length.

General regret was expressed at the resignation of R. Mathison as superintendent of the Ontario School for the Deaf, after having rendered faithful service for 27 years.

The appointment of Dr. Coughlin, of Peterboro, was criticized, the fear being expressed that on account of inexperience in this line of work the pupils would suffer and it was thought wise to send a deputation to wait on Premier Whitney.

It was also thought advisable to have the number of deaf teachers at the school increased, as they have natural sympathy with the pupils, and understand them better than any other.

A deputation, as a consequence, will shortly wait on the Government to lay before them a petition referring to the above and other matters.

PILES CURED IN 6 TO 14 DAYS.

PAZO OINTMENT is guaranteed to cure any case of Itching, Blind, Bleeding or Protruding Piles in 6 to 14 days or money refunded. 50c.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

Educational Sunday In Methodist Churches.

Yesterday was "Educational Sunday" for the Belleville district of the Methodist church, and sermons bearing upon the line of religious education were given in the various churches of the district. At Bridge Street Church the preachers of the day were the Rev. Prof. A. H. Reynar, M.A., LL.D., of Victoria University, in the morning, and in the evening Rev. Dr. Potts, General Secretary of the Educational Society. The latter gentleman preached to a large congregation, and gave, as usual, an eloquent and impressive address. His text was from Ephesians, 3rd chapter and 8th verse:

> "Unto me who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

Preaching was in truth, the Rev. Dr. said, Christ-like, and character was a mighty power behind the preacher. The success of all Christian work was conditioned on purity of life and consecration of heart. The greatest preacher of the first and all succeeding centuries, except the Saviour, was Paul, whose estimation of himself is expressed in the words of the text. He was a great scholar, orator and hero, a man of great humility. In the year of our Lord 59, Paul was under conviction, and humbled himself as a little one, and acknowledged that he was the chief among sinners. As a disciple of the Lord Jesus he considered himself as the least among them, and yet he was the chief. His writings in the epistles are not given that credit which are due them. They have been the means of recording many victories on the moral battlefield of life. Preaching was the grandest work of man. The work of the secular teacher was high, the work of the press was good, but the work of the preacher transcends them all. He (the preacher) was pleased to note that congregations of to-day were demanding bread from heaven, to know more of Jesus Christ, which is the theme of the books from Genesis to Revelations. The Saviour, who is He? He was the one who was foretold by the prophets of old, He was the branch out of the stem of Jesse. He came with healing in His wings, He was the tried stone, the elect and the precious; He was the Rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley, He was the lion of the tribe of Judah and He was the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world. No one can estimate the unsearchable riches of the Lord Jesus Christ. We have a Saviour of unlimited power, and he demonstrated that power over disease and death. The unsearchable riches of Christ's grace are seen in the trickling tear of the penitent and in the sanctifying power over sin. Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world. We do not know what the language of heaven is, and we do not know what the patriarchs, martyrs and loved ones are doing, neither can we know the marvellous love of Christ. Who shall scale the unscaled heights of Christ's love? His love for mankind was beautifully exemplified just previous to his death. After the last supper, in agony, he went to the garden of Gethsemane, and falling upon the ground prayed "O, my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." The unspeakable love of Christ was manifested when he was upon the cross. One of those who were crucified with him prays to the Son of God to remember him when he came to His kingdom. The Saviour's answer was, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise." The music of that sentence fills all heaven today. The demand to-day is for preachers who can open the book and expound the unsearchable riches of Christ.

The Rev. gentleman at the conclusion of his discourse referred to the Educational Society of the church and what it was doing towards assisting the young men into the ministry. The work was enlarging and there was need for a higher standard of education, and at the recent meeting of the General Conference the unanimous opinion was that it must go nigher. More means were necessary to carry on the work, and he was pleased to state that more money was being received. He made an earnest appeal for subscriptions to the fund.

During the service Mrs. Percival Allen sang a solo entitled, "I Will Lay Me Down in Peace." Mr. S. R. Burrows sang "The Pilot Song," and Miss G. Price took the solo part in the anthem entitled, "We Sow the Seed."

Emmanuel R. E. Church.

At the above church there was a good congregation last night, and the rector, Rev. A. M. Hubly, preached a thoughtful sermon on the topic, "Resuscitated life beneath dead ribs," the text being:

> "Son of man, can these bones live?"

The power of the Lord, the preacher said, was unlimited, but it was hard to make people believe with the faith that would move mountains. During the offertory Miss Lillian Hubly sang "Loved Ones Are Calling," with chorus by the choir, in a sweet and tuneful way.

Christ Church.

"The Marriage Supper" was the theme discussed last evening by the rector, Rev. R. C. Blagrave. His text was from St. Matthew, 22nd chapter and 2nd verse:

> "And sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding, and they would not come."

Tabernacle.

At the morning service Rev. Dr. Potts occupied the pulpit and gave an address in reference to the Educational work of the Methodist Church. He made an earnest appeal for funds to assist in carrying on the work on a much larger scale. In the evening the Rev. Dr. Reynar occupied the pulpit and his theme was also in reference to educational work. His text was from the 1st Epistle of Peter, 3rd chapter and 15th verse:

> "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear."

During the service Miss Flossie Moon rendered a solo most acceptably.

Holloway Street

At Holloway St. Church the district appointment for educational anniversary was recognized and appreciated. Mr. E. Bruce Hunter, of Albert College, gave a helpful sermon in the morning, from the parable of the Good Samaritan, Luke 10, 37. "Go thou and do likewise." In the evening the Rev. G. Brown gave a practical and eloquent discourse from the theme "Child Education," based on Prov. 4: 7-8, "Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom; exalt her and she shall promote thee." The speaker showed that knowledge heightened pleasure, and inspired and perfected every task.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

SPORTING NOTES.

The Hamilton Tigers are all-conquering. On Saturday they beat the Toronto Victorias by 33 to 3. There seems to be only one real football team in the O.R.F.U.

Other football results were: Toronto Argonauts 13, Peterboro 8; McGill 23, Queen's 20; Varsity 27, Ottawa College 0; Montreal 18, Rough Riders 4; St. Patrick's 23, Westmount 6.

Thomas Longboat, the Indian who won the Hamilton Herald road race on Thanksgiving day, captured the Ward Marathon race in Toronto on Saturday, running the 15 miles in an hour and thirty-one minutes. This noble red man seems easily the best distance runner in Canada — if not America—to-day. Sixty-two men started, and the second, Goldsboro of Toronto, was over three minutes behind Longboat. The roads were very bad, and the time, under the circumstances, was remarkable.

A good story is told of how Longboat first found out he was a runner. One day last summer, after driving into Hamilton with his mother and brother he got separated from them in town, and after failing to find them he ran home, about 15 miles. When the others reached home Thomas was waiting for them.

AS SMOOTH AS A BILLIARD TABLE.

Your comfort on a railway journey very largely depends upon the roadbed of the route you select. No matter how luxurious the coaches, or how much personal attention you receive from the employees, you cannot be comfortable if jolted and jarred by a poor and irregular roadbed. On the Lake Shore Railway no expense has been spared to make a roadbed as nearly perfect as the most skilful engineering could build, and as a result, throughout the entire length and breadth of the system the right of way is as smooth as a billiard table. No jolts or jars, nor dust nor dirt. This perfection of service extends throughout the entire system. Lake Shore trains are the most luxurious, they are equipped with every comfort and convenience and are run at highest speed and in safety. They run on time. For your own sake you should see that your ticket reads "via Buffalo and The Lake Shore Railway." Write for full information about rates and routes to J. W. Daly, Chief A.G.P.A., Buffalo, N. Y.; A. J. Smith, G.P.A., Cleveland, O., or W. J. Lynch, Passenger Traffic Mgr., Chicago, Ill.

To Keep Books From Mold.

A few drops of any perfumed oil will secure libraries from the consuming effects of moldiness and damp. Russian leather, which is perfumed with the odor of the birch tan, never gets moldy, and merchants suffer large bales of this article to lie in the docks in the most careless manner, knowing that it cannot sustain any injury from damp.

Barley.

Barley ripens to perfection on the sides of the Himalaya mountains up to 12,000 feet above sea level. There is no other place in the world where it matures at a greater height than 9,000 feet.

To Haul Over the Coals.

"To haul over the coals" recalls the former legal custom of trial by fire, the accused walking barefoot over a bed of glowing coals, and his innocence or guilt was deduced from the condition of his feet after a certain number of days elapsed.

The Pelican's Pouch.

The pelican's pouch is its game bag. It stores the fish in the pouch and, when it has captured enough, goes to land and devours them at its leisure.

Heat of the Sun.

It is calculated that only a two thousand-millionth part of the heat emitted by the sun is caught by the earth, whose coal supply power is relatively so infinitesimal that if every bit of coal in the world were cast into one great bonfire and instantaneously burned it would not generate as much heat as the sun produces each tenth of a second.

The Violet Snail.

The violet snail, very common in Europe and in some parts of this country, has the curious property of being able to inflate its body with air and thus become a true air raft.

The Tailor Bird.

The tailor bird takes its name from its habit of sewing together two leaves in order to make a pocket, in which it places its nest. Its thread is a vegetable fiber, though it will in preference use a string, thread or cord if such can be found.

Rules of the Road.

In the United States a driver of horses sits on the right and turns his team in that direction. In England the national custom is the reverse.

Tin.

Tin is one of the oldest known metals. The Chinese used it in the fabrication of their brasses and bronzes from time immemorial. In the book of Numbers it is among the list of metals of which, among other things, Moses and the Israelites despoiled the people of Midian. The ancient Romans used it for coating the inside of copper and brass vessels.

TIMELY TOPICS.

HE FINDS IT DIFFICULT.

I've tried from my earliest youth
A shining example to set
As a pattern of absolute truth,
And I mean to accomplish it yet.
I deserve all the credit I get.
For my virtue is often sublime,
But I own, with a deal o' regret,
That it's hard to be good all the time.

To be honest, at least I essay,
As a general thing I succeed,
We're informed that it always will pay,
Still. I hardly subscribe to that creed,
But, except there's imperative need,
I would not rob a child of a dime,
I prefer to be honest, indeed,
But it's hard to be good all the time.

Yes, I try to be gentle and kind,
And I like to be temperate, too,
It is not very often you'll find
One so noble and honest and true.
If I slip, that's what other folks do,
But I seldom have lapsed into crime,
I'm not bad if you take me all through,
But it's hard to be good all the time.

Hon. A. B. Aylesworth is much alarmed regarding the British constitution in view of the staggering blow which the Laurier candidate received in Quebec. The British constitution is, however, much safer than Aylesworth's political future.

England, which claims the rose as its national flower, appears to be losing its prestige as a rose-raising country. At the Rose Society's show, held in London recently, all the principal prizes went to Scotch, Irish and Welsh raisers, Scotland, curiously enough, taking most of the first prizes, while another striking feature of the show was that the only two new varieties of rose came from the Emerald Isle. One was a hybrid tea rose of great size and perfect form, its color being a ripe rose pink. The other was a new seedling, also large flowered, its hues being a delicate blending of pink, buff, saffron and cerise shades.

People who have been inclined to think that the Canadian banks were making money too fast, and that the Government was giving them too large powers, must, says a Quebec paper, pause in their criticisms when they note the fate of the shareholders of the Ontario Bank. The stock for which these persons a few weeks ago paid 140 or thereabouts, is now worth only a few dollars, and for some time they must have been in agonozing uncertainty whether they would not be liable for an actual out-of-pocket payment on account of their double liability. There are few industrial investments in which values could be swept away as quickly as that, and considering the risks involved, bank investors are not overpaid.

STRIKERS PREPARED TO FIGHT.

Union Men Had Arms Ready, One of Them Swears.

Ottawa, Oct. 29.—The inquest at Buckingham on the dead strikers did not continue on Saturday. Adjournment was made to Tuesday.

Sensational evidence was given by Jos. Mercier, a member of the Millmen's Union, who swore that at a meeting of the union the proposal to fight with arms was broached. He also saw rifles stacked in and around the room.

This damaging evidence rather seriously affects the moral position of the strikers at least.

Murder and Suicide.

New York, Oct. 29.—Louis C. Hampton, assistant secretary of the United States Trust Co. of this city, shot and killed Victoria I. Taczkow, a beautiful young woman, in the Hotel Griffou, in West Ninth street late Friday night, and then committed suicide. Hampton was infatuated with the woman, and they were registered at the hotel as "Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair, Burlington, Vt." Hampton, who was about 60 years old, leaves a wife and two children.

Goes For Trial.

Brockville, Oct. 29.—Tony Raggizina, the Italian under arrest for the abduction of 15-year-old Luella Widdis, appeared before the magistrate Saturday. He was fined $50 and costs for carrying concealed weapons, and was committed for trial on the abduction charge.

Zoroastrian Beliefs.

The Zoroastrian faith acknowledges Ormazd, Ahura Mazda, "Lord Wisdom," as the supreme god, with six archangels, Amesha Spenta, and a company of angels, Yazata, about him to rule and guide the world. The infernal host of fiends and archfiends who war against heaven and strive to destroy the future life of man is led by Anra Mainyu, the evil spirit. In discussing with these Zoroastrians the subject of the origin of evil I found that they look upon the supreme being, Ahura Mazda, as comprising within himself the two powers of good and evil—namely, Spenta Mainyu, the holy spirit, and Anra Mainyu, the evil spirit. This is similar to the monotheistic view held by the Parsis of India in opposition to the statement frequently made that Zoroastrianism is pure dualism. They believe also in the resurrection of the dead, which their faith has taught them since early times, and this doctrine is connected with the belief that there will come a saviour or messiah, called the Saoshyant.—A. V. Williams Jackson in Century.

Blind From Birth.

It would be of great interest to know how much Helen Keller, losing her sight at nineteen months, really retained of the sense of sight. With Laura Bridgman, a woman of much less intellect, there was evidently little or nothing left, even as a memory. With her taste and smell were very feeble so that communication with the world was, indeed, through a narrow passage. Her sensitiveness to vibration was so fine that without any trace of the sense of hearing she was aware of the tolling of a bell. But her biographer, giving us in detail the record of the slow steps of her education, tells us little of what idea she was able to form of things. It is Schopenhauer who gives one hint of what we all want to know of the born blind. He says that a man blind from birth to whom sight was given by an operation put his hand to his eye to grasp there and not in their place the things he saw.—London Chronicle.

The Crumpet Story.

Oliver Wendell Holmes professed to have a profound respect for the Dutch, possibly on account of what he used to call "the European aborigines of America" being Dutch. He gave an aspect of slyness to his respect which inspired the idea that it was not untempered by humor, but he maintained that the Dutch, in spite of their stolidity, had a great deal of humor themselves. "For instance," he would say, "the crumpet story has a Dutch origin." "What is the crumpet story?" people would ask. And he would tell them that it had many variants, but the one with which he was familiar was about a man who was going to be hanged and was asked whether he had any last request to make and said he would like to have a dozen hot crumpets, very buttery, because he had never dared to eat more than one before.

Mechanism of the Human Body.

The human body is an epitome in nature of all mechanics, all hydraulics, all architecture, all machinery of every kind. There are more than 310 mechanical movements known to mechanics today, and all of these are but modifications of those found in the human body. Here are found all the bars, levers, joints, pulleys, pumps, pipes, wheels and axles, ball and socket movements, beams, girders, trusses, buffers, arches, columns, cables and supports known to science. At every point man's best mechanical work can be shown to be but adaptations of processes of the human body, a revelation of first principles used in nature

The Trunkfish.

The trunkfish is one of the peculiar inhabitants of the ocean. It is called the trunkfish because its back is completely covered with bony plates of a regular shape, forming a complete coat of mail. It is protected so completely that it can move only its tail, mouth and a small part of its gills, which pass through the armor. It is quite a small fish and is found only in the warm waters of the southern tropical seas.

An Innocent Diversion.

"Poor woman!" sighed the prison visitor to the convicted murderess. "Does not the thought of your impending doom cause your mind to revert to the days of your innocent childhood? Do you not wish you could be playing again as you did then"—

"Why, yes," replied the poor woman. "I would like to skip the rope."

His Retort.

Laird—Well, Sandy, you are getting very bent. Why don't you stand straight up like me, man? Sandy—Eh, mon, do you see that field o' corn over there? Laird—I do. Sandy—Weel, ye'll notice that the full heids hang down and the empty ones stand up.

Economical.

"Mother said she thought you were extravagant, Tom, but I proved you were not."

"You darling! How did you do that?"

Temper may be a troublesome thing, but you never mend matters by losing it.

- - The - - Crimson Blind

BY FRED M. WHITE

Author of "Tregarthen's Wife," "The Robe of Lucifer," Etc.

Copyright, 1905, by R. F. Fenno & Company.

He had taxed his strength to the uttermost, but he was free to rest now.

Meanwhile, the conference in the dining-room proceeded. Lord Littimer had received his guest with frigid politeness, to which Bell had responded with an equally cold courtesy. Littimer laid his cigar aside and looked Bell steadily in the face.

"I have granted your request against my better judgment," he said. "I am not sanguine that the least possible good can come of it. But I have quite grown out of all my illusions: I have seen the impossible proved too often. Will you take anything?"

"I hope to do so presently," Bell said, pointedly; "but not yet. In the first instance I have to prove to you that I have not stolen your Rembrandt."

"Indeed? I should like to know how you propose to do that."

"I shall prove it at once. You were under the impression that you possessed the only copy of the 'Crimson Blind' in existence. When you lost yours and a copy of the picture was found in my possession, you were perfectly justified in believing that I was the thief."

"I did take that extreme view of the matter," Littimer said, drily.

"Under the circumstances I should have done the same thing. But you were absolutely wrong, because there were two copies of the picture. Yours was stolen by an enemy of mine who had the most urgent reasons for discrediting me in your eyes, and the other was concealed amongst my belongings. It was no loss to the thief, because subsequently the stolen one—my own one being restored to you—could have been exposed and disposed of as a new find. Your print is in the house?"

"It hangs in the gallery at the present moment."

"Very good. Then, my lord, what do you say to this?"

Bell took the roll of paper from his pocket, and gravely flattened it out on the table before him, so that the full rays of the electric light should fall upon it. Littimer was a fine study of open-mouthed surprise. He could only stand there gaping, touching the stained paper with his fingers and breathing heavily.

"Here is a facsimile of your treasure," Bell went on. "Here is the same thing. You are a good judge on these matters, and I venture to say you will call it genuine. There is nothing of forgery about the engraving."

"Good heavens, no," Littimer snapped. "Any fool could see that."

"Which you will admit is a very great point in my favor," Bell said, gravely.

"I begin to think that I have done you a great injustice," Littimer admitted; "but, under the circumstances, I don't see how I could have done anything else. Look at that picture. It is exactly the same as mine. There is exactly the same discoloration in the margin in exactly the same place."

"Probably they lay flat on the top of one another for scores of years."

"Possibly. I can't see the slightest difference in the smallest particular. Even now I cannot rid myself of the feeling that I am the victim of some kind of plot or delusion. The house is quiet now and there is nobody about. Before I believe the evidence of my senses—and I have had cause to doubt them more than once—I should like to compare this print with mine. Will you follow me to the gallery, if you haven't forgotten the way?"

Littimer took up the treasure from the table gingerly.

He was pleased and at the same time disappointed; pleased to find that he had been mistaken all these years, sorry in the knowledge that his picture was unique no longer. He said nothing until the alcove was reached, and Chris drew back in the shadow to let the others pass.

"Now to settle the question for all time," Littimer said. "Will you be so good as to turn on the electric light? You will find the switch in the angle of the wall on your right. And when we have settled the affair and I have apologized to you in due form, you shall command my services and my purse to right the wrong. If it costs me £10,000 the man who has done this thing shall suffer. Please to put up the light, Bell."

Chris listened breathlessly. She was not quite certain what she was about to see. She could hear Bell fumbling for the light, she heard the click of the switch, and then she saw the brilliant belt of flame flooding the alcove. Littimer paused and glanced at Bell, the latter looked round the alcove as if seeking for something.

"I cannot see the picture here," he said. "If I have made a mistake——"

Littimer stood looking at the speaker with eyes like blazing stars. Just for a moment or two he was speechless with indignation.

"You charlatan," he said, hoarsely. "You bare-faced trickster."

Bell started back. His mute question stung Littimer to the quick.

"You wanted to be cleared," the latter said. "You wanted to befool me again. You come here in some infernally cunning fashion, you steal my picture from the frame and have the matchless audacity to pass it off for a second one. Man alive, if it were earlier I would have you flogged from the house like the ungrateful dog that you are."

Chris checked down the cry that rose to her lips. She saw, as in a flash of lightning, the brilliancy and simplicity and cunning of Henson's latest and most masterly scheme.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

After the first passionate outburst of scorn Lord Littimer looked at his visitor quietly. There was something almost amusing in the idea that Bell should attempt such a trick upon him. And the listener was thoroughly enjoying the scene now. There was quite an element of the farcical about it. In the brilliant light she could see Littimer's dark, bitter face and the helpless amazement on the strong features of Hatherly Bell. And, meanwhile, the man who had brought the impossible situation about was calmly sleeping after his strenuous exertions.

Chris smiled to herself as she thought out her brilliant coup. It looked to her nothing less than a stroke of genius, two strokes, in fact, as will be seen presently. Before many hours were over Henson's position in the house would be seriously weakened. He had done a clever thing, but Chris saw her way to a cleverer one still.

Meanwhile the two men were regarding one another suspiciously. On a round Chippendale table the offending Rembrandt lay between them.

"I confess," Bell said, at length. "I confess that I am utterly taken by surprise. And yet I need not be so astonished when I come to think of the amazing cunning and audacity of my antagonist. He has more foresight than myself. Lord Littimer, will you be so kind as to repeat your last observation over again?"

"I will emphasize it, if you like!" Littimer replied. "For some deep purpose of your own, you desired to make friends with me again. You tell me you are in a position to clear your character. Very foolishly I consent to see you. You come here with a roll of paper in your possession purporting to be a second copy of my famous print. All the time you knew it to be mine—mine, stolen an hour or two ago and passed instantly to you. Could audacity go farther? And then you ask me to believe that you came down from town with a second engraving in your possession."

"As I hope to be saved, I swear it!" Bell cried.

"Of course you do. A man with your temerity would swear anything. Credulous as I may be, I am not credulous enough to believe that my picture would be stolen again at the very time that you found yours."

"Abstracted by my enemy on purpose to land me in this mess."

"Ridiculous," Littimer cried. "Pshaw, I am a fool to stand here arguing: I am a fool to let you stay in the house. Why, I don't believe you could bring a solitary witness to prove that yonder picture was yours."

"You are mistaken, my lord. I could bring several."

"Credible witnesses? Witnesses whose characters would bear investigation?"

"I fancy so," Bell said, quietly. "Two nights ago, for instance, I showed the very picture lying before you to a lady of your acquaintance, Miss Enid Henson. I couldn't have had your picture two nights ago, could I? And Miss Henson was graciously pleased to observe that I had been made the victim of a vile conspiracy."

"Why do you insult me by mentioning that name?" Littimer said, hoarsely. His face was very pale, and sombre anger smouldered in his eyes. "Tell me you showed the thing to my wife next."

"I did," said Bell, coolly. "Lady Littimer was in the room at the time."

Something like a groan escaped from Littimer's pallid lips. The smouldering light in his eyes flashed into flame. He advanced upon Bell with a quivering, uplifted arm. Chris slipped out of the shade and stood between the two men.

"Dr. Bell speaks the truth," she said. "And I am going to prove it."

Littimer dropped into a chair and gave way to silent laughter. His mood had changed utterly. He lounged there, a cynical, amused man of the world again.

"Upon my word, I am vastly obliged to you for your comedy," he said. "I hope your salary as leading lady in Bell's company is a handsome one, Miss Lee."

"Let us hope that it is more handsome than your manners, my lord," Chris said, tartly. "I beg to remark that I have never seen Dr. Bell before. Oh, yes, I have been listening to your conversation, because I expected something of the kind. The Rembrandt was stolen some time before Dr. Bell arrived here, and in due course I shall show you the thief. Lord Littimer, I implore you to be silent and discreet in this matter. Have a little patience. Quite by accident I have made an important discovery, but this is hardly the place to discuss it. Before daylight I hope to be able to prove beyond question that you have greatly wronged Dr. Bell."

"I shall be glad to be convinced of it," Littimer said, sincerely. "But why this secrecy?"

"Secrecy is absolutely necessary for the conviction of the thief."

Bell looked eagerly at the speaker.

"I have not the remotest notion who this young lady is," he said, "but I am greatly obliged to her."

"My secretary, Miss Lee," Littimer murmured; "an American from Boston, and evidently a great deal cleverer than I gave her credit for, which is saying a great deal. Miss Lee, if you know anything, I implore you to speak."

"Not here," Chris said, firmly. "Stone walls have ears. I tell you the Rembrandt was stolen just before Dr. Bell reached the house. Also I tell you it is imperative that nobody but ourselves must know the fact for the present. You trust me, Lord Littimer?"

"I trust you as implicitly as I do anybody."

Chris smiled at the diplomatic response. She approached the panel of the wall on which the Rembrandt had been fastened. She indicated the long steel stays which had been clamped on to the iron frame. "Look at them," she said. "It was my suggestion that the stays should be attached to the frame to prevent anything like this robbery. I made the stays secure myself. And what happened to justify my prudence? Why, the very same night somebody came here after the picture."

"Henson!" Littimer cried. "Ah! But he could have come openly."

"It is not in the nature of the man to do things openly," Chris went on. "I know more about the man than you imagine, but that you are to keep to yourself. He comes here in the dead of the night and he gets into the house through an upstair window. A man of his bulk, if you please! And he comes here hot-foot and breathless at a time when common prudence should have kept him in bed. Why? Because he knows that Dr. Bell has the other Rembrandt and will come to prove it, and because he knows that if he can steal the Littimer Rembrandt he can precipitate the very impasse that he has brought about. But he could not steal the picture because it was fast."

"You are a very clever young lady," Littimer said, drily. "You will tell me next that you expected Henson to try this thing on."

"I did," Chris said, coolly. "I had a telegram to warn me so."

Littimer smiled. All this mystery and cleverness was after his own heart. He lighted his cigarette and tendered his case in the friendliest possible manner to Bell.

"Go on," he said, "I am deeply interested."

"I prefer not to go into details," Chris resumed. "All I ask you to do is to be entirely guided by me when you have heard my story. I have admitted to you that I knew when Henson was coming, and why am I interested? Because it happens that Reginald Henson has greatly injured someone I cared for deeply. Well, I fastened up the picture—he came. He sneaked in like the thief that he was because his accomplice and tool had failed to save him the trouble. Lord Littimer, I will not pain you by saying who Henson's accomplice was."

Littimer nodded gloomily.

"Not that I blame that accomplice; he could not help himself. Ah, when the whole truth comes to be told, what a black business it will be. Well, Henson came to steal the picture and I caught him in the act. If you had seen his fat, greasy, crestfallen face! Then he pretended that it was all done for a jest and as a warning to Lord Littimer. And Lord Littimer, the most cynical of men, allowed it to pass."

"I couldn't see what he had to gain," Littimer pleaded. "I don't now, as a matter of fact."

"Neither will you for the present," said Chris. "Still, you will be so good as to assume the same hospitality and courtesy towards Henson as you extend at present."

"I daresay I can manage it," said Littimer, cynically. "I used to be a society man once."

"Henson did not deceive me for a moment," Chris went on. "He was bound to have the picture, and, being baffled one way, he tried another. Look here, Lord Littimer. Let me assume for a moment that Dr. Bell came down here to steal your picture, get rid of the frame, and palm off your own engraving for another. Now, in the name of common sense, let me ask you a single question. Could Dr. Bell have possibly known that the frame of the Rembrandt was securely fastened to the wall and that I had attached it quite recently? And could he in the short time at his disposal have procured the necessary tools to cut away the stays? Again, Dr. Bell can prove, I suppose, exactly what time he left London today. No, we must look farther for the thief."

"There is something else also we have to look for," said Dr. Bell. "And that is the frame. You say it was of iron and consequently heavy. The thief would discard the frame and roll up the print."

"That is a brilliant suggestion," said Chris, eagerly. "And if we only had the frame I could set Lord Littimer's doubts to rest entirely. I happen to know that the real thief came and went by the cliff under the terrace. If the frame was thrown into the gorse, there it——"

"Might stay for ages," Littimer exclaimed. "By Jove, I'm just in the mood to carry this business a stage or two farther before I go to bed. Bell, there are two or three cycle lamps in the gun-room. You used to be a pretty fearless climber. What do you say to a hunt for an hour or two whilst the house is quiet?"

Bell assented eagerly. Chris waited with what patience she could command till daylight began to show faintly and redly in the east. Then she heard the sound of voices outside, and Littimer and Bell staggered in carrying the frame between them.

"Got it," Littimer exclaimed, with the triumphant exultation of a schoolboy who has successfully looted a rare bird's-nest. "We found it half-way down the cliff, hidden behind a patch of samphire. And it doesn't seem to be any the worse for the adventure. Now, Miss Wiseacre, seeing that we have the frame, perhaps you will fulfil your promise of convincing me, once and for all, that yonder Rembrandt cannot possibly belong to me."

"I am going to do so," Chris said, quietly. "You told me you had to cut the margin of your print by an inch or so round to fit that quaint old frame. So far as I can see, the print before you is quite intact. Now, if it is too large for the frame——"

Littimer nodded eagerly. Bell fitted the dingy paper to the back of the frame and smiled. There was an inch or more to spare all round. Nobody spoke for a moment.

"You could make it smaller, but you couldn't make it bigger," Littimer said. "Bell, when I have sufficiently recovered I'll make a humble and abject apology to you. And now, wise woman from the West, what is the next act in the play?"

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Chris smiled with the air of one who is perfectly satisfied with her work.

"For the present I fancy we have done enough," she said. "I want to go to bed now, and I want you both to do the same. Also I shall be glad if you will come down in the morning as if nothing had happened. Tell Reginald Henson casually that you have been convinced that you have done Dr. Bell a grave injustice, and give no kind of particulars. And please treat Mr. Henson in the same fashion as before. There is only one other thing."

"Name it, and it is yours," Littimer cried.

"Well, cut the margin off that print, or at any rate turn the margin down, fit it into the frame, and hang it up as if nothing had happened."

Littimer looked at Chris with a puzzled expression for a moment, and then his features relaxed into a satyr-like grin.

"Capital," he said. "I quite understand what you mean. And I must be there to see it, eh?—yes, I must be there to see. I would not miss it for strawberry leaves."

The thing was done and the picture restored to its place. Bell drew Chris aside for a moment.

"Do you rise early in the morning?" he asked, meaningly.

"Always," Chris replied, demurely. "I find the terrace charming before breakfast. Good-night."

Bell was down betimes despite the fact that it had been daylight before he was in bed. Along the terrace, looking over the cliffs, Chris was already walking, a great cluster of red and yellow roses in her hand. She looked as fresh and bright as if she and excitement were strangers. All the same she seemed to avoid Bell's eyes.

"Isn't it lovely here?" she exclaimed. "And these roses with the dew still upon them. Well, Dr. Bell, have you made fresh discoveries?"

"I have discovered that Henson is going to take his breakfast in bed," Bell said gravely. "Also that he requires a valet at half-past ten. At that time I hope to be in the corridor with Lord Littimer and yourself. Also I have made a further discovery."

"And what is that, Dr. Bell?"

"That you and I have met before—once before when I attended you in a kind of official capacity, and when I behaved in a distinctly discreditable professional manner. Dr. Walker was present. Dr. Walker seems to have been singularly short-sighted."

The roses fell from Chris's hands on to the path. Her face had grown very pale indeed; there was a frightened, appealing look in her eyes.

"Dr. Bell," she gasped, "do you suppose that anybody else knows—Henson, for instance? And I imagined that I had utterly deceived him!"

Bell smiled meaningly.

"I don't think you need have the slightest anxiety on that score," he said. "You see, Henson is comfortably assured that you are dead and buried. Whereas I know all about it. Fortunately for me, I became mixed up in this strange business on behalf of my friend, David Steel; indeed, but for Steel, I should probably have given you away to our friend Walker."

"But surely you guessed that——"

"Not for the moment. You see, it was only a few minutes before that a flood of interesting light had been let in upon Henson's character by your sister to me, and my first idea was that Henson was poisoning you for some purpose of his own. Subsequently Steel told me all about that side of the story on our way back to Brighton."

"How did you penetrate my disguise?"

"My dear young lady, I have not penetrated your disguise. Your disguise is perfect—so quaint and daringly original—and would deceive even Henson's eyes. I guessed who you were directly I found that you were taking a philanthropic interest in our friend. It came to me by a kind of intuition, the knack that stood me in such good stead in my professional days. When you said that you had been warned of Henson's coming by telegram I was certain."

"Then perhaps you guessed that Enid sent me the telegram?"

"That was obvious. Also it was obvious that Henson brought Frank Littimer along."

"Oh, he did. It was Frank's mission to steal the picture. I confronted him with a revolver and locked him in one of the bedrooms. It took all my courage and good resolutions to prevent me from betraying myself to the poor fellow."

"Rather cruel of you, wasn't it?"

"Well, yes. But I wanted to make the exposure as complete as possible. When the time comes to strip Reginald Henson of his pretentions and flog him from the family, the more evidence we can pile up the better. But Frank is not bad; he is merely weak and utterly in the power of that man. If we can only break the bonds, Frank will be a powerful factor on our side."

"I daresay. But how was the Rembrandt stolen? Littimer's, I mean."

"It was worked through an accomplice," Chris explained. "It had to be done before you arrived. And there was no better time than night for the operation. I guessed that when Henson drew the fact from me that I liked the terrace after dinner. By a bit of good luck I found the accomplice and himself together in the day; in fact, I forced Reginald's hand so that he had to introduce me to the man."

"In which case you would know him again?"

"Of course. Presently I am going to show you a little more of the comedy. Well, I was on the terrace pretty late when I heard dear Reginald down the cliff calling for assistance. He pretended that he had slipped down the cliff and could not get up again. By the aid of a rope that fortunately happened to be close at hand I saved our dear friend's life. I have learnt from one of the gardeners just now that Reginald placed the rope there himself—a most effective touch, you must admit."

The Wooing of Woman

Began in the Garden of Eden and has been going on with all its delicious consequences ever since. It is the starting point of a woman's life, the hour in which the sun really begins to shine.

Be she savage or civilized it is the dawning of the great light for which every woman longs. The story of how the world in every clime has done its wooing is the most fascinating that can be told the children of men and women.

THE FRANK A. MUNSEY CO., New York

"Very," Bell said, drily. "But I quite fail to see why——"

"I am coming to that. Don't you see that if anything happened Reginald could prove that he was not near the house at the time? But just before that I saw his accomplice come up the cliff; indeed, he passed quite close to me on his way to the house. Reginald quite overlooked this fact in his heed for his own safety. When I had effected my gallant rescue I heard an owl hoot. Now, there are no owls about here."

"I guessed what that meant—it was a signal of success. Then I went back to the corridor and the Rembrandt was gone. The stays had been cut away. At first I was dreadfully upset, but the more I thought of it the more sure I was that it was all for the best."

"But you might have raised an alarm and caught the thief, who——"

"Who would have been promptly disclaimed by Reginald. Let me tell you, sir, that I have the thief and the lost Rembrandt in the hollow of my hands. Before the day is out I shall make good my boast. And there's the breakfast bell."

It looked quite natural some time later for the three conspirators to be lounging about the gallery when Henson emerged from his bedroom. He appeared bright and smiling, and most of the bandages had been removed from his throat. All the same he was not pleased to see Bell there; he gazed uneasily at the doctor and from him to Littimer.

"You know Bell," the latter said, carelessly. "Fact is, there's been a great mistake."

Bell offered him his hand heartily. It cost him a huge effort, but the slimy scoundrel had to be fought with him own weapons. Henson shook his head with the air of a man extending a large and generous meed of forgiveness. He sought in vain to read Bell's eyes, but there was a steady, almost boyish, smile in them.

"I indeed rejoice," he said, unctuously. "I indeed rejoice—rejoice—rejoice!"

He repeated the last word helplessly; he seemed to have lost all his backbone, and lapsed into a flabby, jellified mass of quivering white humanity. His vacant, fishy eyes were fixed upon the Rembrandt in a kind of dull, sleepy terror.

"I'm not well," he gasped. "Not so strong as I imagined. I'll—I'll go and lie down again. Later on I shall want a dogcart to drive me to Moreton Wells. I——"

He paused again, glanced at the picture, and passed heavily to his room. Littimer smiled.

"Splendid," he said. "It was worth thousands just to see his face."

"All the same," Chris said, quietly; "all the same, that man is not to leave for Moreton Wells till I've had a clear hour's start of him. Dr. Bell will you accompany me?"

CHAPTER XXXV.

Lord Littimer polished his rarely used eye-glass carefully and favored Chris with a long, admiring stare. At the same time he was wondering why the girl should have taken such a vivid interest in Reginald Henson and his doings. For some years past it had been Littimer's whim to hold up Henson before everybody as his successor, so far as the castle went. He liked to see Henson's modest smirk and beautiful self-abasement, for in sooth his lordship had a pretty contempt for the man who hoped to succeed him. But the will made some time ago by Littimer would have come as a painful shock to the philanthropist.

"It is a very pretty tangle as it stands," he said. "Miss Lee, let me compliment you upon your astuteness in this matter. Only don't tell me you schemed your way here, and that you are a lady detective. I read a good many novels, and I don't like them."

"You may be easy on that score," Chris laughed. "I am not a lady detective. All the same, I have defeated Mr. Reginald Henson."

"You think he is at the bottom of the mystery of the other Rembrandt."

"I am certain of it; unless you like to believe in the truth of his charming scheme to give you a lesson, as he called it. As a matter of fact, Mr. Henson discovered the existence of the other print; he discovered that Dr. Bell possessed it—the rest I leave to your own astuteness. You saw his face just now?"

"Oh, yes. It was a fine study in emotions. If you could find the other picture——"

"I hope to restore it to you before the day has passed."

Littimer applauded, gently. He was charmed, he said, with the whole comedy. The first two acts had been a brilliant success. If the third was only as good he would regard Miss Lee as his benefactor for ever. It was not often that anybody intellectually amused him; in fact, he must add Miss Lee to his collection.

"Then you must play a part yourself," Chris said, gaily. "I am going into Moreton Wells, and Dr. Bell accompanies me. Mr. Henson is not to know that we have gone, and he is not to leave the house for a good hour or so after our departure. What I want is a fair start and the privilege of bringing a guest home to dinner."

"Vague, mysterious, and alluring," Littimer said. "Bring the guest by all means. I will pledge my diplomacy that you have a long start. Really, I don't know when I have enjoyed myself so much. You shall have the big waggonette for your journey."

"And join it beyond the lodge-gates," Chris said, thoughtfully. "Dr. Bell, you shall stroll through the park casually; I will follow as casually later on."

A little later Henson emerged from his room dressed evidently for a journey. He looked flabby and worried; there was an expression very like fear in his eyes. The corridor was deserted as he passed the place where the Rembrandt hung. He paused before the picture in a hesitating, fascinated way. His feet seemed to pull up before it involuntarily.

"What does it mean?" he muttered. "What in the name of fate has happened? It is impossible that Merritt could have played me a trick like that; he would never have dared. Besides, he has too much to gain by following my instructions. I fancy——"

Henson slipped up to the picture as a sudden idea came to him. If the picture had not been removed at all the stays would still be intact. And if they were intact Merritt was likely to have a bad quarter of an hour later on. It would be proof that——

But the stays were not intact. The heads had been shaved off with some cutting instrument; the half of the stays gleamed like silver in the morning light. And yet the Rembrandt was there. The more Henson dwelt upon it the more he was puzzled. He began to wonder whether some deep trap was being laid for him.

But, no, he had seen no signs of it. In some way or another Bell had managed to ingratiate himself with Littimer again, but not necessarily for long, Henson told himself, with a vicious grin. Nor was Littimer the kind of man who ever troubled himself to restrain his feelings. If he had got to the bottom of the whole business he would have had Henson kicked out of the house without delay.

But Littimer suspected nothing. His greeting just now showed that Bell suspected nothing, because he had shaken hands in the heartiest manner possible. And as for Miss Lee, she was no more than a smart Yankee girl, and absolutely an outsider.

Still, it was dreadfully puzzling. And it was not nice to be puzzled at a time when the arch-conspirator ought to know every move of the game. Therefore it became necessary to go into Moreton Wells and see Merritt without delay. As Henson crossed the hall the cheerful voice of Littimer hailed him.

"Reginald," he cried, "I want your assistance and advice."

With a muttered curse Henson entered the library. Littimer was seated at a table, with a cigarette in his mouth, his brows drawn over a mass of papers.

"Sit down and have a cigar," he said. "The fact is I am setting my affairs in order—I am going to make a fresh will. If you hadn't come down last night I should probably have sent for you. Now take my bank-book and check those figures."

"Shall we be long?" Henson asked, anxiously.

Littimer tartly hoped that Henson could spare him an hour. It was not Thirst, Not Frost, Kills Plants.

(Chicago Tribune.)

With the coming of frost we are reminded that plants do not freeze to death in the early winter, but perish from thirst. The process is simple. The cold causes the withdrawal of the water from the cells of the plant, forming ice crystals outside the cells. The frost, cooling and contracting the surface, acts as a sort of pump, and as soon as the cell is emptied of its life-giving fluid the plant dies. The truth of this theory has been proved during the present fall by numerous careful experiments. Great variation was found in the amount of cold necessary to cause the death of vegetation. Some plants dry out quickly and are killed before the freezing point is reached. Many plants will survive zero weather, and some die only at twenty degrees below. Certain vegetable growths never freeze. There are forms of bacteria that even when immersed in liquid air, the intensest cold available come out of their bitter bath as chipper and lively as ever.

"THE JOURNEY OF LIFE"

TRUST IN MATERIAL POSSESSIONS NOT BEST EQUIPMENT.

THE CALL TO WORLD SERVICE

Work For the Lord Is Insistent, Inasmuch as One May Not Boast of Having Other Time Than the Present to Do It In—None Know What a Day or an Hour May Bring Forth.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Diver, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 28.—In this sermon the preacher shows the folly of trusting in a continuance of material blessings as a means of happiness. The text is Proverbs xxvii, 1, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

One of the most impressive pictures I have ever seen was one entitled "The Journey of Life. It depicted a rowboat being pulled out to a ship in the offing. A large family with their household goods were in the boat. In the stern were the gray-haired grandfather and grandmother. Like the great picture of Napoleon leaving France, these two old folks were earnestly scanning the receding shore. Their lives were nearly ended, and their thoughts were in the past. They were living entirely in the sweet memories of the days that were gone. At the feet of the old folks their grandchildren were playing with their toys. Like two little kittens, they did not seem to care what was happening. Their thought world had not yet been entered. Just beyond two young lovers were plighting their troth. They were walking for a little while in the cloudlands. They were sipping for a short time the sweet nectar from the flowers which bloom only for a day during the mating of the birds. But at the prow of the boat stood the strong man of the world, with his wife by his side. His eye had an eagle glance. His brow rested on his hand. He seemed to be looking into the dim future, at his home which was yet to be built in a foreign land, at the visionary fields which were yet to be tilled and at the fortune which he was yet to make. The picture was suggestive to my mind of that momentous journey which we call the voyage of life.

Not all of us reach the stage typified by the grandparents. Some come to the end of the journey in the period of childhood, some in youth, some in mature life. It is very uncertain, but it is well in our early years if we plan carefully for the future instead of spending the time in idle dreaming or in pleasure. The foundations of our career are laid earlier than some of us imagine, and, whether that career be long or short, those foundations should be laid well.

These plans are very different from the presumptuous boasting condemned in my text. Here King Solomon describes the lazy man, the indolent man, the procrastinating man, the man who is giving free license to his evil passions, the man who is blinding his eyes to all the magnificent opportunities of the glorious present as he says to himself: "I know I am not doing as I ought to do. But what is the difference? Rome was not built in a day. A life is not spanned by the short bridge of twenty-four hours. This day I will eat and drink and be merry, and to-morrow I will do as I ought to do." "Ah," says the great king, "to-day is thine. This coming twilight may be thy last eventide. Perhaps the moon which will arise to-night will shine through the open window and touch thine ashen cheek as the attendants are preparing thy body for the burial. To-morrow may come to thy neighbor, but this day may usher in for thee an endless and unchanging eternity." Let me read for you again the sentence, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

These words are a timely warning to those who are slowly, yet surely, allowing the fatal coils of an evil habit to intwine about them—timely because these poor deluded victims seem to be going to their destruction with wide open eyes, as an ox to the slaughter. But somehow they feel that, no matter how deep their feet may be sinking into the quicksands or how thick the slimy seaweeds may be wrapping themselves about the swimmer's body, yet they can come safe to land and break loose from their evil habits whenever they will. Now, my friend, I would tell you that an evil habit instead of growing weaker with age grows stronger. If an evil habit has you in a tight clutch to-day it will have you in a tighter vise to-morrow. It is folly for a man to say, "I will break away from this evil habit to-morrow." If you cannot break away from that evil habit to-day you cannot to-morrow. If you are not willing to break away from an evil habit to-day, in all probability you will be weaker still to-morrow. The law of the increasing moral weakness of the wrongdoer and the increasing strength of an evil habit is irrevocable.

A man becomes more and more helpless in the grip of an evil habit, just as in the clutch of the quicksand. I am glad I used that illustration. It is one that you will feel if you have ever been caught in those treacherous depths. I remember some time ago when driving through the western country we came to a rather wide creek. I was about to drive through it when the gentleman with whom I was riding said, "Wait; let me test it." He took off his shoes and stockings and started for the other side. "Come on!" he cried. "It is shallow all through." I shook the reins as a signal to the horse, and he started. He went only a few steps and then stopped, frightened. No sooner did he stop than the wheels of the wagon began to sink. "Come on! Come on!" cried my companion. "The quicksands are catching you. Come on!" But come on I could not. In a minute or two the wheels had sunk a third of the way to the hubs. The horse could not pull the load. It was no time for argument. We leaped out of the wagon and plunged into the water, clothes and all. Then every hand took hold of a wheel and began to lift and push, and we just saved the wagon and the horse. "Ah," I said to myself as I came dripping out of the water, "how like the deceptive influence of the quicksands are evil habits! When we first drive up to them they look so harmless and innocent, but no sooner do we allow these evil habits to grasp us than, like the dangerous quicksands, they will creep up to the ankle, then to the knee, then to the hip and then to the heart. Then the more we struggle the deeper we will sink and the more helpless we will become."

My friend, what right have you to say that the evil habit which is working such dangerous havoc in your life now will be more easy to eradicate to-morrow? If it is difficult to chain a little cub as he snarls in your hand and bits and scratches and tears your bleeding flesh to get away, will it be easier to tame and cage the Bengal tiger after he has gained his strength and his claws have grown as sharp as rapiers and his jaws have the vigor of a steel trap? If the Alpine climber is so benumber by the cold that his eyes become heavy with sleep, will that cold cease to continue its deadly work when he lies down to slumber and the whistling winds cover his shivering flesh with a soft quilt of snow? I see now three travelers lost upon the western prairie. A biting blizzard is cutting through their clothing like a knife. One of these travelers, physically weaker than his companions, becomes exhausted. Drowsily he falls to the ground and goes to sleep. His two friends jerk him up and begin to pound him and to rub the cold snow upon the frozen flesh. "Oh," he says, "let me sleep! Let me sleep just a little while, and then I will go with you." "No," they say; "you must not sleep. If you do it will be the sleep of death. Every minute this cold will benumb you more and more. You must walk. You must throw off this lethargy or you will die." Thus these two friends drag him round and round all night until morning breaks and safety is theirs. In this benumbing way our evil habits affect us. We say: "To-morrow we will change. Now, just one more glass, one more carousal." But each intoxicating cup, each debauch, each yielding to sin, renders us more and more helpless to fight sin. My brother, if you do not conquer your evil habits to-day you will not conquer them to-morrow. If you cannot put out a spark to-day you cannot quench the great conflagration. If you do not step on the smouldering fuse you cannot snuff out a gunpowder magazine after the explosive has reached it. Now is the time for you to get your emancipation from that destroying, debasing, evil habit — now, now, now! Oh, the importance of that infinite word now!

But this gospel motto gives a scathing rebuke to the visionary seeker after happiness as well as to those who drowsily mutter to their sins and evil habits, 'Oh, let me rest upon my bed of sin a little while longer, and then I shall bestir myself and do what I ought to do." It bitterly denounces those fault finders who always repine at the present and have their eyes focused upon the dubious blessings of the future. Yet some people never see a beautiful sailboat unless it is shining on the edge of a distant horizon, nor a happy home unless it belongs to a neighbor, nor smell a sweet perfume unless it is wafted to them from the visionary gardens which shall bloom five or ten years hence.

The journey of life might be compared to a summer camping trip. There is an old proverb which says, "You never know people aright unless you eat with them at the morning breakfast table." But I tell you that the breakfast table may prove deceptive in reference to your acquaintance's true characteristics, but a camping trip—never. There the true nature of a man or a woman can be read by all as an open book. Now, on an average camping trip some people are like bees—they can find honey wherever they may fly. They are like song birds—they can sing, no matter where you place them. They are like sunbeams—they will sparkle and dance, no matter whether they are up in the mountains or down in the valleys. Everything they eat is the most appetizing of all foods. Every person they meet is a kind person. No travelers pass them upon the road but they stop to chat and joke with them. Their beds of pine needles are the softest. The water that leaps out of the brooks is the purest. The sunsets and the sunrises are the most glorious. They laugh and play and make merry every day of their lives. And during all of their next winter's work they never tire of telling the pleasing incidents of the past summer's trip.

But, though all the members of your camping party pass over the same roads and meet the same difficulties, there is nearly always one member who does nothing but grumble. Like an owl who never sees well unless the darkness envelops him, this fault finder sees nothing but midnight. He is always droning a dirge. He grumbles at the heat and grumbles at the cold. Now, mark you, my friend, these people of a camping party breathe exactly the same air, drink the same water, meet the same people, camp under the same trees, and yet four of them will find nothing but blessings and the fifth nothing but troubles. Such is the greater journey called life. There always are pleasure-finders on the journey. There are grumblers there too.

Now, my fault-finding friend, if you find to-day filled with troubles you will also find the burdens of to-morrow awaiting you when you awake in your bed. The joys and the happiness of life are not to be decided by what a man has, but by the condition of his own heart. If you do not learn to be happy to-day and if you persistently postpone your happiness you will be miserable as long as you live, and there is no exception to the rule. If you are not happy in a humble home you would never be happy in a palace. If you are not happy as a clerk you will not be happy as an employer. If you are not happy as a young girl you will not be happy as a woman. This living in the joys of the future is all nonsense. It is the will-o'-the-wisp guiding its deluded followers, not into the "gardens of the gods," but into the quagmires and the swamps, where every step you take will make you sink deeper and deeper into the mud of the "slough of the despond."

But this gospel motto is also a brake. It would put the conservative hand upon the shoulder of the optimist and say: "Brother, be a little careful about trusting too much to your future. Do not rate your assets too high. All your future days may not be flooded with sunshine." It is always well for a ship to be ballasted before it sets sail from harbor. And yet some men, because they have made a success in the past, think success will always be theirs. Therefore they live up to the last cent of their income and have their properties mortgaged up to the full limit and buy their stocks upon a margin, and when the wheel of fortune turns a little the superstructure goes down with a crash. Now, my brother, in order to have a happy future you must be like Joseph, the Prime Minister of Egypt. In your seven years of prosperity you must prepare for your seven years of want. Though bright days will come, dark days of adversity will also surely be yours.

This fact is well illustrated by the life insurance business. Some years ago I was talking with one of the leading insurance superintendents of Chicago. He said: "I suppose you think that my chief object is to get people to carry all the insurance possible. That is a great mistake some agents make. I always say to my agents: Men, do not persuade your people to take any more insurance than they can carry. A man should always be able to make his payments easily. If you persuade a man to pay too large a premium within a few years sickness and trouble may come to his home. The man may be thrown out of his work temporarily. Then he drops his insurance, and he will never take it up again. Then that action not only hurts the man, but also the life insurance business." And yet in many ways there are thousands of men making the same mistake as does the man who overinsures. These men bank too much upon the prosperities of the future. Therefore they lose their all when these prosperities fail.

I never think of a man's future but as a kaleidoscope. You remember when as a little boy your mother bought you one for a Christmas present. You went to the window and lifted the little apparatus to your eye and looked through it. All the brightly colored pieces of glass at the other end formed themselves into most fantastic shapes. You studied them long and carefully. "Beautiful, beautiful!" you said. "Why, I see rainbows and towers and meadows and farmhouses." Then your sister said, "Charley, turn it." You turned the kaleidoscope, and all the glasses jingled. Then you looked again and said: "Why sister, all the pictures are different. Look and see. How did this all happen?" Then you turned it again, and there were other combinations of colors. Wonderful are the changes of a kaleidoscope, yet not more strange than will be the changes in your future. The fact that you have a $5,000 income this year does not prove you will have even a thousand dollars next. Because you are in good health now do not think that your lungs will be stout next week. The fact that you are riding upon the wave of prosperity to-day does not prove that the flood tide will not ebb away. Do not bank too much upon the temporal successes of the future. Do not count too surely on a long earthly life. Because you are living in a palace on "Easy street" do not spend your time planning what you will do in your gardens for next summer. Your future is all surrounded by fogs and mists. Within twenty-four hours your whole life may be changed. "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

If it is necessary to be careful with our earthly opportunities, how much more is it essential for us to be careful of our heavenly opportunities! I warrant that there is not among us all one who intends to ultimately refuse the offer of eternal salvation. But this is such a busy world. It is filled with such busy people. The engagements of life press themselves upon us with such overwhelming numbers that we are apt to postpone the greatest of all questions—the eternal destiny of our immortal souls. We intend to take the matter up to-morrow or the day after to-morrow, but somehow that to-morrow never comes. Now, my brother, I want to drive this question home: Will you here and now make up your mind what you will do with Jesus—will you make up your mind to-day? Remember, to-morrow may be too late, for then the time may have come when Jesus will have decided what he will do with you.

Do you not realize that I may be the last gospel messenger who shall ever be able to present to you the pleadings of Christ for your salvation? Your life may go just as quickly as did old Dr. Howard's of Pittsburg. He seemed to be in perfect health. He was writing a sermon. He rose from his study desk and stepped into the next room. Before the ink was dry upon the paper his spirit had taken flight. Time is fleeting. The decision has been made. But, whatever that decision is, remember it is a decision for this day and not for to-morrow's sun. "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." O God, may this day be the day of decision to many souls!

Little Jethou Island.

Jethou Island is by far the smallest of the Channel Islands and boasts the distinction of being the smallest inhabited island in Europe, having, indeed, only one dwelling house upon it. It has a population of seven souls. It has no road or pathway or post. At the last census more than half the population of the island was absent, having gone to Guernsey market with the butter and cream from the Jethou cows. The weather being bad, the visitors had to stay at Guernsey during the census time.

Heir or Heiress?

When he learned that he was the father of a fine infant, a Tunbridge Wells resident hurried to a local newspaper office to have a birth notice inserted. In his excitement, however, he had not stopped to find out whether it was a boy or girl, and had to return to his home to ascertain the sex.

Would Shakespeare Assent?

"What is his occupation?" asked Mr. Paul Taylor at Marylebone police court. "He is a poet," was the reply. "That is a man's amusement, not his occupation," was the magisterial pronouncement.

St. Napoleon.

Many people ignorant of the true history of the church will be scandalized when they read the title of this article. Let them read it to the end. There was in Corsica some hundred years ago a very pious family called the Bonapartes. Their first child was born on the 15th of August, Assumption day, and as he looked very small and feeble they wanted him to be baptized without delay. Their priest consented to perform the ceremony, but as it was customary to give to a child the name of the patron saint of his or her birthday the good priest could not and would not call him "Assumption Bonaparte." In his embarrassment he looked carefully over the "Lives of the Saints" and finally found the name of a saint martyr who in the first centuries of the church had been stoned to death on that very day of Aug. 15. Of course neither Mr. nor Mrs. Bonaparte objected that their firstborn child should be named Napoleon, having thus the high patronage of a brave martyr of the early Christian church.—Letter to Philadelphia North American.

A Blunder In Poets.

Tennyson is not the only poet laureate whom Regent street has known. Southey relates a ludicrous scrape into which he and Campbell fell one day in the Quadrant. Campbell wished to relieve a poor woman and rushed into the nearest shop to change a sovereign. The shopkeeper was attending to customers and delayed to oblige him, and the generous poet lost his temper. Thereupon the shopkeeper jumped to the conclusion that he had two rogues to deal with and rashly sent for the police. Campbell stood in helpless fury, but when Southey explained things to the constable that worthy, who happened to be a Glasgow man, at once exclaimed, "Guidness, mon, is that Maister Camell, the lord rector o' Glaisgie?" After that it was difficult to separate Campbell and the shopkeeper, so warmly were their hands interclasped in explanations and forgiveness.—Westminster Gazette.

Cornish Fishermen.

In the estimation of the average Cornish fisherman rabbit is an ominous word, and should it happen to be used by any one in their hearing when they are on their way to sea it is sufficient to send them home again for that occasion for fear of accident. In Cornish fishing circles many tales are told of disasters that have followed defiance of this superstition and persistence in putting off in their boats after the unlucky word had been spoken. Formerly the word church was equally obnoxious to the fishermen and was sedulously eschewed in conversation, on the water particularly. If a case arose, as sometimes it would, in which a sacred edifice had necessarily to be referred to, "cleeta" was used instead of church, and whatever was ominous or evil in the sound of the latter was imagined to be thereby avoided.

The Innkeeper of England.

England's unpopularity with the Englishman—and the American—is largely due to the country innkeeper. "If any class of public servant ought to be made to pass an examination it is certainly the licensed victualer," writes V. V. V. in the London Sphere, for at present any man may obtain a license without any knowledge of cooking, housekeeping, sanitation—any knowledge of anything but of the due pulling of a beer handle. Moreover, his wife may be the most incompetent of housewives, even for her own family. On the continent innkeeping is an art to be studied. In England it is too often the refuge of the man who wants an easy chair to sit in.

An Hour Before Dawn.

A curious mystery is the temporary uneasiness of animals about an hour before dawn, no matter at what hour this occurs. Children turn and moan, elderly people awaken and turn over for another sleep, cocks crow, dogs become uneasy and horses and cattle move about for a short period, when stillness returns for a time. What is the cause? Are the animals affected by some magnetic wave which precedes sunlight an hour or so, or is the habit one of heredity passed down through numberless generations from an original wild state, when an alertness just before daylight was necessary for protection from enemies?

England the Land of Flowers.

I know not why Italy rather than England should be called the land of flowers. The truth is that the English people are an art loving one and that in England more than in any region of Italy or country of Europe flowers are in evidence everywhere and, with the grasses and plants and universal vegetation, are more intimately and perennially intertwined with human existence itself.—Naples Il Mattino.

His Personal Appearance.

Mamma—I'm afraid that young Wilder will not make you a good husband, Clara. Clara — Why not, mamma? Mamma—Because it seems to me that he rather neglects his personal appearance. Clara — Yes, that's true, mamma, and I'm glad you mentioned it. I'll see that he makes his personal appearance here every evening after this instead of only twice a week.

Innuendo.

"Maw, what is a reprobate?"

"Ask your father, Johnny."

Now, why should a man become incensed over a harmless little episode like this?

Amiability.

Bogg—Did he hurt himself when he fell downstairs? Fogg—I think not. He died without making a sound.—Harper's Weekly.

HOW JAPAN IS GOVERNED.

An Impressive View of Her Quiet, Self Contained Statesmen.

Sit in the gallery of the lower house of the Japanese national parliament and observe thence the new force that civilization and education have loosed upon the rest of the world.

The chamber is about as large as the house of representatives at Washington, comfortable, convenient and planned for business. The members sit at desks facing the speaker's high dais midway of the long side of the room. Ten or twelve members wear the almost obsolete native costume; the others are garbed like Europeans. You will notice first of all that these men do not sleep, like members of the British house, or read or write or transact at the desks their private business, like the representatives at Washington. They listen to every word of every speech. They are liberal of applause and dissent. Everything that is said seems to mean something to them. There are no long, dreary harangues and no permission to print in the Record. Members that address the house mount a rostrum just below and in front of the presiding officer. Their speeches are short, sharp, direct and full of point. Often they are witty and very often eloquent, but never are they entered for endurance prize.

You observe the faces intent upon the speakers, the lines of long, strong, square jawed, brown faces, and it startles you to reflect that the powerful, indomitable nation of which this grave deliberative assembly is the symbol has been created in fifty years from the least promising of materials; that in fifteen years it has been lifted to the front ranks among peoples; that all the world has been amazed by its performances. And then you will suddenly perceive that in your eyes every face before you is an impenetrable mask. From each you receive a definite impression of power—quiet, self sufficing, conscious power—but beyond this nothing. All you can see are eyes, nose, mouth and the blank stone wall of an expression from which no amount of scrutiny will enable you to draw a hint of the trouble within.—Everybody's Magazine.

A HIGH-COURAGED HORSE.

It is a piece of machinery perfectly controlled by its master (the brain.) But the eye with maladjustment of its muscles may be likened to a horse with an inexperienced or incompetent driver; the proper tension upon the reins is not maintained, the brain becomes more or less disturbed by its inability to properly control the eye movements, and exhausted by the continuous strain imposed upon it by these efforts. Maladjusted eyes may assume many types; some may be compared to a team of horses checked too high; others may be likened to a team with their heads too low by a short martingale; we encounter some eyes that have inside or outside reins that are too short, etc. Such people suffer from reflex nervous and physical infirmities in consequence of these muscular defects where the sight may be perfectly normal. THIS MALADJUSTMENT OF THE EYE MUSCLES CAUSES AN ENORMOUS LEAKAGE OF NERVOUS FORCE.

They're Off To A Good Start.

TORONTO AND BELLEVILLE ROLLING MILLS COMMENCED TO ROLL IRON THIS MORNING — PROSPECTS ARE SPLENDID — WHAT A VISITOR SAW.

They're off to a good start down at the rolling mills, and, if one can judge by appearances, it is no spasmodic affair this time. The Toronto and Belleville Rolling Mills are going to be a factor in the Canadian iron trade after this.

Put that in your hat for a prophecy.

While down at the mills this morning the writer was struck by the air of bustle and cheeriness which seemed to pervade the works. Smoke was coming from the tall chimneys, steam was hissing from the boilers, the genial secretary-treasurer, Mr. Wardrope, wore the smile that won't come off, and the employees generally seemed to have been brightened up by the fact that the furnaces had been lighted up and the by no means unwelcome warmth of molten iron was in the air. Like the sounds of battle to a war horse, the sight of that red-hot iron acted on the rolling mills staff. For months they had nobly "stuck to" the management, some of the skilled workers having cheerfully accepted laborers' wages while waiting for the mills to start. This morning they had their reward. Small wonder the sight of the molten iron gladdened their eyes and the merry whirr of the machinery sounded like music in their ears!

From the management it was learned that the 18-inch mill started this morning. This mill — the largest one —prepares the stock which in turn is used up by the other mills.

Like beavers the men were working, handling the big billets of red-hot iron as though they actually liked the work. Three furnaces were in operation to-day, and there were 85 men on the pay roll.

Much new machinery has been installed during the past summer. One machine, the "Squeezer," could not help but attract the attention of visitors. This machine makes it possible for the mills to economize greatly in the matter of labor. Big piles of scrap go into the furnaces, come out in a molten condition and then go into the "squeezer" from which they come in the shape of a big red-hot ball. This ball goes to the "rollers" at the 18-inch mill, and is gradually worked along till it becomes bar iron. It is a most interesting process. Don't miss seeing the "squeezer" if you visit the mills. The "squeezer," it may be remarked weighs a small matter of 80,000 pounds. Another tremendous machine is the new shears, which have recently arrived from Pittsburg. They weigh 100,000 pounds, and will when placed in position, which will be accomplished in the course of a few days, shear iron six inches thick. The lack of such shears as these militated greatly against the successful operation of the mills in old times.

The new portion of the rolling mills, which has been under construction for some time, is now completed. Three new furnaces (making nine in all) will be installed in the newly-built portion.

It was learned that the entire plant will be in operation very shortly, and then the staff will number between 200 and 300 men. The mills will not run at night just at present, but will, we were told, do so as soon as possible.

The different departments of the works are these:

Three rolling mills, 18, 12 and 9-inch.

A fully equipped machine shop.

An up-to-date horse-shoeing department, now, in part, under course of construction.

A large cement cistern has been built, close to where the dock will be, and numerous other up-to-date features have been added.

The "squeezer" came from Buffalo and the mammoth new shears from Pittsburg. Neither could be made in Canada.

Immense piles of firebrick and scrap meet the eye on every side.

It is quite evident that an immense amount of money has been spent in re-equipping and reconstructing the plant.

The Intelligencer asked Mr. Eppelsheimer, the general manager, what the prospects were.

"The trade is booming," was the cheery reply, "and we're going to get our share of it. As to the Toronto and Belleville Rolling Mills, you can say we have lots of scrap and quite a number of orders."

The large proportion of the employees at present come under the head of skilled labor. Many Belleville men are employed, and the management informs us they will, so far as possible, give Bellevillians the preference when taking on new hands.

"How would cheap electric power affect you?" was a question put to Mr. Eppelsheimer by the newspaper man.

"It would mean much to us," said the manager.

While being shown over the plant by one of the officials, the newspaper man asked what kind of a staff the mills were getting.

"We have already some of the best rollers in Canada," was the reply, "and will have more of them." Continuing, our informant said there was a kind of free masonry among iron workers, and Mr. Clowes, their genial superintendent, being well and favorably known all over Canada, had no difficulty in obtaining the best men.

The officials of the Toronto and Belleville Rolling Mills comprise the following gentlemen:

General Manager—Mr. D. Eppelsheimer, jr.

Superintendent—Mr. V. S. Clowes.

Superintendent of Horseshoe Department—Mr. P. J. Smith.

Purchasing Agent—Mr. J. A. Higgs.

Selling Agent—Mr. "Tom" Moore.

Secretary-Treasurer — Mr. J. W. Wardrope.

A large number of visitors were present during the day, all expressing pleasure at seeing that operations had begun. While the scribe was there he noticed Mayor Sulman, Ald. Panter, Sinclair and Marsh, Surveyor Hulme, Rev. A. H. Drumm, Mr. C. J. Bowell and others.

CALL OF THE WILD.

DEER HUNTERS ARE ALREADY HIEING THEMSELVES NORTH TO HUNT THE DEER.

"For they would hunt the wild doe in the wood."

The deer hunting season opens on Thursday and the minds of the local hunters are filled with visions of the glorious time they are going to have in the woods, during the next few weeks. They will answer the call from the wild and get as close back to nature as it is possible in these modern days.

On Monday and Tuesday the Nimrods will hie themselves off to their favorite haunts. The number going this year will fully equal that of past seasons and large supplies of provisions, clothing, guns and ammunition are being laid in.

Deer hunting is a great sport. It has attractions that are irresistible, a fact that is evidenced by the fact that year after year the same men take to the woods when the season arrives.

Possibly during the next few weeks 100 or so persons from this district will be roaming the woods in search of the antlered monarchs of the forest.

Respected Lady Dead.

Mrs. Matilda Clarke, relict of the late Mr. C. E. Clarke, died on Saturday night at the residence of her son-in-law, Mr. Henry Taylor, near the G.T.R. station. Deceased, who was 68 years of age, was born at Shannonville, where she resided until the death of her husband, some 10 years ago, since which time she had lived in this city. Mrs. Clarke was an estimable lady and highly respected. She was for many years a member of the Methodist church, and whilst in this city was identified with Bridge St. Church. Her illness was of about four weeks' duration from stomach trouble. No family survives, Mrs. Taylor, her only child, having died a few years ago. The remains were interred this afternoon.

Outcome of Horse Trade

Mr. E. W. Davis, who resides in Thurlow, reported to the police that on Saturday evening his horse was stolen from a shed in rear of an uptown hotel. He charged a man named Edward Brumel of this city, with the theft, and the latter was yesterday arrested on a warrant.

This morning the case was investigated by the Magistrate and it turned out not to be a case of horse stealing. It appears that Davis and Brumel had made a trade and the horse Brumel took was, he alleges, the one he was to receive in trade. He claims he paid Davis a small sum of money to boot.

The outcome of the case was that Brumel was acquitted of the charge of theft and paid Davis $5, the amount involved in the trade, each party retaining his own animal. Mr. Anderson for Crown and Mr. McMahon for Brumel.

At Sign of the Scales.

THEFT.

A lad named Alexander R. C. Wilson, a stranger in the city, was charged with stealing a plane and bit, the property of W. Carter. The articles were returned and Wilson was allowed to go on suspended sentence. He promised to leave the city.

WARNING

The Intelligencer is informed that a "clever" stranger was at the Shannonville fair taking orders for the weekly edition for the balance of the year. We know nothing of this stranger, who was not authorized to act as our agent. The public is warned to make sure that any agents are properly authorized to collect money for us before paying subscriptions to them.

Mr. Hopkins Was Watched and Caned

PLEASANT INCIDENTS AT BRIDGE ST SUNDAY SCHOOL YESTERDAY AFTERNOON — TWO POPULAR RESIDENTS WILL LEAVE BELLEVILLE.

A host of people will regret to learn that Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Hopkins are about to remove from our city. Mrs. Hopkins was born in Belleville and Mr. Hopkins has been a resident for over forty years. They intend to live at Anderson, Indiana, where their youngest son, Mr. Cecil, resides. Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins have been amongst our best citizens, and their leaving Belleville is much regretted by a large circle of friends. Mr. Hopkins has also been one of our most patriotic citizens, proof of which he gave in 1866 by leaving a lucrative position in the United States, hastening to Belleville and then to Prescott to join the 15th Regiment in repelling the Fenians. Mr. Hopkins was for many years a commissioned officer of the 49th Hastings Rifles and retired with the rank of Lieutenant. He is also an officer of the Veterans' Association.

Mr. Hopkins is considered one of the expert mechanics of our city, his valued advice being frequently sought when intricate questions are involved.

Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins have been closely identified with Bridge St. Methodist Church; Mr. Hopkins as a class leader, as a teacher in and treasurer of the Sunday School, and Mrs. Hopkins as an officer of the Missionary Society and the Sunday School.

Yesterday Mr. Hopkins met with pleasant surprises at the Sunday School, when he was first of all presented by the officers and teachers with a gold watch, and then by his class of young ladies with a gold-headed cane. The tributes to his services to the church were numerous and very complimentary.

The Philharmonic

To the Editor of The Intelligencer:

Dear Sir, — Will you kindly allow me a little space to call the attention of the musical people and the citizens of Belleville to the Philharmonic Society's work for this season? The first meeting will be held in the Council Chamber in the City Hall on Tuesday evening next, Oct. 30, and all choir members and ex-members, and all singers in the city are invited to become members of the Society and take part in the study of Handel's sublime oratorio "The Messiah," which we expect to give at the annual concert this winter. I may say for the information of all that there is no fee for membership, all that is required is to be able to sing in time and tune, to be diligent in attending the weekly practices, and pay for the music, which amounts to about fifty cents. The good work of the Philharmonic is so well known and the great success of last year's performance of Haydn's "Creation" is still fresh in the remembrance of the people of our city, who so nobly responded and helped to make it so successful. So the officers of the Society are encouraged and are anxious to give a worthy performance of, perhaps, the greatest of all sacred compositions, "The Messiah." All singers therefore are cordially invited and urged to take part, and I hope that old and young will unite in the good work of the Belleville Philharmonic Society and attend, if possible, the first meeting on Tuesday evening, when the officers will be elected and arrangements made to carry out the season's programme. Thanking you for this valuable space,

I am very sincerely yours,

V. P. HUNT,

Conductor Philharmonic So'y.

DR. CLARK RESIGNS.

Provincial Forester Going Into Business on His Own Account.

Toronto, Oct. 29.—Dr. Judson F. Clark has resigned his post as Provincial Forester to the Ontario Government.

The unexpected announcement was made by Dr. Clark himself late on Saturday, and will come as somewhat of a surprise to the Government and the authorities of Toronto University. In the latter institution it has been the intention for some time to found a chair of forestry, and Dr. Clark was to have had the position. It was generally understood last spring that Dr. Clark refused the chair of foresty at Yale, with this appointment in view. Dr. Clark intends to take up the management of a British Columbia lumbering industry, which he is himself organizing.

Dr. Clark's resignation, which was handed in to Hon. Nelson Monteith, was accepted, and will take effect on Nov. 15.

Dr. Clark is a native of Prince Edward Island, and a graduate of the Ontario Agricultural College, subsequently taking the degree of Ph.D. at Cornell, where he also was lecturer on forestry. He afterwards joined the United States Bureau of Forestry, where he remained until he accepted the appointment he now resigns.

SIX TAKEN FROM LUTIN.

Leaks In Hull of Submarine Tell Cause of Disaster.

Bizerta, Tunis, Oct. 29.—The bodies of six of the crew of the French submarine boat Lutin were removed from the vessel yesterday. The Lutin sank off this port Oct. 16 with 14 men and two officers on board.

The work of removing the dead probably will not be completed before Monday. It is planned to hold the funerals Tuesday.

All the bodies were in a horrible conditions owing to the action of acids. The only means of identification was by objects found on the corpses. The indications are that the men met death instantly. The opinion prevails that the Lutin tried to come to the surface too rapidly and that consequently her stern struck on the bottom. This caused rivets to start and plates to burst. Six leaks were found in the hull.

Pennsylvania Railway Statement of Atlantic City Wreck.

Appalling Disaster at Atlantic City—Electric Train Goes Through Drawbridge—Two of the Three Coaches Entirely Submerged and Total Number of Dead Not Yet Known—Brave Attempts at Rescue.

Atlantic City, Oct. 29.—By the wrecking of a three-coach electric train on the West Jersey and Seashore Railroad yesterday afternoon, at least 50 passengers perished, and the list may reach the appalling total of 75 when all is known.

While crossing over a drawbridge spanning the waterway known as "The Thoroughfare," which separates Atlantic City from the mainland, the train left the track and plunged into the water.

25 Bodies Recovered.

The passengers in the first two coaches, with few exceptions, were drowned. Up to midnight last night 25 bodies had been recovered, and it is possibly more bodies are still in the submerged coaches

The disaster is the worst that has happened since the terrible Meadow Wreck of July 30, 1896. The train, made up of three heavy vestibule electric coaches, which left Camden, N. J., at one o'clock in the afternoon, carried probably 88 passengers, as that number of tickets are held by the conductor. He is uncertain, however, just how many passengers the train carried, and until all the bodies have been taken out of the submerged coaches, it will not be possible to give an approximate estimate of the dead.

Cause Not Established.

The cause of the wreck has not been established. It was probably due to a defective rail or the breaking of some part of the superstructure of the first coach.

While running at a speed said to have been moderate and not unusual the first coach left the rails and dragged those following it over the ties for a distaance of 50 feet. Suddenly swerving the first two coaches plunged over the side of the bridge into the water 20 feet below.

Quick Escape of 20.

The third coach struck a heavy abutment, broke its couplings and for a brief time hung perilously suspended over the water.

Brief as was this period, however, it gave more than a score of passengers an opportunity to escape by the rear door. Then the car slid off and followed the other two into the water. It is believed every one in the rear or third coach escaped alive, though all were more or less injured.

The accident was witnessed by many persons on shore, and assistance was promptly sent from Atlantic City. Little could be done, however, towards saving of the lives of those imprisoned in the submerged coaches. They quickly settled in the mud, and as the tide rose they were soon hidden from sight except for the trolley poles.

Divers were sent down and tried to reach the dead bodies, but darkness set in and the tide ran too swiftly for them to accomplish much.

Brave Attempts at Rescue.

John Taylor of Camden was among those who went overboard with the cars, but he kicked in a window of the rear car and swam to the piling of the bridge, where he held fast until bravely rescued by J. F. DeFord.

Charles Kessler, a local merchant, got an axe, jumped to the top of a submerged car, and began to hack in the roof to liberate the imprisoned passengers. He did good work, but could not release many, under the circumstances.

Mrs. McDonald of Philadelphia, who was in the third car and is a good swimmer, escaped by a window as the car toppled into the water. She dived four times for her husband and rescued him after she had brought to the surface three other men.

John Eades of this city was on the train and escaped by crawling through a window of the rear car and swimming ashore.

The man who attends the bridge says the bridge was properly closed and that the tracks had been inspected.

Not More Than 57 Dead.

Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 29.—Late last night the Pennsylvania Railroad made the statement, showing, according to information received here, not more than 57 of the 80 persons on the train lost their lives in the Atlantic City accident.

Catarrh of the Stomach

A PLEASANT, SIMPLE, BUT SAFE AND EFFECTUAL CURE FOR IT.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Catarrh of the stomach has long been considered the next thing to incurable. The usual symptoms are a full or bloating sensation after eating, accompanied sometimes with sour or watery risings, a formation of gases, causing pressure on the heart and lungs, and difficult breathing, headaches, fickle appetite, nervousness and a general played out, languid feeling.

There is often a foul taste in the mouth, coated tongue, and if the interior of the stomach could be seen it would show a slimy, inflamed condition.

The cure for this common and obstinate trouble is found in a treatment which causes the food to be readily, thoroughly digested before it has time to ferment and irritate the delicate mucous surfaces of the stomach. To secure a prompt and healthy digestion is the one necessary thing to do and when normal digestion is secured the catarrhal condition will have disappeared.

According to Dr. Harlanson, the safest and best treatment is to use after each meal a tablet composed of Diastase, Aseptic Pepsin, a little Nux, Golden Seal and Fruit Acids. These tablets can now be found at all drug stores under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and not being a patent medicine can be used with perfect safety and assurance that healthy appetite and thorough digestion will follow their regular use after meals.

Mr. R. S. Workman, Chicago, Ill., writes: "Catarrh is a local condition resulting from a neglected cold in the head, whereby the lining membrane of the nose becomes inflamed and the poisonous discharge therefrom passing backward into the throat, reaches the stomach, thus producing catarrh of the stomach. Medical authorities prescribed for me for three years for catarrh of stomach without cure, but to-day I am the happiest of men after using only one box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I cannot find appropriate words to express my good feeling. I have found flesh, appetite and sound rest from their use."

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the safest preparation, as well as the simplest and most convenient remedy for any form of Indigestion, Catarrh of Stomach, biliousness, sour stomach, heartburn and bloating after meals.

London, Oct. 29.—Robert Reid, a member of the National Transcontinental Railway Commission, was in the city on Saturday.

"I noticed," he said to The Advertiser, "that Mr. J. H. Pritchett had repeated the old affidavit, wherein he made charges against me. This I have already denied through the press, and am prepared to do so again. It is simply a case of his word against mine. I also see that Mr. Ellis of the Barber & Ellis Co., Toronto, had attempted to connect my name with a supposed deal in supplies, which were purchased through the Commission Co., of which Mr. John O'Gorman is an agent.

"This matter is new to me, and I have not had an opportunity to give my side of the case. I will say, however, that it will not only bring a flat contradiction from me, but that documentary evidence will be produced to prove that Mr. Ellis has wilfully gone out of his way to malign the Commission. As a matter of fact, the purchases were all made through our purchasing agent, and documents will corroborate this. I hope to have the opportunity of giving my evidence at the proper time, and in the proper place."

GOVERNMENT IS DEFIED

Non-Students Met in Mass Meeting in University Building.

Russia Must Not Celebrate the Anniversary of Czar's Manifesto Granting a Constitution, Which Mass Meeting Declared Valueless—Elaborate Precautions Taken to Prevent Disorders—Guns Placed at Odessa.

St. Petersburg. Oct. 30.—On the eve of the anniversary of the publication of the imperial manifesto, giving a constitution to Russia Oct. 30, the prefect of police has caused the city to be placarded with proclamations warning the public that in case of disorders, demonstrations, or even the assembling of crowds armed force will be used with all the vigor permissible under the rules of "extraordinary security."

The Government's ultimatum to the faculty of the university, announcing that the institution would be closed if meetings involving the participation of non-students were continued was defied yesterday. An immense mass meeting was held in the university building, at which many workmen, professional men and several army officers were present.

Constitution Valueless.

After fiery revolutionary speeches had been delivered a resolution was adopted, declaring that the gift of a constitution by the Emperor last October had proved valueless and asserting that the situation of the country was as intolerable as before the manifesto. A second resolution rejected a proposition to celebrate to-day with a meeting or a demonstration, as the anniversary was not deserving of special notice, and it was useless to play into the hands of the police by provoking disorder.

The Emperor has signed a ukase granting full religious freedom to the sect known as the "Old Believers," who number several millions and constitute the most prosperous and industrious class of Russians. It is understood that the ukase will be published on the anniversary of the constitutional manifesto.

Cossacks to Suppress.

Warsaw, Oct. 30.—Fears that disturbances will occur to-day, the anniversary of the publication of the imperial manifesto, giving a constitution to Russia, have led to the adoption of vigorous measures by the authorities. Cossacks and infantry will suppress the slightest attempts at demonstrations.

Place Quick-Firing Guns.

London, Oct. 30.—A despatch to a news agency from Odessa says that elaborate military precautions have been taken there in view of the possibility of exciting events to-day. Four thousand Cossacks are ready for instant action, quick-firing guns are posted at a dozen points, and the streets are closely patrolled.

Total Number Dead Is 53.

Only Two Unclaimed of Atlantic City Wreck Victims.

Monday a Day of Unceasing Activity, of Gruesome Scenes and Pathetic Incidents--Working Crews With Derricks Brought Submerged Cars to Surface--Coroner's Jury Make An Inspection of the Scene.

Atlantic City, N. J., Oct. 30.—The total number of dead in the appalling wreck of an electric train, which on Sunday afternoon, loaded with passengers, plunged into the waterway separating this city from the mainland, now is placed at 53.

Of these 49 bodies have been identified, and two others remain unclaimed in the temporary mortuary.

The bodies of two persons known to have been drowned have not been recovered.

A special car containing the bodies of the Philadelphia victims left last night for that city.

Gruesome Scenes, Pathetic Incidents.

The day has been one of unceasing activity, of gruesome scenes and pathetic incidents. Wrecking crews with derricks succeeded in bringing one of the two submerged cars to the surface, and divers, working in relays, brought up bodies until their task was completed and they reported that no more dead remained either inside the second car or in the water and mud anywhere in the vicinity.

Interest now centres in the work of the coroner's jury, which yesterday made a careful inspection of the scene of the wreck, and the drawbridge, at which the train left the rails. State Senator Edward S. Lee is foreman of the jury.

No More Than 53.

After the forward car of the two submerged coaches had been hoisted to the surface and the divers who had worked on the wreckage all day long, had made a final examination of the second car without finding any more bodies, W. W. Atterbury, general manager of the Pennsylvania Railway, who, with several of his assistants, had been on the scene since Sunday night, expressed his belief that the total number of dead would not exceed 53.

"There is a bare possibility that one or two others may have been killed," he added. "I cannot believe that any of the unfortunates were carried out to sea by the ebbing tide."

Mr. Atterbury said the cause of the accident was a mystery to him.

Sad Scenes at Morgue.

At the morgue the scenes were pathetic. Persons who had friends on the train crowded about the entrance and were with difficulty restrained from forcing their way into the building. One of the most heartrending incidents was furnished by Frederick Benckert, who lost his entire family, a wife and two children. Benckert was not informed in Philadelphia of the accident until too late to catch a train, and he hurried here in an automobile. When he saw the dead bodies of his wife and two little boys lying side by side on the floor, he collapsed and had to be carried from the building. Benckert had intended to accompany his family Sunday, but was unable to get away.

Walter Scott, the dead motorman, lost his life through his anxiety to spend a part of the day with his wife here. It was his custom to run only as far as Millville, but Sunday he swapped runs with another motorman and his terrible death was the result.

The Tariff.

The call for a wholesale reduction in the tariff, which is raised in some quarters, is not meeting with a cordial response. In East Elgin a special appeal was made to the farmers to support the Government because of its intention to cut down the duties. This appeal was in vain, but it indicates that the reactionary element in the Liberal party is once again powerful. The faction now to the fore has always been the enemy of the Canadian workman and the Canadian farmer. Before the National Policy was inaugurated it strove to prevent the adoption of that great measure for the promotion of the interests of the country. It is evidently felt that in the building up of Canadian industry a corresponding impairment of the interests of our United States neighbors would be experienced.

The introduction of the National Policy was followed by an unreasonable campaign against native workmen. Sometimes there was a call for free trade straight; at another time capitulation to the United States trusts by means of commercial union was urged. Anything that would cripple Canadian industry, or place a Canadian worker out of work, or destroy the investment of a Canadian in industrial operations, was welcome to that particular cult. Now the campaign takes the form of an attempt to rally the farmers against their fellow-citizens of the factory and the town. The artisan and the operative, it appears, are too well off. They are robbing the farmer. Therefore, the farmer must turn in behind Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in the bye-elections, and secure another good sharp cut in the tariff and in the wages of the mechanic. The battle cry for the bye-elections is, so far as the Government can make the cry, "Down With Canadian Industry." It is impossible to believe, however, that the farmer will echo the shout, and what goes with it. Why should they? What interest have they in the closing up of one single factory? What advantage could they gain by the transfer of any branch of industrial effort from this country to the other side of the line? In the building up of Canada the interests of the farmers and the artisans are identical. The more we have of cities, towns and villages drawing their supplies from the farm the better for the Canadian farmer. This fact is so well understood in our own West that there the demand for industries is continuous and unremitting. It is so well recognized in the United States that the crippling of any industry in that country would not be tolerated for a moment. Trusts are fought; but industries within the country, employing native workmen, who consume native produce, are encouraged.; That the farmers of any part of Canada will yield to the demand to vote against Canadian industry which employs their sons, and gives them a market for their produce, is to be doubted. Certainly, when it is considered that the attack upon honest industry is to result in the triumph of graft the proposition becomes preposterous in the extreme.

Joking apart, the matter of having to wait so long for pay undoubtedly militates against the efficiency of the militia corps in this city. The sum involved is not a large one. Surely the powers that be might pay the Tommies when their work is done, as civil contractors are compelled to.

It seems a pity that, before they stow away their paraphernalia for the winter, the Public Works people could not put down a crossing on Bridge St., about midway between Front and Pinnacle Sts. The street in question is probably the busiest in town, and it is a pity that people on one side, in nasty weather, are compelled to walk clear to one of the corners before they can conveniently cross the street. Some kind of a crossing should be built there. It would be a convenience, not only to the merchants and professional men on the street, but to a large proportion of the residents of Belleville, many of whom have to go to the Post Office for their mail two or three times before they get it.

This has been almost a record year for dreadful calamities. The papers have been full of earthquakes and cyclones and railway and steamship horrors. Peterboro people are demanding that the milk furnished by their milkmen be tested and the result published in the local papers. No fault can be found with the position taken. In Belleville the milk is tested and the results published, to the apparent satisfaction of all concerned. Why the same course should not be followed everywhere it is hard to see.

To-morrow will be Hallowe'en, and the rising generation, it is to be presumed, will be out in force. No properly constituted person will grudge the boys their fun, but they should remember that while innocent pranks are allowable, the indulgence in them should not descend into destructiveness or vandalism. The police should keep a sharp outlook to see that mischievousness is not converted into lawlessness and innocent fun into rowdyism, and, if any boys are found breaking the law they should be treated, in the police court, in a way which will stick in their memories.

Mr. R. L. Borden is taking a commendable stand for clean elections and pure government. These points he never fails to emphasize in all of his addresses. Canada certainly needs relief from the revelry of corruption which has been unparalleled on all sides, and no reformation can apparently be looked for from the Laurier Government until it is ousted from office, the same as the iniquitous time-serving and pledge-breaking Ross Administration was hurled from power. Mr. Borden emphasizes the fact that if democratic government is to be successful, there are three primary essentials — clean elections, honest expenditure of public money, and decent appointments to public office.

England is now congratulating itself on a discovery that is second only in importance to the Norman Conquest. A new coal field has been unearthed about seven miles from Dover and is said to be 160 square miles in area. The coal seams were discovered at a depth of 1,800 feet, and comprise a twenty inch, a three foot four inch, and a four foot six inch seam. The coal has been analyzed and is found to be well suited to household use. It is said to contain 63 per cent. carbon, 33 per cent. volatile matter and only 3.7 per cent. of ash. Moreover two important seams of fireclay, one of four feet, and the other of twenty eight inches, have also been found which will make the mining easier and add to the value of the discovery.

Marriage And Wages

SMALL PAY A CAUSE OF THE AVOIDANCE OF MATRIMONY.

Rev. Madison C. Peters in the Watertown Times writes:

That there is an alarming decrease in marriage among American men is a fact which has been again and again corroborated by trustworthy statistics and commented upon by students of sociology. Why do men not marry? Will it be so that in the future comparatively few men will marry?

Independent careers are becoming more and more impossible to the young men in our land Salaries even in good positions are low—from $10 to $25 a week. How can our hundreds of thousands of clerks in offices and stores support a wife on present day salaries? General averages as to wages are practically worthless Take an average first class establishment in which the general manager receives $10,000 a year, his assistant $5,000, the managers of five departments $2,000 six clerks an average of $12 a week, seventy-five laborers with an average of $1 a day. This would make an average of about $6 a day for the eighty-eight employees of that store or factory, but seven get nearly half of the sum total. So that a mere statement of the average utterly conceals the true facts.

In almost every trade there is a few workmen receive very high wages, and so American averages of wages conceal the real wages, often very low, paid to a large share of our workers. According to the census 11 per cent. of the male workers over sixteen years of age in the New England cotton mills receive less than $300 a year, 60 per cent of the workers in the anthracite coal regions do not receive $450 a year, and the mass of unskilled workers in the north receive less than $400 a year and in the south less than $300.

In comparing wages in different countries this is a simple fact which is continually forgotten. Marriage is being effectually discouraged by the constantly and greatly increasing cost of living both in town and country.

Parents without fortunes support their daughters in luxury, and girls expect to be thus cared for after marriage.

It costs more to sustain such a girl than the average man can earn, so that only the exceptionally fortunate man ought to marry.

The intense itching characteristic of salt rheum and eczema is instantly allayed by applying Chamberlain's Salve. As a cure for skin diseases this salve is unequalled. To be had at R. Templeton & Co's drug store.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

THE EARTH'S MOTION.

Easy to Demonstrate It by a Simple Experiment.

It is quite possible to prove that the earth revolves on its axis by a simple experiment and without having recourse to mathematics. Take a good sized bowl, fill it nearly full of water and place it upon the floor of a room which is not exposed to shaking or jarring from the street.

Sprinkle over the surface of the water a coating of lycopodium powder, a white substance which is sometimes used for the toilet and can be bought at almost any drug store. Then upon the surface of this coating of powder make with powdered charcoal a straight black line, say, an inch or two inches in length and lying north and south.

Having made this little black mark with the charcoal powder on the surface of the contents of the bowl, lay down upon the floor a stick or some other straight object, so that it shall be exactly parallel with the mark. If the line happens to be parallel with a crack in the floor or with any stationary object in the room this will serve as well.

Leave the bowl undisturbed for a few hours and then notice the position of the black mark with reference to the object that it was parallel with. It will be found to have shifted its direction and to have moved from east to west—that is to say, in a direction opposite to that of the movement of the earth on its axis.

The earth in simply revolving has carried the water and everything else in the bowl around with it, but the powder on the surface has been left behind a little. The line will always be found to have moved from east to west, which is good proof that everything else has moved the other way.

WHY CYPRESS WOOD SINKS.

Washington Scientists Made a Most Singular Discovery.

Southern lumbermen take great delight in a story of certain scientific gentlemen who were sent by the government at Washington to study the growth and uses of the bald cypress at a time when cypress lumber was comparatively new to the market. They went direct to a large camp, presented credentials to the superintendent and watched with minute care the processes of cutting the timber and floating it down stream.

Cypress is a light, spongy wood that grows in swamps and absorbs water readily. The scientific gentlemen requested the superintendent to throw some logs into the river separate from the main rafts and followed their progress down stream in a boat. After floating south for some distance the logs with one accord sank. Much surprised, the scientific gentlemen returned and followed another consignment. The phenomenon was repeated; at a certain distance from the camp all the logs sank.

The gentlemen from Washington, being very scientific, did not think to question the unlettered superintendent about the power of cypress to become waterlogged, but after numerous observations and much comparing of notes reported to their department the startling discovery that cypress floated north of a certain parallel of latitude and south of it invariably sank. Of the cause they were not yet certain, but hazarded the suggestion that it might lie in the rotary motion of the earth, increasing in speed as the logs approached the equator until it was powerful enough to draw them under.

Fruit Tree Wood.

Many farmers who occasionally order the destruction of fruit trees on account of advanced age or unfruitfulness are quite unaware of the value attached to much of the wood thus sacrificed. Cherry wood is largely used in furniture and when polished reveals a beautiful color and provides a passable imitation of mahogany. Apple tree wood is remarkably well adapted to turner's work and is in demand for making cogwheels on account of its great strength and durability. The cogs of wooden mill wheels are often made of apple wood. It is also extensively used for fruit presses, where it proves very durable. The value of walnut wood in fine cabinet work is well known, and good prices are obtained for this beautiful and popular wood.—London Times.

The Beard In Tunis.

In Tunis when a reigning prince finds it necessary to go outside his immediate family to choose his successor he follows an odd custom. There the wearing of hair on the face is the exclusive privilege of sovereignty. When the prince selects a successor he sends the court barber to the fortunate individual to notify him that he may wear a beard. This intimation is equivalent to a formal announcement that he has been selected as the heir presumptive.

Ambition.

"No, Tommy," said his mother; "you can't have any more cake. You've had enough."

"What a fine little fellow he is," remarked the guest. "And when you're a man, Tommy, what are you going to do?"

"I'm goin' ter buy too much of everything I like to eat," replied Tommy sulkily.

His Will.

"Do you think the widow will break his will?"

"Won't be necessary. She did that long before she became a widow."

A man's health is something like an umbrella. When once lost it is hard to get back, but when worn a little it may be recovered.

The average young woman of today is busy. Beauty is only another name for health, and it comes to 99 out of every 100 who take Hollister's Rocky Mountain Tea. Tea or Tablets, 35 cents. D. M. Waters.

Extension Table of Rare Sort.

Something original in the way of a dining room table has been made by a skillful cabinetmaker for Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney's home in Newport. In its first form it is a perfectly plain round table, six feet in diameter, made of the finest and most beautifully grained mahogany, with simply carved legs. Belonging to it are a series of pieces of the mahogany, the shape of eight sections of pie, with the point cut off in a curved line. They are matched so beautifully that a series may be added to the table, making it ten feet in diameter, without any one not acquainted with its mysteries knowing it was not made in one piece. Still another series of pieces to be added in the same way make the table fourteen feet in diameter. The legs are arranged so that their tops unfold and extend to support the added pieces. —New York Press.

Some say that city girls are poor, ignorant things. Some of them cannot tell a horse from a cow, but they do know that Hollister's Rocky Mountain Tea is one of the greatest beautifiers known. Tea or Tablets, 35 cents. D. M. Waters.

New York.

New York, whose charter dates back to the year 1664, was the first incorporated city within the limits of the United States.

Thrashing Machines.

Thrashing machines go back to 1756. A German artisan, Hohlfield, designed one in that year. In 1786 Andrew Meikle, a Scotch mechanic, produced one so perfect that despite nearly a century of improvements it is today in all essentials the same as the original.

Celery.

Celery is the cultivated variety of the English weed smallage. It was introduced into kitchen gardens in England about the time of the reformation by some Italians, who gave it the name "celeri."

It is really one of the most wonderful tonics for developing the figure and soothing the nerves ever offered to the American people. Hollister's Rocky Mountain Tea or Tablets, 35 cents. D. M. Waters.

DEADLY MUSHROOMS.

THE BEAUTIFUL BUT VENOMOUS AMANITA FAMILY.

Beneath the Pleasing Exterior of This Brilliant Fungus Lurks a Vicious Poison That Is Fatal to the Lives of Men and Cattle.

In the dark shade of lofty pine trees and under spreading oaks in more open woods a mushroom is found so remarkable in color and graceful in form that its beauty has excited admiration for hundreds of years. The color of its bright orange cap and its chalk white stem and gills is heightened by the surrounding darkness of the woods and presents a contrast as singular as it is beautiful.

But beneath the pleasing exterior of this brilliant fungus a poison lurks so fatal to the lives of men and cattle that it is called the deadly amanita, and in different countries mothers caution their children to beware of its charms.

Amanita muscaria, the deadly, or fly, amanita, is completely incased in a fleece-like covering during the early stages of its growth, which makes it decidedly egg shaped in form. As the stem lengthens this covering either adheres in loose patches to the top of the cap or it slips away and forms a sheathing to the cup at the base of the stem.

Another inner covering breaks away in its turn from the cap as the mushroom expands and forms a conspicuous collar about the upper part of the stem. The bulbous base of the stem and these ruptured, fleecy coverings are pronounced characteristics which are most helpful in distinguishing this dangerous fungus from the other varieties of mushrooms.

It is strong, free from pests and grows to a height from four to sixteen inches. In color the cap is sometimes bright scarlet, again orange or yellow or reddish in the center and light yellow toward the edges, and it has noticeable wartlike patches spread over the top. On old plants the color fades out, and late in the season particularly forms of the deadly amanita are found which are almost white. The stem is easily separated from the cup at its base.

This mushroom is more generally known than any of the other poisonous species. It has long been used as a fly poison in Europe, and it takes its name, muscaria, from the Latin word for a fly. Its poisonous effect upon human beings begins a few hours after it has been eaten. The symptoms are nausea and faintness, with cold perspiration and stupor, followed in severe cases by death from a gradual weakening of the heart.

A strong emetic should be given at once, and in all cases a physician should be called. Sulphate of atropin is the only known chemical antidote for this poison, and to save the patient it must be promptly administered by hypodermic injections.

The poison may also be absorbed through the pores of the skin, and bad cases of poisoning have been produced by simply holding an amanita in the closed hand or breathing its exhalations in a warm room.

If poisonous mushrooms are packed in the same box with edible ones the virus from the poisonous fungi is absorbed by the harmless mushrooms, and they become as dangerous to eat as the original offenders.

In certain countries the deadly amanita seems to lose some of its virulency, and in the north of Russia and parts of northeastern Asia it is used in the same manner as wine for its intoxicating effects. The mushrooms are gathered in hot weather and are hung up in the air to dry or they are sometimes picked fresh and put into soup or sauces. A small amount swallowed whole is enough to produce a day's intoxication.

Another fatally dangerous member of the amanita family is the death cup (Amanita phalloides), a beautiful mushroom which also grows in the woods, especially in pine forests. It is not so highly colored as the deadly amanita, and, unlike that mushroom, it has a smooth, satiny cap. It is usually white or straw colored, but specimens are found which are light brown, green, yellow and spotted. The stem is white and nearly smooth, and the cup at the base of the stem is invariably present.

The death cup is even more poisonous than the deadly amanita and stands first among all noxious fungi for its poisonous qualities. It grows in the eastern and middle states and in particularly large quantities near the city of Washington.

Another amanita (Amanita vernus), found in the woods in spring, is also very poisonous and may be told by its color, which is a creamy white throughout.

Although it is said that the amanitas are the only mushrooms which have proved fatal to human life, there are other varieties which cause such acute distress that it is well to guard against eating them.

The boleti, for instance, have several varieties which are nonedible, although many kinds, on the other hand, make delicious food. The boleti are distinguished by a sponge-like surface of pores instead of gills beneath the cap. The harmful varieties are bitter, as a rule, and change color to blue or red when cut or broken. The edible varieties remain white.—Annie Oakes Huntington in Youth's Companion.

A DIFFICULT PROBLEM.

He has got quite the Simpkinson nose,
Though it isn't developed completely,
While his mouth shows the Smith, in repose,
He can smile with it too, very sweetly,
But his temper — that leaves us in doubt,
As to which one's account we should set it,
And opinions are veering about—
From which side of the house did he get it?

It is not a hard thing to agree
On his hair; I will make the confession
That he owes his complexion to me,
And he has his dear mother's expression,
If his temper at times does seem bad,
When discomfort has happened to fret it,
Still, he can't get it all from his dad,
From which side of the house did he get it?

But when he's feeling comfy and fed
And inclined for an infantile frolic,
Not arousing us all in the dead
Of the night in a fit of the colic,
When he's acting uncommonly cute
It's the Simpkinson way—you may bet it,
But the question remains in dispute,
From which side of the house did he get it?

TWO WOMEN INCINERATED.

Shocking Fire Fatality at Old Folks' Home at Bowmanville.

Bowmanville, Oct. 30.—A shocking fatality occurred here yesterday morning at the burning of the old Folks' Home, when Mrs. Mary Best Curtis of Clarke Township and Mrs. James Wilson of South Darlington were burned to death before they could be rescued.

Fire was discovered by Matron Johnston about 4 a. m., and she awakened John Griffin, a retired saddler, who resided there. He gave the alarm to the occupants on the second floor. Prof. Wm. Allin ran out to alarm the neighbors and ring the fire bell, while Mrs. Johnston and Griffin tried putting the fire out with pails of water. Failing in this, Griffin ran to the fire hall to ring the bell but missed his way and smashed the wrong window, injuring himself.

In the meantime Mrs. Lavier Bereau, the former matron, and her husband reached the home, and they succeeded in bringing out Mrs. Jane Heard of Newcastle and Mrs. John Bonathan of this town. As the latter was helpless Mr. Bereau carried her to his home.

When he returned he tried to rescue Mrs. Curtis from an upstair window, but could not find a ladder. Her cries of "Help, for God's sake, help!" were heartrending, but the house was by this time enveloped in flames.

It seems that Granny Wilson was gotten out with a Mrs. Alex. Kilman, one of the domestic helpers, but she rushed back again to get some clothes and was suffocated. Bureau saw her outside and supposed she was saved, but her remains were found in the debris under her room. She was in her 94th year, but was remarkably active for one so aged.

There were no fire appliances in particular, but a supply of water was kept in a tank or vessel of some kind. It was a storey and a half house with three or four exits, but the smoke was so very dense by the time the old folks were aroused that they could not find their way out and the doors were fastened so that those outside could not get in. The fire brigade arrived late, owing to the lateness of the alarm, and could do nothing but save the surrounding buildings. The trustees of the home had a small insurance on the furniture and effects.

A FOURTH VICTIM.

Foster Wedding Anniversary Was Very Tragic Event.

Hamilton, Oct. 30.—Richard Laidman of Binbrook, who was one of the guests at the Foster wedding anniversary in Oneida township, died Sunday. This makes the fourth victim among those who attended the affair. While it was thought at first that the deaths were due to ptomaine poisoning from eating gelatined chicken, it is now believed that they were due to typhoid fever, which resulted from drinking impure water. Mrs. S. A. Laidman and Mrs. Laidman are also very ill, but it is believed that they will recover.

RELIGIOUS OBJECTS BENEFIT.

Late Jairus Hart of Halifax Bequeaths Bulk of Fortune.

Halifax, N. S., Oct. 30.—The will of the late Jairus Hart, whose death took place on the 27th, and who was one of the wealthiest men of Halifax, was proved yesterday in the Probate Court.

The estate is estimated to be worth over half a million, the great bulk of which goes to benevolent and religious purposes.

Mount Allison University, of which Mr. Hart was regent, will eventually receive $100,000, and the Nova Scotia Methodist conference and the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church of Canada, $100,000; the Halifax Y. M. C. A., $10,000 for building fund; the Halifax citizens' library, $10,000 for new books; $20,000 for new ladies' college at Mount Allison. The School for the Blind is also a leading recipient.

As far as the auditors have as yet determined, the amount of the embezzlement is about $2,000.

Crimson Blind

usual, he said, for a testator to be refused assistance from the chief benefactor under his will. Henson apologized, with a sickly smile. He had important business of a philanthropic kind in Moreton Wells, but he had no doubt that it could wait for an hour. And then for the best part of the morning he sat fuming politely, whilst Littimer chattered in the most amiable fashion. Henson had rarely seen him in a better mood. It was quite obvious that he suspected nothing. Meanwhile Chris and Bell were bowling along towards Moreton Wells. They sat well back in the roomy waggonette, so that the servants could not hear them. Chris regarded Bell with a brilliant smile on her face.

"Confess," she said, "confess that your are consumed with curiosity."

"It would be just as well to acknowledge it at once," Bell admitted. "In the happy old days your sister Enid always said that you were the clever and audacious one of the family. She said you would do or dare anything."

"I used to imagine so," Chris said, more quietly. "But the life of the last few years tried one's nerves terribly. Still, the change has done me a deal of good—the change and the knowledge that Reginald Henson regards me as dead. But you want to know how I am going to get the Rembrandt?"

"That is what is consuming me at present," Bell said.

"Well, we are going to see the man who has it," Chris explained, coolly. "I have his address in Moreton Wells at the present moment, and for the rest he is called the Rev. James Merritt. Between ourselves he is no more a reverend than you are."

"And if the gentleman is shy or refuses to see us?"

"Then he will be arrested on a charge of theft."

"My dear young lady, before you can get a warrant for that kind of thing you have to prove the theft, you have to swear an information to the effect that you believe the property is in the possession of the thief, and that is not easy."

"There is nothing easier. I am prepared to swear that cheerfully."

"That you actually know that the property is in the possession of the thief?"

"Certainly I do. I saw him put it in his pocket."

Bell looked at the speaker with blank surprise. If such was the fact, then Chris's present statement was exactly opposed to all that she had said before. She sat opposite to Bell, with a little gleam of mischief in her lovely eyes.

"You saw that man steal the Rembrandt?" Bell gasped.

"Certainly not. But I did see him steal my big diamond star and put it in his pocket. And I can swear an information on that."

"I see that you have something interesting to tell me," Bell said.

"Oh, indeed, I have. We will hark back now to the night before last, when Reginald Henson made his personal attempt to obtain the Rembrandt and then played the trick upon you that was so very near to being a brilliant success."

"It would have been but for you," Bell murmured.

"Well, really, I am inclined to think so. And perhaps Lord Littimer would have given you in custody on a second charge of theft. If he had done so it would have gone hard with you to prove your innocence. But I am wandering from the point. Henson failed. But he was going to try again. I watched him carefully yesterday and managed to see his letters and telegrams. Then I found that he had telegraphed to James Merritt, whose address in Moreton Wells I carefully noted down. It did not require much intellect to grasp the fact that this Merritt was to be the accomplice in the new effort to steal the picture. Mr. Merritt came over and saw his chief, with whom he had a long conversation in the grounds. I also forced myself on Mr. Merritt's notice.

"He was introduced to me as a brand plucked from the burning, a converted thief who had taken orders of some kind. He is a sorry-looking scoundrel, and I took particular note of him, especially the horrible smashed thumb."

"The what!" Bell exclaimed. "A thumb like a snake's head with a little pink nail on it?"

"The same man. So you happen to have met him?"

"We met on our way here," Bell said drily. "The rascal sent the dog-cart away from the station so that I should have to walk home, and he attacked me in the road. But I half-expected something of the kind, and I was ready for him. And he was the man with the thumb. I should have told you all this before, but I had forgotten it in watching your fascinating diplomacy. When the attack was defeated the rascal bolted in the direction of the cliffs. Of course, he was off to tell Henson of the failure of the scheme and to go on with the plot for getting the other picture. If he had stolen my Rembrandt then the other would have remained. I couldn't have turned up with a cock-and-bull story of having started with the picture and being robbed of it by a total stranger in the road .... But I am interrupting you."

"Well, I marked that thumb carefully. I have already told you that the thief passed me on his way to the house when he came up the cliff. I was leaning over the terrace when I saw him emerge into a band of light caused by the big arc in the castle tower. I forgot that I was in deep shadow and that he could not possibly see me. I jerked my head back suddenly, and my diamond star fell out and dropped almost at the feet of the intruder. Then he saw it, chuckled over it—placed it in his pocket. I was going to call out, but I didn't. I had a sudden idea, Dr. Bell—I had an idea that almost amounted to an inspiration."

Chris paused for a moment and her eyes sparkled. Bell was watching her with the deepest interest and admiration.

"I let the man keep it," Chris went on, more slowly, "with an eye to the future. The man had stolen the thing and I was in a position to prove it. He would be pretty sure to pawn the star—he probably has done so by this time, and therefore we have him in our power. We have only to discover where the diamonds have been 'planted'—is that the correct expression?—I can swear an information, and the police will subsequently search the fellow's lodgings. When the search is made the missing Rembrandt will be found there. Mr. Merritt would hardly dare to pawn that."

"Even if he knew its real value, which I doubt," Bell said, thoughtfully. "Henson would not tell his tool too much. Let me congratulate you upon your idea, Miss Chris. That diamond star of yours is a powerful factor in our hands, and you always have the consciousness of knowing that you can get it back again. Now, what are we going to do next?"

"Going to call upon Mr. Merritt, of course," Chris said, promptly. "You forget that I have his address. I am deeply interested in the welfare of the criminal classes, and you are also an enthusiast. I've looked up the names of one or two people in the directory who go in for that kind of thing, and I'm going to get up a bazaar at Littimer Castle for the benefit of the predatory classes who have turned over a new leaf. I am particularly anxious for Mr. Merritt to give us an address. Don't you think that will do?"

"I should think it would do very well indeed," Bell said.

The quaint and somewhat exclusive town of Moreton Wells was reached in due course and the street where the Rev. James Merritt resided located at length. It was a modest two-storeyed tenement, and the occupier of the rooms was at home. Chris pushed her way gaily in, followed by Bell, before the occupant could lay down the foul clay pipe he was smoking and button the unaccustomed stiff white collar round his throat. Merritt whipped a tumbler under the table with amazing celerity, but no cunning of his could remove the smell of gin that hung pungently on the murky atmosphere.

Merritt dodged his head back defiantly as if half expecting a blow. His eyes were strained a little anxiously over Bell's shoulder as if fearful of a shadow. Bell had seen the type before—Merritt was unconsciously looking for the police.

"I am so glad to find you at home," Chris said, sweetly.

Merritt muttered something that hardly sounded complimentary. It was quite evident that he was far from returning the compliment. He had recognized Bell, and was wondering fearfully if the latter was as sure of his identity. Bell's face betrayed nothing. All the same he was following Merritt's uneasy eye till it rested on a roll of dirty paper on the mantelshelf. That roll of paper was the missing Rembrandt, and he knew it.

"Won't you offer me a chair?" Chris asked, in the sweetest possible manner.

Merritt sulkily emptied a chair of a pile of cheap sporting papers, and demanded none too politely what business the lady had with him. Chris proceeded to explain at considerable length. As Merritt listened his eyes gleamed and a broadening grin spread over his face. He had done a great deal of that kind of thing, he admitted. Since Henson had taken him up the police had not been anything like so inquisitive, and his present pose was fruitful of large predatory gains. The latter fact Merritt kept to himself. On the whole the prospect appealed to his imagination. Henson wouldn't like it but, then, Henson was not in a position to say too much.

"I thought perhaps if you came over with us and dined at the castle," Chris suggested. She spoke slowly and thoughtfully, with her eyes on the ground. "Say to-night. Will you come?"

THE BOLE DRUG CO. - WINNIPEG, MAN

Merritt grinned extensively once more. The idea of his dining at the castle appealed to his own peculiar sense of humor. He was at his ease, seeing that Bell failed to recognize him. To dine at the castle, to note the plate, and get a minute geographical knowledge of the place from personal observation! . . . His mouth watered at the thought.

"They ought to be more careful yonder," he suggested "There's plate and there's pictures."

"Nothing has ever been stolen from Littimer Castle," Bell said, crisply. He read the leer in Merritt's eyes as he spoke of pictures. "Nothing whatever."

"What, not lately?" Merritt asked. "Didn't I hear tell of a——"

He paused, conscious of saying too much. Bell shook his head again. An utterly puzzled expression crept over Mr. Merritt's engaging countenance. At the present moment an art treasure of price stood in that very room, and here was a party from the castle utterly innocent of the robbery. Chris glanced at Bell and smiled.

"I love the pictures," she said, "especially the prints. That Rembrandt, 'The Crimson Blind,' for instance. I found a fresh light in it this morning and called Lord Littimer's attention to it before we started. I should lock that up if it were mine."

Merritt's eyes fairly bulged as he listened. Had he not half-suspected some deep "plant" he would have been vastly amused. But then he had got the very picture these people were speaking about close to hand at the very moment.

"Tell you what," he said, suddenly. "I ain't used to swell society ways, but I'm always ready to sacrifice myself to the poor fellows who ain't found the straight path like me. And if you gets up your bazaar, I'll do what I can to 'elp."

"Then you will dine with us tonight?" Chris asked, eagerly. "Don't say no. I met a man once with a past like yours at Lady Roslingham's, and he was so interesting. We will call for you in an hour's time with the waggonette. Then we can settle half our plans before dinner.

Merritt was graciously pleased to be agreeable. Moreover, he was utterly puzzled and absolutely consumed with an overpowering curiosity. It seemed also to him to be a sheer waste of providence to discard such an offer. And the plate at Littimer Castle was superb!

Meanwhile Chris and Bell walked down the street together. "He was puzzled over the Rembrandt," Chris said. "Seeing that he has our picture——"

"No doubt about it. The picture was rolled up and stood on the mantelshelf. I followed Merritt's gaze, knowing perfectly well that it would rest presently on the picture if it was in the room. At the same time, our interesting friend, in chuckling over the way he has deceived us, clean forgot the yellow pawnticket lying on the table."

"Dr. Bell, do you mean to say that——"

"That I know where your diamond star was pledged. Indeed I do. Merritt had probably just turned out his pockets as we entered. The pawnticket was on the table and related to a diamond aigrette pawned by one James Merritt—mark the simple cunning of the man—with Messrs. Rutter and Co., 117, High Street. That in itself is an exceedingly valuable discovery, and one we can afford to keep to ourselves for the present. At the same time I should very much like to know what Rutter and Co. are like. Let me go down to the shop and make some simple purchase."

Rutter and Co. proved to be a very high-class shop indeed, despite the fact that there was a pawnbroking branch of the business. The place was quite worthy of Bond Street, the stock was brilliant and substantial, the assistants quite above provincial class. As Bell was turning over some sleeve links, Chris was examining a case of silver and gold cigarette-cases and the like. She picked up a cigar-case at length and asked the price. At the mention of fifty guineas she dropped the trifle with a little moue of surprise.

"It looks as if it had been used," she said.

"It is not absolutely new, madam," the assistant admitted, "therefore the price is low. But the gentleman who sold it to us proved that he had only had it for a few days. The doctor had ordered him not to smoke in future, and so——"

Chris turned away to something else. Bell completed his purchase and together they left the shop. Once outside Chris gripped her companion's arm excitedly.

"Another great discovery," she said. "Did you see me looking at that cigar-case—a gun-metal one set with diamonds? You recollect that Ruth Gates purchased a case like that for that—that foolishness we thought of in connection with Mr. Steel. The case had a little arrow shaped scratch with the head of the arrow formed of the biggest diamond. Enid told me all this the night before I left Longdean Grange. Dr. Bell, I am absolutely certain that I have had in my hand just now the very case bought by Ruth from Lockhart's in Brighton!"

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Bell was considerably impressed with the importance of Chris's discovery, though at the same time he was not disposed to regard it in the light of a coincidence.

"It's a useful discovery in its way," he said; "but not very remarkable when you come to think of it. Somebody with an eye to damaging Steel changed that cigar-case. How the change affected Steel you know as well as I do. But the cigar-case purchased by Ruth Gates must be somewhere, and we are as likely to find it near Reginald Henson as anywhere else, seeing that he is at the bottom of the whole business. That change was made either by himself or by somebody at his instigation. Once the change was made he would not bother about the spare cigar-case. His ally probably came here to see Henson; the latter as likely as not threw him over, knowing that the fellow would not dare to talk; hence the thing is turned into money. I am merely speculating, of course, under the assumption that you are quite sure of your facts."

"Absolutely," Chris cried, eagerly. "Two long, irregular scratches leading up in arrow-headed shape to the big diamond in the centre. Ruth told Enid all about that the very last time they discussed the matter together."

"How came Ruth Gates to remember it so clearly?"

"Well, she did it herself. She was rubbing some specks off the case at the last moment, and the scratches were made accidentally with the stones in one of her rings."

Bell was fain to admit that the discovery was an important one. "We'll leave it for the present," he said. "In a small place like this so valuable an article is likely to remain in stock for some time. I'll call in again to-morrow on the pretence of getting further goods and obtain all the information there is to be gained as to who sold the case and what he was like. There is just time for a little lunch before we take up our reverend friend. Where shall we go?"

Chris would like to see the Lion. There was a marvellous coffee-room there with panelled walls and a ceiling by Pugin, and an ingle-nook filled with rare Dutch tiles. They had the beautiful old place to themselves, so that they could talk freely. Chris crumbled her bread and sipped her soup with an air of deep abstraction.

"A great idea is forming in my mind," she said.

"What, another one?" Bell smiled. "Is it the air of the place or what? Really, there is a brilliancy about you that is striking."

Chris laughed. She was full of the joy of life to-day.

"It is the freedom," she said. "If you only knew what it is to feel free after the dull, aching, monotonous misery of the last few years. To be constantly on the treadmill, to be in the grasp of a pitiless scoundrel. At first you fight against it passionately, with a longing to be doing something, and gradually you give way to despair. And now the weight is off my shoulders, and I am free to act. Fancy the reward of finding Reginald Henson out!"

"Reginald Henson is the blight upon your house. In what way?"

"Ah, I cannot tell you. It is a secret that we never discuss even among ourselves. But he has the power over us, he has blighted all our lives. But if I could get hold of a certain thing the power would be broken. That is what I am after, what I am working for. And it is in connection with my endeavor that the new idea came to me."

"Can't you give me some general idea of it?" Bell asked.

"Well, I want to make Merritt my friend. I want him to imagine that I am as much of an adventuress as he is an adventurer. I want to let him see that I could send him to prison——"

"So you can by telling the police of the loss of your star."

"And getting Merritt arrested and sent to gaol where I couldn't make use of him? No, no. The thing is pretty vague in my mind at present. I have to work it out as one would a story; as David Steel would work it out, for instance. Ah!"

Chris clapped her hands rapturously, and a little cry of delight escaped her.

"The very thing," she exclaimed. "If I could lay all the facts before Mr. Steel and get him to plan out all the details! His fertile imagination would see a way at once. But he is far away and there is no time to be lost. Is there no way of getting at him?"

Chris appealed almost imploringly to her companion. She made a pretty picture with the old oak engravings behind her. Bell smiled as he helped himself to asparagus.

"Why not adopt the same method by which you originally introduced yourself to the distinguished novelist?" he asked. "Why not use Littimer's telephone?"

Chris pushed her plate away impetuously.

"I am too excited to eat any more," she said. "I am filled with the new idea. Of course, I could use the telephone to speak to Mr. Steel, and to Enid as well. If the scheme works out as I anticipate, I shall have to hold a long conversation with Enid, a dangerous thing so long as Reginald Henson is about."

"I'll keep Henson out of the way. The best thing is to wait till everybody has gone to bed to-night and call Steel up then. You will be certain to get him after eleven, and there will be no chance of your being cut off at that hour of the night in consequence of somebody else wanting the line. The same remark applies to your sister."

Chris nodded radiantly.

"Thrice blessed telephone," she said. "I can get in all I want without committing myself to paper or moving from the spot where my presence is urgently needed. We will give Mr. Steel a pleasant surprise to-night, and this time I shall get him into no trouble."

The luncheon was finished at length, and an intimation sent to Merritt that his friends were waiting for him at the Lion. As his powerful figure was seen entering the big Norman porch Henson came down the street driving a dog-cart at a dangerous rate of speed.

"Our man is going to have his trouble for his pains," Bell chuckled. "He has come to interview Merritt. How pleased he will be to see Merritt at dinner-time."

Merritt shambled in awkwardly, obviously suppressing a desire to touch his forelock. There was a sheepish grin on his face, a suppressed triumph in his eyes. He had been recently shaved and his hair cut, but despite these improvements, and despite his clerical garb, he was not exactly the class of man to meet in a dark lane after sunset.

Chris, however, showed nothing of this in her greeting. Long before Littimer Castle was reached she had succeeded in putting Merritt quite at his ease. He talked of himself and his past exploits, he boasted of his cunning. It was only now and again that he pulled himself up and piously referred to the new life that he was now leading. Bell was studying him carefully; he read the other's mind like an open book. When the waggonette finally pulled up before the castle Littimer strolled up and stood there regarding Merritt quietly.

"So this is the gentleman you were going to bring to dinner?" he said, grimly. "I have seen him before in the company of our dear Reginald. I also——"

FARM AND FIRESIDE

Useful Hints Which Will be Appreciated by the Progressive Farmer and His Housekeeper.

HOW TO CHOOSE A FARM.

Most people think of choosing a farm as a comparatively simple operation. "It's easy enough to buy a farm," one is apt to say: "the difficulty is to sell one" — a remark indicative of the strangely distorted point of view that has gained currency among us during, and partly because of, the ruinous exploitation of the national domain. Throughout civilization the land has been the choicest possession of mankind — real estate what one could be sure of, as contrasted with shifting and uncertain personal property. Now we hear of people who are 'land poor,' not because they are landless, but because they are landed. On the other hand, those whom exploitation has enriched do not disdain real estate as an investment, and the purchase of farms grows in popularity. An abandoned farm has only to be known to be occupied.

No doubt one reason for 'land poverty" has been indiscriminate purchase. Also, people are stirred to enthusiasm over rose-colored accounts of a big success in some special line — horse-raising, for instance — and forthwith rush headlong into it. To turn out well, an undertaking must be intelligently studied. A man must consider his own aptitudes, as well as his experience. "Certain men who can make a profitable living at market-gardening in what seems to others a sand-bank would fail utterly as ranchmen." Another question is the amount of capital to invest, which depends directly of course on the amount one has. Whatever that is, don't put it all into the land, and 'the higher the price of the land, the smaller the proportion of the capital that should be put into it."

Another very important consideration is that the farm has a value entirely beyond and outside of its cash-producing power. Besides being a place of business it is a home, and the attractiveness of the site and buildings from that point of view, their healthfulness, nearness to the schools, churches and neighbors, ease of approach and general environment should weigh heavily in making one's choice. "The farms of the United States are capitalized above their commercial value" because they serve as homes as well as places of business.

Allot three points to the farm's adaptation to certain kinds of farming, 2 to size, 5 to shape, 6 to topography, 15 to natural fertility, 5 to condition, 4 to physical properties, 5 to drainage, 3 to freedom from stumps, etc., 5 to climate, 5 to healthfulness, 5 to water supply, 20 to location, shipping facilities, roadways, etc., 15 to improvements (location and condition of buildings, fences, etc.), and 2 to what might be termed extras timber, orchards, vineyards, etc. This is interesting, but looks at first glance rather academic. The value of the score would depend on the experience of the scorer, and the first thing that experience would lead him to discard might be the score-card. We know how it is in judging cattle.

However, even if only a stepping stone, the score card may serve a useful educational purpose. It may even help the expert to compare one farm with another, for experts have been known to lay too much stress on some specially striking feature, or to forget in their summing up some of the points they may have observed. We should always think of a score-card as something relative, not absolute, the value of which depends on the judgment with which it us used. Absolutely it is unfair to give only a few points to a cow's head when a cow without a head could score no points at all. So 5 points to healthfulness seems meagre when we consider that an unhealthful farm should score nothing. But there are degrees of healthfulness.

But the choice of the farm is only the first step. The larger part of the treatise is given up to applying the principles concerned in the selection of a farm to a discussion of the different agricultural regions of this continent.

ENQUIRIES AND ANSWERS.

What Readers Want to Know.

Water for Animals. — Is rain water, collected in cisterns under conditions guarding its cleanliness, as well relished and withal as good for all kinds of farm stock as well water? A.H. (We have never noticed that domestic animals did not relish rain water, if clean, fresh and cool, as well as any.)

Mosquitoes — Can you refer me to recent literature on the mosquitoes that carry malaria and yellow fever? (Latest and best we know of is a book "Mosquitoes, How they Live," by L. O. Howard, published by McClure, Philips & Co., New York, in 1901. There may be a later edition, but the first is still up to date in its information.)

Mixed Ensilage — Would it be right to put second-crop clover in on top of corn in silo after the corn settles? (Certainly, but in a dry season it will not begin to pay, as the clover loses comparatively little when curing as hay, and is apt to lose much more when curing into ensilage. Better cure as hay, and save hauling so much water from field to barn. Green clover is about as hard a stuff to pitch as the average man ever encounters.)

Celery Blight — I send you some diseased celery leaves. Kindly tell me the trouble and what to do. (The trouble is known as celery blight, and is due to a fungus known as Cercospora Apii Fr., which causes leaf spots, at first yellowish, then enlarging and turning brown. Shady and moist situations have been recommended for celery beds; but the greater success lies in spraying with the ammoniacal solution of copper carbonate. More effective results will be obtained if the spraying is commenced early,—even while the seedlings are quite small. Ammoniacal copper carbonate consists of carbonate of copper 5 oz., ammonia water, strength 26 deg., 3 qts., water 30 gal. Wet up the copper carbonate in a quart of water, add the ammonia and when completely dissolved dilute with water. This compound may be made up in varying proportions.)

Calves Without Milk.—Please tell me how to raise calves with the minimum quantity of new milk. Milk is sold from the dairy; hence we have no skim milk to use. (Use Blatchford Calf Meal, a preparation a hundred years old or more, we believe, and furnished by J. W. Barwell, Waukegan, Ill. Let it have part of mother's milk for two weeks; then begin feeding from pail. As soon as it would drink, make a gruel from two tablespoonfuls of wheat flour and same of oat chop, added to the skim-milk, gradually increasing the gruel and lessening the milk; in about 2 weeks change food to corn meal and wheat shorts, equal weight, for the gruel, and have increased to 3-4 of a pound of the mixture night and morning, make a gruel, and one quart of coarse wheat bran night and morning fed dry. Will increase feed as calf gets older.")

San Jose Scale. — I have about 100 currant bushes; in July leaves started to fall and at present are as bare as winter, and the wood is all dead, as you see by enclosed sample. (The currant twigs accompanying the above communication were very badly infested with San Jose scale. We suggest cutting off the infested tops at once and burning them, and in early spring, before the buds start, thoroughly drench the stubs with a well prepared lime-sulphur wash. This work could be done this fall, and a second spraying given, as described above, in early spring. The San Jose scale thrives amazingly on the currant, and considering the advanced character of the attack, it would not be surprising if the pest had already become established on adjacent trees. These should be carefully examined, and if the insect be found thereon, they also should be sprayed in fall or spring, or both, with the lime-sulphur wash. We might add that this pest is already well established.

THE VETERINARIAN.

Answers to Correspondents.

Bowels Loose. — A Standard-bred mare dropped colt May 24. Ever since she seems to be loose in bowels, similar to a cow when put on pasture. She seems to be a hearty eater, both pasture and corn, and does not seem sick. (Have her teeth put in order. Give in food twice a day three tablespoonfuls of the following powder:—Powdered sulphate of iron, 8 oz.; powdered nitrate potass., 4 oz.; powdered gentian, 6 oz.; mix. Put on tongue every three hours 20 drops of fluid extract nux vomica.

Holding up Milk. — Cow holds up milk every night for past three weeks and for past two mornings. She never did so before. She began this when another cow that stands next to her had a calf. I thought it would be all right in a few days when she got accustomed to the calf, but the calf is sold, and still she holds her milk. Can I prevent this? I fear she will dry herself off. (Are you sure some one is not milking her or some animal sucking her? Put a bag of sand on her back when milking her. Seek a cause for the trouble.)

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

Ways With Green Tomatoes.

After a light frost lift the vines and hang in an out building or in a cellar, or place large green tomatoes on a shelf in a cellar, and they will ripen in a month or more. Green tomatoes should be gathered after a heavy frost, before the sun strikes the vines.

Soy.—To four quarts of sliced tomatoes add ten medium-sized peeled and sliced onions, four teacupfuls of sugar, a tablespoonful each of ground cloves and cinnamon, a heaped teaspoonful of pepper, two tablespoonfuls of salt and a tablespoonful of mustard powder. Boil slowly until the compound can be easily rubbed through a colander. Reheat, bottle and seal.

Whole Pickles.—Prick the skin of small tomatoes of even size and put into weak brine for twelve hours. Cook in half and half vinegar and water until a broom splint will pierce them. Drain, pack in cans and cover with a syrup of four teacupfuls of sugar, a quart of vinegar, a teaspoonful each of cinnamon, cloves, ginger and pepper, tied loosely in a cheese cloth bag. Boil the syrup until moderately thick and pour over the tomatoes, first turning off the liquor in the bottom of the can. Fill to the brim and seal.

French Pickles.—Cut a piece from either end of a peck of tomatoes, slice and mix with six sliced onions and a teacupful of salt. Drain in twelve hours, and cook about half tender in one-third vinegar and two-thirds water. Now drain through a colander with light pressure. Into three quarts of vinegar put two pounds of brown sugar, half a pound of mustard seed, two tablespoonfuls each of ground allspice and cinnamon, and a scant tablespoonful of pepper. Add the onions and tomatoes; cook fifteen minutes, lifting several times that they may cook evenly, and can hot.

Picalilli.— Take eight pounds of finely chopped tomatoes, a large head of cabbage and four onions, chopped. Press and strain through cheesecloth; add three pounds of brown sugar, a quart or more of vinegar, a tablespoonful each of ground cinnamon and cloves, two level tablespoonfuls of salt, and pepper if liked. Cook tender, and can when cold.

Preserves.—Weigh sliced tomatoes, cook in water until quite tender, drain; allow three-quarters of a pound of sugar to a pound of tomatoes. Make a rich syrup with the sugar and a very little water, the juice of two or three lemons and a few slices of peel. Cook the tomatoes in this syrup five minutes, remove the lemon peel, and can.

To Fry Tomatoes.—Cover the bottom of an iron spider with pickled-pork fat or lard (butter will make them black), dip the slices in flour and fry brown on both sides, seasoning with salt and pepper, and turning with a pancake shovel. When done, which will take about twenty minutes, place carefully on a platter, dot with bits of butter, and sprinkle with sugar.

WHEN AN EGG IS FRESH.

"Straight up or turned?" According to a wholesale egg dealer there is more in that question of the waiter than the guest thinks there is. "It means to ask whether the customer demands a fresh egg or whether he will stand for a cold-storage egg," said the wholesaler. "An egg is always an egg, but there is only one kind of a fresh egg. In frying a fresh egg upon one side only, the yelk stands boldly in the pan and is bright and clear. When a cold-storage egg is fried on one side only, it flattens out and is opaque. The restaurant man likes an order to "turn over," as it allows him to conceal this dulled effect of refrigeration. If you want a fresh egg, next time you order at a restaurant, have it fried on one side only. He will be a nervy restaurateur who will hand you a cold-storage egg fried that way, unless he thinks you do not know an egg when you see it."—Kansas City Journal

VEGETABLE SOUPS.

Nearly every vegetable grown may be employed in the preparation of soups, either as the foundation for the soup or as a garnish to any any kind of meat stock. A few types of vegetable soups are given. Meat, meat broth or beef extract may be added to any of them if additional flavor is desired, but as they stand they are very satisfactory soups.

Mixed Soup.—Three quarts of water, one quart of shredded cabbage, one pint of sliced potato, half a pint of minced carrot, half a pint of minced turnip, half a pint of minced onion, one leek, two tomatoes, two tablespoonfuls of minced celery, two tablespoonfuls of green pepper, two tablespoonfuls of butter or drippings three teaspoonfuls of salt and half a teaspoonful of pepper. Have the water boiling hard in a stewpan, and add all the vegetables except the potatoes and tomatoes. Boil rapidly for ten minutes, then draw back where it will boil gently for one hour. At the end of this time, add the other ingredients, and cook one hour longer. Have the cover partially off the stewpan during the entire cooking. This soup may be varied by using different kinds of vegetables.

Herb Soup.—Half a pint of finely-shredded spinach, one-fourth pint of shredded sorel, one-fourth blanched and sliced leek, the white heart leaves of a head of lettuce, four potatoes of medium size, three level teaspoonfuls of salt, four tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of chervil, two quarts of boiling water, and half a pint of bread cut in dice and tried in butter or browned in the oven. Have the sorrel, spinach and lettuce fresh, tender and free from tough midribs. Wash and shred. Cut the washed leek into thin slices. Put in the stewpan with the butter, and cook fifteen minutes, being careful not to brown. Now add the potatoes, salt and boiling water. Place the stewpan where the contents will boil quickly, and when the soup begins to boil, draw the stewpan back where the contents will boil gently for one hour. At the end of this time crush the potatoes with a fork, add the chervil, and simmer five minutes longer. Turn into the soup tureen, add the crisped bread, and serve.

If preferred, the soup may be rubbed through a purree sieve, returned to the fire, and when boiling hot be poured on the yelks of two eggs which have been beaten with two tablespoonfuls of milk.

This soup may be varied indefinitely. Any number of green vegetables can be employed in making it, care being taken to use only a small quantity of those of pronounced flavor.

Sorrel Soup.—Three pints of boiling water, three tablespoonfuls of butter, one-third cupful of shredded sorrel, three tablespoonfuls of milk, one teaspoonful of salt, yelks of two eggs and half a cupful of bread cut in dice and dried in the oven or fried in butter. Tear the tender green parts from the midribs of the cultivated sorrel; wash in cold water, and shred very fine. Put half the butter in a stewpan and add the shredded sorrel. Place on the fire and cook five minutes, stirring frequently. Now add the boiling water and salt, and boil ten minutes. Beat the yelks of the eggs well, then add the milk, and pour into the soup tureen, and add the remaining half of the butter cut into bits. Gradually pour the boiling-hot soup in the soup tureen, stirring all the while to combine the hot mixture with the egg yelk. Add the bread dice and serve.

Leek Soup.—Three quarts of boiling water, two cupfuls of leeks cut fine, four cupfuls of potatoes cut in dice, two tablespoonfuls of butter or drippings, three teaspoonfuls of salt, half a teaspoonful of pepper, four slices of stale bread cut in small pieces, and four tablespoonfuls of minced onion. Wash the leeks and cut off the roots. Cut the white part in thin slices. Pare the potatoes and cut in dice. Put them in a bowl of cold water. Put the butter, leeks and onion in the soup pot and on the fire. Cook twenty minutes slowly, stirring frequently; then add the hot water, potatoes and seasoning, and cook at least half an hour longer. Serve very hot. If it is convenient and liked, cook with the leeks and butter and white stalks of four or five cibols, or one shallot may be cut fine and cooked with the leeks. This is a delicious and wholesome soup, and is even better reheated the second day than the first.

Cream of Leek Soup.— Make this soup as directed for leek soup, using only three pints of water. When it is cooked, rub through a sieve, return to the soup pot, and add one quart of hot milk. Beat with whisk until smooth. Half a cupful of the milk can be reserved, cold and added to two well-beaten yelks of eggs. Stir this into the soup just as it is taken from the fire. The yelks of the eggs make the soup very much richer.

Butchers.

There was not enough of the good butchers' to supply the demand, and the export class was invaded to get enough good cattle, as will be seen by the quotations given. Best butchers' sold at $4.35 to $4.65, and a couple of loads of exporters were bought for butchers' purposes at $4.75; medium to fair butchers', $3.85 to $4.15; lighter grades, $3.65 to $3.75; common at $3.25 to $3.50; cows, $2.75 to $3.65; canners, $1 to $2.25 per cwt.

MONTREAL LIVE STOCK.

Montreal, Oct. 29.—(Special.)—Cables from Liverpool and London on Canadian cattle were strong and noted an advance in prices of ½c to 1c, with sales in the former market at 11½c, and in the latter one at 11½c to 12c. Ranch cattle in Liverpool were ½c higher, at 10½c; demand for ocean space has improved considerably, which has strengthened the market, and rates have advanced 2s 6d to 5s per head, and the bulk of the space has been engaged for the balance of the season at 30s to 35s to Liverpool, 27s 6d to 30s to London, 25s to Glasgow, and Manchester. Exports last week were 2921 cattle. Receipts to-day were 3000 cattle, 50 milch cows, 2700 sheep and lambs, 1000 hogs, 150 calves. The most important feature of the trade was the weaker feeling in the market for hogs, and prices declined 25c per 100 lbs., which makes net reduction of 65c to 75c during the month. This continued weakness in the hog situation is due to several reasons, of which the most depressing one has been the steady increase in supplies of late, and, in addition to this, the leading foreign markets for Canadian bacon have had a downward tendency, the decline in prices in Liverpool during the present month being 2s to 5s in London, 3s to 6s, and in Bristol 2s to 3s. The demand for hogs this morning at the above reduction in prices was good, notwithstanding the fact that the packers were fairly well supplied with stock, and sales of selected lots were made at $6 to $6.25 per 100 lbs., weighed off cars.

The butchers were out strong, and there was a good demand for the best cattle at last week's rates, but the common and inferior beasts were slow of sale at lower prices. Prime beeves sold at 4c to 4½c per lb.; pretty good, 3½c to 4c, and the common stock at 2c to 3c, while the lean canners sold at 1½c. There were a number of very fine milch cows on the market, and these sold at $50 to $60 each; the others sold at $25 to $45. Grass-fed calves sold at 2½c to 3½c per lb. Good veals at 4c to 5c. Sheep sold at 3½c to 4¼c per lb., and the lambs at 5c to nearly 5¾c per pound.

EAST BUFFALO CATTLE MARKET.

Veals—Receipts, 1000 head; active and 50c higher, $4.50 to $9.

An Eccentric Writer.

Lopez de Vega was an eccentric as well as voluminous writer. He wrote five novels. The first is without the letter a, the second without e, the third without i, and the fourth and fifth purposely omit o and u respectively.

Stopping a Sneeze.

Of course you know how disagreeable it is to feel a desire to sneeze in any public place. Press hard upon your upper lip and you can usually overcome this feeling.

The Penguin.

The penguin has used its wings so little that in the course of ages these members have become dwarfed and can no longer be employed for flight. They are, however, an important aid to the bird when swimming or diving.

Chew Your Food.

Masticate food thoroughly. A frequent cause of appendicitis is swallowing half masticated indigestible food.

An order of precedence is the order in which individuals are entitled to precede or follow each other in state ceremonials or public occasions when processions of the nobility are formed.

Naval Salaries.

The admiral of the navy receives an annual salary of $13,500. An ordinary seaman gets $19 a month.

Boys Who Smoke.

An English schoolmaster asserts that he can detect the smokers among his boys by their handwriting, the writing of the boys who smoke being loose and flabby. Handwriting, he says, is a cinematograph of the heart.

Wild Birds.

No wild female bird ever sings during the period of incubation and rarely at other times.

Japanese Auctions.

They have a queer way of holding auctions in Japan. The auctioneer puts up the object to be sold and asks for bids. Each bidder then writes his highest price on a bit of paper and deposits it in a box. The box is opened and the object is handed over to the one who has offered the most for it.

FOUR MAGAZINES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

CO-OPERATION IN ADVERTISING MAKES IT POSSIBLE.

Half price offers are but combinations of advertising. In a word, four magazines band together, use the same publicity and share the expenses. Four magazines working together reduce the cost of publicity about one-fourth of what it would be if taken up alone. The receipts are approximately the same as if the publicity were carried on independently. And who receives the benefits from this publicity club? The patron of the magazines, inasmuch as he secures a reduction in the subscription price made possible by economy. And thus the home can now secure three, four and five periodicals, which present-day needs require, for little more than the old-time price of a single magazine, that once was the solitary visitor to the family circle.

For instance, Combination No. 2, advertised by the Central Magazine Agency in our columns, offers The Cosmopolitan Magazine, $1.00; The Harper's Bazar, $1.00; The Home Magazine, $1.00, and The Reader Magazine, $3.00—total value, $6.00—all four for $3.00, one-half price, a saving of fifty per cent.

Another good offer is The Delineator, McClure's Magazine, The World's Work and The Home Magazine. These four may be had for just $3.50.

One of the best bargains ever offered is The Cosmopolitan Magazine, The World To-day and The Home Magazine, all three for one year for just $2.00.

For $2.00 you can secure a year's subscription to The Cosmopolitan The World To-day and The Home Magazine.

For $2.50 you can have The Cosmopolitan, $1.00; Home Magazine, $1.00; The Reader Magazine, $3.00, at one-half price, $2.50. All three for less than the price of one.

The best bargain of the year, however, is The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, Harper's Bazar and The Reader Magazine, total value, $6.00—all for half price, $3.00. This is positively the best bargain of the year.

Before subscribing to any magazines our readers should write the Central Magazine Agency (Bobbs-Merrill Co.), Indianapolis, Ind., for prices. Further than this if you have spare time and want to earn Christmas money, the Central Magazine Agency will pay you a liberal commission on these great magazine combinations. You will be surprised to find how easy it is to make from $10.00 to $100.00 a week in securing orders from your neighbors. You can save them from 40 to 50 per cent. on their year's magazines and make a handsome commission for yourself.

To any newsdealer, druggist or agent who will act as our agent we will run their name and address at the bottom of our large display advertising. Our commission to agents or newsdealers is 35 cents an order.

Write to-day for our special offer or send your order for any of the combinations mentioned above. Remember, The Cosmopolitan, Home Magazine, The Reader Magazine and Harper's Bazar—all four for $3.00—total value, $6.00. You save 50 per cent. Copyright 1906 by Hart Schaffner & Marx

Our Clothing is the result of genius. First, the genius of the men who design the pattern of the cloth—next, the genius of the men who cut the garments—and next, the genius of the Tailors who build and mold them into the finest Clothing produced in America today.

We told you much about our Clothing, but all the telling can make but a small part of the impression that actual wearing experience will give.

You know you can depend on it—you see its right up to the minute in style—you feel, as well as see, its perfection.

A HIGH-COURAGED HORSE.

The brain as the driver of the eyes is also likely to be one seriously disturbed by the perplexities of handling the eye reins when improperly adjusted. Many cases of insanity, epilepsy, sleeplessness, nervous prostration and many other physical and mental ailments are unquestionably due to the incessant struggle on the part of the brain to overcome the difficulties and perplexities entailed by eyes which are improperly harnessed for team work, which cannot be handled easily as a pair, which require the activity of more muscles to produce a desired effect than Nature planned for; and which constantly call upon the brain for excessive nervous expenditure to overcome or compensate for the existing maladjustment of the eye-muscles. We give Glasses to bring about a normal adjustment of these muscles, producing an easy working balance, and as a result all the physical and mental troubles will gradually subside. This result we have seen in many cases.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

"CHARLEY'S AUNT" TO-NIGHT.

Wilfrid North's triumphant revival of "Charley's Aunt," with Etienne Girardot in the title role, after a ten weeks' successful engagement in New York, where it was greeted by the largest audiences seen in the metropolis last spring, and kept theatre-goers laughing long after the curtain had been drawn down after the final act nightly, will be the attraction at the Carman tonight. The popularity of the comedy is remarkable, and is all the more wonderful when it is taken into consideration that its vogue is not confined to any one country or nationality. Mr. Girardot was personally engaged by the author to portray the principal part in the original production of the comedy in this country, and its great popularity was in no small measure due to the admirable work of this excellent comedian.

"THE MAN OF HER CHOICE."

Young or old, rich or poor, everybody is interested in watching a fire and a brave rescue at a fire. It is because of this well-known fact that Edw. M. Simmonds has written in his successful melodramatic sensation of the season, "The Man of Her Choice," the most perfect electrically equipped fire scene ever attempted on any stage, and in connection with it a rescue of a woman slowly burning to death, through roaring tongues of seething flames. This scene makes one of the most exciting climaxes you have ever witnessed and is only one of the many thrillers contained in "The Man of Her Choice," which comes to the Carman next Friday evening.

"GIRLS WILL BE GIRLS."

"Girls Will be Girls" will appear at the Carman next Saturday night. "Girls Will be Girls" is a musical farce with a plot. An excellent company is headed by Al. Leech, whose eccentricities are well known, and he is reinforced by the Three Rosebuds, Maude Gray, Charlotte Towle and Lily D. Hart. The production is an elaborate one, and is staged with the usual magnificence of the Brady plays. The score written by Mr. Jos. Hart is replete with musical bits that will be whistled on the streets, and many of the songs and dances rendered by a big chorus of pretty girls and distinct novelties.

At Sign of the Scales.

DRUNKS.

John Maiyea and Robert Gibson, a yeoman, were charged with the above offence. The former promised to leave the city immediately if he were given the opportunity, and the Magistrate said "go" and he left.

Gibson, who had appeared before on similar charges, was fined $5 or 15 days.

FIGHTING.

Thos Bowen pleaded guilty to a charge of fighting upon the street, and a fine of $5 or 15 days was imposed. The fine was paid.

WHAT A TOY PISTOL DID.

Three small boys named John Gallagher, Charles and Stanley McConnell, were accused of inflicting harm upon a lad named Harry Smith. It appears that the boys were playing in a barn when one of the number discharged a toy pistol near Smith's head. The result was that the boy's left ear was so badly burned as to need medical aid. As the case was one of accident and not intentional the charge was dismissed and the medical expenses will be paid by the parents of the boy who discharged the pistol Mr. McMahon for plaintiff, and Mr. Carnew for the defendants.

Died In Tweed.

Mrs. James H. Clare, a well-known lady who resided in the village of Tweed, died, after a few weeks' illness, at the home of her father, Mr. Arthur Johnston, of Greenwood, Ont. Deceased was a lady who was esteemed by all who knew her. She was a member of the Methodist Church. A husband and family survive.

Y.M.C.A. Will Open Soon

A gentleman prominently connected with Y.M.C.A. work in this city informs us that the local rooms will open again in a couple of weeks. Mr. Hess, a young married man, of Midland, has been secured as secretary. He is very highly spoken of, in fact, Rev. T. Albert Moore, well known here, told our informant that Belleville was getting, in his opinion, the brightest young Y.M.C.A. man in Ontario. The local Association's appeal for funds, we are told, has been quite successful, and the directors are much encouraged.

The Assizes Opened.

HIS LORDSHIP JUDGE BRITTON PRESIDING—THE GRAND JURY'S DUTIES ARE LIGHT — THE JUDGE'S REMARKS.

The Fall Assizes opened in this city this afternoon, before Judge Britton.

The only criminal case is that of King vs. Ferdinand Kleingbeil, who is charged with murder. The prisoner was arraigned at the Spring Assizes and pleaded not guilty, after the Grand Jury had returned a true bill against him.

Mr. F. Arnoldi, K. C., of Toronto, an erect, military-looking gentleman, is the Crown Prosecutor.

The presence of many material witnesses in the Court room this afternoon led to the assumption that the Kleingbeil case would be at once proceeded with.

THE GRAND JURY.

The following gentlemen were on the list for the Grand Jury:

Edward Ashley, Faraday.
G. A. Meiklejohn, Hungerford.
I. Adams, Madoc.
Francis Scott, Sidney.
Wm. Haney, Tyendinaga.
John Goodfellow, Tyendinaga.
Jonathan McCurdy, Rawdon.
Richard Badgley, Thurlow.
Robt. Bogle, Belleville.
Lorne W. Marsh, Belleville.
F. S. Black, Tweed.
Hy Bristoe, Deseronto.
Loughlin Cook, Marmora.

When the Grand Jury roll was called, three of them did not answer, and proceedings halted for a time.

Glancing round the Court room, it was gratifying to see that the archaic stoves, which formerly ornamented the Temple of Justice, had been removed, up-to-date registers and pipes having taken their place.

The missing places on the Grand Jury were filled, and that august worth, County Clerk, as foreman, he having been pressed into service.

They returned and announced that they had selected Mr. W. R. Aylesworth, County Clerk, as foreman.

By this time there were no vacant seats in the Court room.

THE JUDGE'S ADDRESS.

His Lordship Judge Britton said the duties of the Grand Jury would be light. He congratulated the Grand Jury and the County on that fact. They would attend to the routine duties of their office. He was glad to see the improvements in the Court House, which had been needed. In conclusion His Lordship told the Grand Jurors that any suggestions made by them, looking to the public welfare, would be gladly welcomed.

County Judge Deroche had a seat on the bench with Judge Britton.

MEDICAL EXPERTS HERE.

Drs Bruce Smith, Johnston and Clarke, of Toronto, three prominent medical experts, are in the city. It is surmised that they are subpoenaed to give expert testimony in the Kleingbeil case.

KLEINGBEIL IS HEARTY.

In conversation it was learned that Ferdinand Kleingbeil, the man accused of murder, is in good health and spirits, and his serious plight has not, apparently, depressed him at all. "He's as hearty as an old buck," was the way one of the County officials expressed himself.

A SLANDER CASE.

Wright vs. O'Hara, a slander case, was taken up first, and it was announced that the Kleingbeil case would be proceeded with to-morrow morning.

Oh Horrors! Do Kingston Ladies Smoke?

Kingston News: I had occasion to call on an office man a few days ago, and while we were conjecturing as to who would be the Mayoralty candidates in January next, the dominie entered almost out of breath from running up stairs. He stated that he had just had quite a conversation with a gentleman (mentioning his name), and that he heard something about Kingston ladies that very much astounded him. We asked for information, and this is what he told us: On a Sunday afternoon the reverend gentleman met a lady friend who appeared to be in high dudgeon about something. One word brought on another until she finally let the cat out of the bag. She said she had just left the house of a friend to return no more. When she entered the drawing-room she discovered three well-known ladies smoking cigarettes and seemingly in great enjoyment. She protested, and was informed that all ladies smoke in private now-a-days. After hearing this remark, and having refused a cigarette, she concluded that her company was undesirable and therefore took her departure most unceremoniously. If this information didn't come from a well-known divine, both the office man and myself would not have paid any attention to it. I don't believe one yarn in ten that are told about ladies. But there must be something in this one.

Stomach Troubles and Constipation

The presentation was made by Masters James Tower and William Cochrane, and replied to in a very feeling manner by Mr. Robb. The Oven That Ends Guesswork

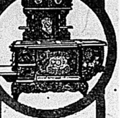
Before you put the roast in an Imperial Oxford oven, let the draft bring the heat to the right point. You'll know when it gets there if you'll look at the oven thermometer. After the roast goes in, you can know (not guess) it will be cooked right in a certain definite time. There's no ups-and-downs to the oven-heat in a range built as this one is,—the diffusive oven-flue takes all the guess work out of cooking, all the drudgery out of oven-use



That Rack That Ends Bother

When the roast needs basting, pull forth the Imperial Oxford draw-out oven rack,—roast and all—slide it right out where you can get at it. Needn't reach in and scorch your fingers nor sear your wrists,—baste it in comfort. That one thing alone—the draw-out rack—ought to make you like this range above all ranges. And that's only one of the twelve better things about this range. Come and look.

NATIONALIST TRIUMPH

Redmond Would Resort to Compulsion to Reinstate Tenants.

Irish Leader Alleges That Landlords Are Hindering the Operation of the Land Act by Refusing to Sell Untenanted Land—Patience of Irish People Becoming Exhausted—Chief Secretary Bryce's Reply.

London, Eng., Oct. 30.—John E. Redmond, the Irish leader moved the adjournment of the House of Commons yesterday in order to call attention to the lack of progress in the matter of reinstating evicted tenants, hindering the operations of the land act by refusing to sell untenanted lands. The land commissioners consequently were unable to provide farms for evicted tenants.

Mr. Redmond said it was obvious that the Government must resort to some system of compulsion. The patience of the Irish people was becoming exhausted, and, although the Irish party desired to give opportunity for the greatest degree of fair play pending a declaration of the Government's intention regarding Irish self-government, he thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland Bryce ought to grapple with the matter vigorously.

Replying to Mr. Redmond, Mr. Bryce, after some debate, said the Government had done its best to cope with the grave obstacles before it, and had won a certain measure of success. If the remedy is compulsion, the chief secretary said the Government might have to come to that.

Walter Hume Long, Conservative, then declared that Mr. Bryce's statement involved a complete triumph for the Nationalists, and the subject was dropped.

BEATEN IN LORDS.

Majority of 200 Against Government on the Education Bill.

London, Oct. 30.—The first vote in committee of the House of Lords on the education bill was taken last night and resulted in the defeat of the Government by a majority of 200.

The vote came on an amendment to the first clause in the bill. The amendment, which was offered by Lord Heneage, Liberal, makes religious instruction compulsory during a part of the daily school hours in all public elementary schools.

Earl Crewe, speaking for the Government, refused to accept the amendment, but after a most business-like debate, the amendment was carried, 256 to 56. The majority included the entire Opposition in the House of Lords with the exception of Lord Ampthill, who voted with the minority. Among the majority were the Archbishop of Canterbury, 20 bishops and the Duke of Devonshire.

Among the minority were all the peers who are members of the Government, and Lord Rosebery, the Duke of Manchester, the Earl of Durham, Earl Russell, the Marquis of Northampton, Lord Brassey, Lord Grimthorpe, Lord Weardale, Lord Haversham and Lord Reay.

TOLD NEWFOUNDLAND ALL.

Precise Details of Negotiations With U. S. For Modus Vivendi.

London, Oct. 30.—Answering a question in the House of Commons yesterday Winston Spencer Churchill, Under Secretary for the Colonial Office, gave precise details of the steps taken fully to inform the Government of Newfoundland of the course of the negotiations for a modus vivendi on the fisheries question. He said:

"The decision of His Majesty's Government that a modus vivendi, was necessary and their intention to make proposals to the United States Government for such an arrangement was communicated to the Colonial Government telegraphically some days before the United States was informed.

"In the same telegram Newfoundland was asked to give her views of what form the modus vivendi should take, and no proposals were actually made to the United States Government until the reply of Newfoundland was received.

"Throughout Newfoundland was kept fully and promptly advised by the telegraph. His Majesty's Government answered no communications of the United States without first consulting Newfoundland and endeavoring to obtain her concurrence. The note from the United States Ambassador ratifying the arrangement was telegraphed verbatim to the Colonial Government the same day as it was written and received."

Welcome Greenwood.

On Hamar Greenwood's return to the House of Commons yesterday he was cordially greeted by the Premier, Winston Churchill and friends of all parties. Greenwood has the respect of the House because he never pretends to be other than he is, a typical Canadian. Greenwood is now advocating that the Colonial Office always hand out to the colonial press associations an official statement in matters like the recent Newfoundland question.

Suggests Quarantine.

London, Oct. 30.—(C. A. P.)—Cathcart Wason, writing in The Scotsman on Canadian cattle importation, says if the agitators for the repeal of the present law are sincere let them ask for a quarantine the same as is enforced by practically every nation and colony of from forty to sixty days, and pay for it themselves. The farmers of South Ayrshire are not likely to forget the ravages of rinderpest and the foot and mouth disease.

Subject to Ratification.

London, Oct. 30.—(C. A. P.)—The House of Commons informed Mr. Seeley that any agreement arrived at the Berlin wireless telegraphy conference would be subject to ratification by Parliament.

Mr. Borden In Montreal.

Montreal, Oct. 30.—Mr. R. L. Borden M. P., delivered an address here yesterday before the Canadian Club on the "Citizen and the State."

PILES

SUFFERED FOR 23 YEARS—TRIED EVERYTHING WITHOUT AVAIL "PYRAMIDS" DOING THE WORK.

A TRIAL PACKAGE MAILED FREE TO ALL.

The rectum, like the mouth, is lined with that soft, satiny material known as mucous membrane. Piles is a disease of that membrane and the blood vessels that lie under it. Fissure and fistula affect the same membrane and belong to the same family. Pyramid Pile Cure slipped into the bowel, melt and spread themselves over the diseased and painful surface and act just as a salve would if the trouble was on the outside of the body and could be easily seen and gotten at.

The immediate relief they give even in the most agonizing cases will startle you, as it has already startled many thousands of "Doubting Thomases" before you, who have tried everything and sent for the sample package, firmly convinced that they would again be disappointed.

But they weren't. Pyramid Pile Cure don't disappoint. They cure. They are for sale at all druggists' at 50 cents a box and are worth an even hundred to the person who needs them.

"This is to certify that I have used three 50c boxes of Pyramid Pile Cure and it has benefitted me more than any other pile remedy I have ever used. I used the sample which you sent me, together with the three 50c boxes, and I am so much better, but not entirely cured, as my case is one of twenty-three years' standing. I did not expect to be cured all at once, I had almost lost all hope of ever getting any remedy that would help me until I tried Pyramid Pile Cure. I believe they will entirely cure me if I continue their use, which I intend doing so long as I can get the money to pay for them. I do not think any one ever suffered very much more than I have at times. Then I would be so nervous I could not get any ease in any position I could place myself.

I cannot express my gratitude for the good your medicine has done me. I will continue to tell my friends of your merit. Yours, Emma Bodenhamer, Bedford, Ind."

Or if you want to prove this matter at our expense, before purchasing, send your name and address to the Pyramid Drug Co., 56 Pyramid Building, Marshall, Michigan, and receive a trial package free by return mail.

The Council of Dayton have offered $2,000 reward for finding the body.

CARELESSNESS AT THE JAIL.

May Have Helped on the Escape of the Brampton Prisoners.

Toronto, Oct. 30.—Slackness on the part of Brampton jail wardens is understood to be the reported cause of the escape of McDonald and Abbott, awaiting trial on a charge of attempted murder.

Dr. Bruce Smith has conducted an investigation on the circumstances, a report of which has been laid before the Provincial Secretary.

The prisoners climbed over a wall by the help of a pump placed there for the purpose.

Former Orillian Suicides.

Buffalo, Oct. 30.—Charles R. Gray, 48 years old, a writer for journals devoted to horses, committed suicide at the Southern Hotel here yesterday morning. Until a few years ago he had lived in Orillia, Ont. No reason is known for his rash act, and his widow, who, with four children, survive him, said she could not explain why her husband had ended his life.

Two Die In Jail Fire.

Victoria, B. C., Oct. 30.—The Provincial Police Department was advised yesterday of the burning of the Court House and jail at Chilliwack, and the death in the flames of Daniel McKenzie, proprietor of the Dominion Hotel, and K. C. Cousins. The victims are believed to have started the fire. They were immured for drunkenness.

Artemus Douglas Suicides.

Charlottetown, P. E. I., Oct. 30.—The unknown man who drowned himself Friday from the steamer Northumberland, while en route to Picton, is believed to be Artemus Douglas of Stanhope. On Thursday he had his savings in the bank transferred to his brother. He suffered from acute ear trouble.

Standard Oil Fined.

Findlay, Ohio, Oct. 30.—The Standard Oil Co. yesterday afternoon was fined $5,000 and costs for operating in restraint of trade in Ohio.

CONVICTIONS QUASHED.

Six Months in a Jail Too Much For a "Drunk."

Montreal, Oct. 30.—There has been a great jail delivery. Twenty-three drunkards have been let out of the Montreal jail, and a still greater number are to be let out of the Quebec jail.

These men have been released on a writ of certorari, taken out by I. House, advocate, who took the grounds that the recorders had no right to sentence drunkards to such long terms as from six to nine months. The result of these long terms has been an overcrowding of the jails, so that about 50 of the prisoners had to be sent to Quebec.

Mr. House took a test case before His Lordship Judge Taschereau on the 15th inst., and he quashed the judgments given in the drunkenness and loitering cases by the recorders.

The result of the judgment will be far-reaching. Not only will a total of about a hundred drunkards and vagabonds be given their liberty, but this hundred has instructed Mr. House to sue the city, and the suits will be brought for amounts at the rate of $2 a day for each day spent in prison.

THOUSANDS IN A MAD RUSH.

Walker Lake Indian Reservation Thrown Open—A Wild Time.

Thorne, Nevada, Oct. 30.—Early yesterday morning thousands of men were prepared for the dash into the Walker Lake Indian reservation, although the signal for the start was not to be given until noon.

Promptly at 12 o'clock a big charge of dynamite was exploded and the race for gold was on.

Launches, rowboats, automobiles, horses and burros, were used to speed the prospectors to the place where the mineral deposits of the reservation are located.

Charges have been freely made that favoritism is being shown in allowing certain prospectors to enter the forbidden ground and stake out their claims before the signal was given.

Owing to the extent of the territory to be guarded the small force of Indian police have found it impossible to keep the thousands of prospectors in check.

Many of them have evaded the guards and are out of reach.

18 AGREEMENTS SUBMITTED.

Railway Commission Is Getting Business Due to New Act.

Ottawa, Oct. 30.—The Railway Commission is beginning to hear from the Bell Telephone Co., which the Railway Act of last session placed under its jurisdiction. So far eighteen agreements between the Bell Co. and as many independent companies have been submitted for approval.

The points which come for consideration are: (1) The Bell rates; (2) the local companies; (3) the clause which appears in all, restraining the local company from effecting connection with any other local company.

The express companies are working with Mr. Hardwell, the chief traffic officer, in submitting their tariffs to him in anticipation of its assumption of jurisdiction over them at the beginning of the year. So far no complaints have been received as to express rates.

ITS LARGEST CHEQUE.

Province Gets Half a Million From the Gooderham Estate.

Toronto, Oct. 30.—The largest cheque ever received by the Ontario Government for succession dues, and perhaps the largest ever received by the Provincial Treasury, except from other Government sources, came into the possession of Hon. Col. Matheson yesterday.

It was for $519,672.43, and was in payment of the succession dues on the estate of the late George Gooderham.

The cheque was drawn on the Bank of Toronto and signed by W. G. Gooderham, as chairman of the trustees of the estate.

The sum received by the province is percentage collected on a valuation placed on the estate of $10,400,000.

Rossin House, Toronto, Scorched.

Toronto, Oct. 30.—The rear quarters of the Rossin House were scorched early this morning between 12 and 1 o'clock by a fire which originated in the boiler house, presumably about the roof, as it was in the upper stories of this annex which suffered most. The loss on contents will be $2,000 and $3,000 on the building. There was no panic, but many women, guests and help, were excited and left their rooms in any clothing they could find. They were all back in bed again at 2 o'clock.

Miss Sartoris Married.

New York, Oct. 30.—Miss Rosemay Sartoris, daughter of Mrs. Nellie Grant Sartoris, and the late Algernon Charles Frederick Sartoris, and granddaughter of the late Gen. Grant, was married here yesterday at noon to George H. Woolston of Hibernia, Fla. Before the couple return to this city they will probably visit the Sartoris summer home in Cobourg, Ont.

STROUD'S

SHOOTING MEN, NOT ANIMALS.

Victims of the Hunting Season Thus Far In Maine Woods.

Bangor, Me., Oct. 31.—Six men killed is the record thus far in the present hunting season in Maine. Last week was the first of the year, three deaths being reported and scarcely a day passes without the report of one or more accidents due to careless handling of guns or mistaking human beings for animals.

The game receipts are far below those of last year. Up to Saturday 821 deer, 55 moose and 10 bears had been brought in, as against 1,376 deer, 70 moose and 19 bears for the same period last year.

The dry weather has made it difficult to stalk the game.

Fred. Dumontair Gets Also Two Years For Indecent Assault.

St. Catharines, Oct. 31.—Fred. Dumontair, convicted by a jury before Chief Justice Falconbridge of attempted indecent assault on a young girl near the Welland Canal two weeks ago, was sentenced last night.

His Lordship explained, in order to protect girls and women in border counties, it was necessary to inflict heavy penalties, and, despite the protests of M. J. McCarron, counsel for the prisoner, sentenced him to two years, less one day, in Central Prison, and some time within ten days of the expiration of his sentence to receive twelve lashes.

ANGLO-JAP TREATY.

General In Character and Not Likely to Lead to War.

London, Oct. 31.—Replying to a question in the House of Commons by C. W. Bellairs, Liberal, as to whether there was any provision in the Anglo-Japanese treaty safeguarding His Majesty's dominions from becoming involved in a war with America on behalf of Japan, Earl Grey, the Foreign Secretary, wrote a reply in which he referred the questioner to the text of the agreement.

The Foreign Secretary added: "This agreement is of a general character, and there is no indication that it is likely to lead to a war with any power."

Both Sides Are Prepared

Detectives and Strikers Both Bought Arms Before Battle.

Buckingham Strike Inquest Evidence Indicates That Alex. Maclaren Fired Two Shots at Strikers' Leader and That Albert Maclaren Fired the Second Shot--Sixty Witnesses Heard--Much Contradictory Evidence.

Buckingham, Que., Oct. 31.—Over 60 witnesses have been heard in the Buckingham inquest by Coroner McMahon, and the evidence is so contradictory that the jury of eight English and eight Frenchmen will do well to reach a verdict to-day, as there are still some 15 witnesses yet to call.

Yesterday's evidence was very important, several hardware dealers testifying that both the detectives and strikers purchased arms and ammunition, thus showing that trouble was anticipated on both sides.

Detective McCaskill expects to have several arrests to make as a result of the inquest. The prisoners will be taken to Hull, there to await the conclusion of the Laderoute murder trial at Bryson, before receiving their preliminary hearing.

Witnesses Break Down.

Two witnesses broke down this afternoon. One was Louis Couture, who, according to several witnesses, took a prominent part in the riot, and threatened to riddle a man named Dan Louden, who was merely helping a wounded detective.

Mrs. Belanger and Mrs. Therlault, widows of the men on whom the inquest is held, were examined, but they declared that their husbands had no firearms to their knowledge.

The best witness of the day was a 15-year-old lad, Chisholm Pearson, whose direct evidence was so firm that the most difficult cross-examination could not shake it. He told circumstantially that Dr. Roderigue, the local coroner, had covered up the rifles that the strikers were transporting to the scene of the fight. The doctor had denied knowledge of the rifles, while admitting that he rode in the rig they are known to have been in.

Maclaren Fired First Shots.

If Antoine Parisiens' evidence is to be believed, Alex. Maclaren will be charged with shooting Belanger. Parisiens swears that Mr. Maclaren fired the first shot and Albert Maclaren the second.

Mrs. William Baker, a German lady, testified that Robinson Croteau, who boarded with her, asked for his dinner early the day of the strike, saying that he wanted to go home for his gun, because there was going to be bloodshed in the afternoon.

Didn't Get the Gun.

Charlie Johnson told that an old chum Theophile Chenier, wanted to borrow a gun from him that day, saying that he was going to do some shooting in the afternoon. Johnson did not lend his firearm, and did not see Chenier in the riot.

Damase Bourassa related that two union men told him they were going to bring rifles. He saw guns at the strikers' hall.

Damase Bourassa, a striker, swore that the strikers had gathered firearms with the deliberate purpose of using them on the police.

Mr. Hyman Stays Hidden

Mr Hyman, Minister of Public Works, was to have taken charge of the North Bruce campaign. He is not there. In fact he is not visible anywhere. The disclosures of the London election prosecution, showing that Mr. Hyman's seat in the House, like many others won by his party during the last ten years in Ontario, was stolen by fraud and bribery. Mr. Hyman has been advised by members of his own party to resign his seat and thus make some concession to honor and decency. But he is holding on to the property that was stolen for him, and strange to say the Minister of Justice commends him for doing so.

Meanwhile the evidence has gone on accumulating. Down to two days ago over ninety persons had testified to the payment to them of money for their votes, many receiving it personally from Collins, the deputy returning officer who confesses that he examined the ballots to see how they were marked before he paid the money or authorized the payment. The sum paid to forty-eight of these witnesses was $10 each. The same amount was to be paid to twenty-two others, but the sharp paymaster took a personal rake-off, in seventeen cases claiming fifty cents each, and in five cases one dollar each, which he called his commission. A few were paid $5 each, three seem to have received $15 each, one got $8, and one $14.50, allowing fifty cents commission.

An interesting feature of the evidence is the confession of two contractors from Ottawa, who went into the riding to assist. Contractor White says that he paid the expenses of four of the Ottawa boys, one of them a Government employee, and another subsequently appointed to the service, who were present during the hottest part of the campaign. He divided $300 among them to use as might be convenient. These Ottawa delegates, whose expenses were also paid, had been accustomed to work together in elections at home. The contractor who paid their expenses was James White, who also happens to be President of the Ontario Liberal Club. But he is not the only contractor who thought it advisable to assist the Minister of Public Works with advice and money. James A. Corry has had an interesting contract on the St. Joseph's wharf. This structure, which has cost $15,000, though the Government promised to build it for $5,000, stands on an exposed coast of Lake Huron where it can never be used, as it is not accessible by water or easily reached by land. The Liberal member for the county protested when the work started that no one wanted it and that it would be useless. Nevertheless it was pushed on, apparently for the benefit of the contractor, and one other man who has since disappeared.

Mr. Corry, having this contract from the Minister of Public Works, thought that he could not do better than go to London with his pockets full of money to assist that Minister with his bye-election. He admits that he handed $300 to Mr. Reid, who is now charged as a party to the conspiracy.

A third interesting disclosure connects the London conspiracy with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Commission. It was shown that a Toronto firm supplied stationery for the commission, and that when one of the bills was due the amount was promptly sent them with $80 in excess. Shortly afterwards a member of the firm was visited by Mr. O'Gorman, one of the persons now accused, who asked him for the amount overpaid as an election contribution. Mr. O'Gorman as local party organizer seems to have been well informed concerning the Railway Commission finances at Ottawa, which is perhaps accounted for by the fact that one of the commissioners was formerly an active party manager in London. It should also be stated that one of Mr. White's pic-nic party to London is described as a Railway Commission employee, and the contractor Corry, above mentioned, rents to Mr. Hyman's department the offices of the Transcontinental Commission.

Stomach Troubles and Constipation

No one can reasonably hope for good digestion when the bowels are constipated. Mr. Chas Baldwin, of Edwardsville, Ill., says: "I suffered from chronic constipation and stomach troubles for several years but thanks to Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets am almost cured." Why not get a package of these tablets and get well and stay well? Price 25 cents. Sample free. To be had at R. Templeton & Co., drug store.

The St. John, N. B., Telegraph, discussing municipal matters, has this to say, which may be true in other places besides New Brunswick:

> The aldermen deal with matters which touch the people closely. Nowhere can a man make a reputation for horse sense and sincerity more quickly than in the City Council—if he have the right stuff in him. For failure to make such a reputation he should blame himself rather than a discriminating public and the newspapers which represent it.

• • •

In regard to the above it may again be wondered why there is such a dearth of candidates for the City Council in this city. The title of alderman is an ancient and honorable one, which should be aspired to by every man with the proper qualifications. The fact of being elected to the City Council shows that a man is a little above the common herd, and in thousands of cases it has been the stepping stone to political preferment. What ails the bright young business men of this city? Have they lost respect for the old traditions, or are they so selfish as to wish to always try to shoulder their duties on to somebody else?

• • •

Belleville is going ahead, and if ever there was a time in the city's history when citizens at large should take an intelligent interest in municipal affairs it is now. Two months from to-day will be nomination day. Are we going to see the office going out with a lantern to seek the man again? as has been the case in recent years. There must be some new faces in the Council next year. Why not have the best men in our city?

What Canadian Delegates Did.

ONLY ONE STRUCK RIGHT NOTE, SAYS PRESIDENT OF MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

London, October 30.—At the quarterly meeting of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, the president, Mr. E. H. Langdon, referring to the meeting of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire in London, said that notwithstanding the efforts of the Lancashire and large Indian Chambers, and the carefully prepared arguments of the Manchester vice-president, and the well-worded protests of the Bombay delegate, Mr. Armstrong, the Canadian delegates were enabled to carry their resolution: "Urging His Majesty's Governments, both home and of the colonies, to grant preferential treatment in respective markets on a reciprocal basis, etc."

"We were beaten on a vote by the Chambers by 105 to 41, but the neutrals included such Chambers as those of London, Birmingham, Cardiff, Leeds and Sydney, while others did not answer their names.

"The earnestness and enthusiasm of our Canadian friends inspire the greatest admiration, as it was marvellous how eloquently they dwelt on the unknown potentiality of their soil, forgetting that we largely import our food from other countries, and that imports from any one country, be it colony or foreign state are uncertain, and that the wider the area this country obtained its food from the better it was for the country.

"In none of the speeches of the Canadian delegates was there any indication that Canada would receive our manufactures duty free, or at least with such a rate of duties as would permit our obtaining a foothold in their markets.

"One and only one of the Canadians struck the right note when he said no practical solution of the fiscal question could be determined until they had absolute free trade between the colonies and the entire Empire.

"My opinion is that free trade within the Empire may be an ideal goal, but the difficulties for a general and equal arrangement are too stupendous to be overcome."

The resolution referred to was that introduced by Mr. R. J. Graham, President, and Mr. W. N. Ponton, Vice-President of the Belleville Board of Trade, advocating, however, not merely free trade within the Empire, but also (reference to which is omitted above) protection against the rest of the world.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

CHARLEY'S AUNT.

As usual "Charley's Aunt," Wilfrid North's very amusing comedy, drew a large and representative audience to the Carman opera house last night. It is safe to say that the audience were well pleased with the performance, all the actors and actresses being well up in their roles. "Charley's Aunt," with Etienne Girardot in the title role, certainly has a tendency to brush away the cobwebs from a tired brain.

"THE MAN OF HER CHOICE."

Can you imagine two men in a death struggle—one, dagger in hand, the other trying to maintain possession of a package of bonds for which he has risked his life and at the same time defend that life so precious to the one he loves—struggling with might and main in the swiftly raging torrents of the East River at a point where it flows with mighty fury around the jagged rocks of Hell Gate? Well, such a scene is actually enacted in the season's biggest melodramatic hit, "The Man of Her Choice," written and produced by Edw. W. Simmonds. Do not allow anything to interfere with your seeing this play at the Carman on Friday night, as the above described scene is but one of the many that is impossible to describe. Remember, it's a Broadway production at popular prices.

"GIRLS WILL BE GIRLS."

"Girls Will be Girls" will appear at the Carman next Saturday. "Girls Will be Girls" is a musical farce with a plont. An excellent company is headed by Al. Leech, whose eccentricities are well known, and he is reinforced by the Three Rosebuds, Maude Gray, Charlotte Towle and Lily Hart. The possibilities for fun in a play which places Al. Leech at the head of 30 pretty girls as Professor of the Rural Academy are apparent when one remembers the fun that he produces when his class only numbered the Three Rosebuds.

What Part ?

What particular part of the nerve-centres should we expect to have the greatest influence in affecting and controlling the general nervous system?

Reasonably it would be the largest and most sensitive. Well now, of all the centres in the nervous system, the largest most delicate sense, the sense most constantly in use, the largest brain "gray-matter" area is that of SIGHT.

For an average of 16 hours daily continuously, the feeling in the visual centres is constant. No other sense in the nerve centres is capable of such continued endurance.

With the proper glasses this severe drain upon the brain and nerves is prevented from causing a breakdown in the general health.

THE NIGHT OF ALL HALLOWS.

THIS EVENING IS THE ONE MYSTERIOUS NIGHT OF THE YEAR —SOME OF THE TRADITIONS IN REGARD TO IT.

"Have you bought your false-face for to-night?"

This was the question that the small boys were asking to-day. Hallowe'en is a night that is never forgotten with the young folks, and the false-faces, all shapes and sizes, which have been displayed in the stores for the past few days, have been eagerly sought for. A large number of girls, as well as boys were to be seen yesterday, coming out of the stores with a false face. To-night will certainly be a big night with the little ones, and from all accounts some of the grown-up people too will be out to take part in the "doings" of this mysterious night of the year.

Hallowe'en is the one night in all the year upon which usually some people may without fear of having their sanity questioned resort to all kinds of tricks and pastimes.

Hallowe'en has, of course, lost much of its old-time rowdyism. In Belleville there will no doubt be parties, but the evening will be tame to what it was in the years gone by. On previous Hallowe'ens over-joyous individuals have approached criminal practices in the tearing up of walks, boulevards, tie-posts and the like, with the natural consequence that the police now make it a point to punish those who deliberately destroy the property of unoffending citizens.

The police will be on the job to-night and all guilty parties will be taken to the lock-up. An old saying 'have all the fun you want, but don't get gay," will be the password with the police on Hallowe'en. A word to the wise is sufficient.

AN OLD FESTIVAL.

This same order of festival was celebrated, about the same period of the year, by the Hindoos, the Egyptians, the Mexicans, the Peruvians, the Persians, the Japanese, the Druids and even by the savages inhabiting Australia and the Pacific Island groups. By all some superstitious or uncanny idea was associated with the festival. Some connected the festival with a great calamity which befell the human race, and it was thought that annually on that night the spirits of those who perished were set free to visit the earth. By others the Egyptians and Mexicans for instance — it was associated with the Pleiades. On occasion of the festival the Egyptians placed the image of Osiris in a sacred coffer or ark, launched it out to sea, and then watched till it was borne out of sight. The Mexicans, again, in ancient times thought by the festival to commemorate a flood which destroyed the earth and they offered up a human sacrifice to avert the recurrence of the calamity. For a somewhat similar reason the festival was called in Persia and Peru "the feast of the dead."

The manner in which the ancient Druids observed the festival was really terrible. Their nuns were obliged annually to pull down and rebuild the roof of their temple, as a symbol of the destruction and renovation of the world, and if in doing so any one of them let fall her sacred burden of material for the new roof, her companions in fanatic transport seized her and tore her to pieces. Scarcely a year passed without there being one or more victims. At this festival, too, the Druids extinguished the sacred fire which was kept burning continuously during the rest of the year within the precincts of the temple. This was, in fact, a signal for all the fires in the island to be put out, so that a primitive night might reign.

The intense itching characteristic of salt rheum and eczema is instantly allayed by applying Chamberlain's Salve. As a cure for skin diseases this salve is unequalled. To be had at R. Templeton & Co's drug store.

Wicked Chicago!

Chicago, Oct. 28.—The traffic in children said to be carried on by certain private institutions in Chicago was exposed yesterday at the state conference of charities by Rev. Charles Virden, Governor Deneen's former pastor and chairman of the committee on child visitation.

"These institutions," he said "usually are conducted by quack doctors. The babies taken into these places are poorly cared for and starved. The proprietor often purchases children that the parents do not want at $25 a head. The parents relinquish all claims on the child, who afterwards is placed out as a common drudge or slaver.

"Such hospitals sometimes do a different kind of work. I have seen vats of quicklime in these institutions. The proprietors will explain that the quicklime is used for sanitary purposes, but you and I know what they are for. Such vats are sufficient evidence to tie a rope around a man's neck or to send him to the penitentiary for life."

Dr. Canniff Writes

RE AN ARTICLE WHICH LATELY APPEARED IN DIFFERENT NEWSPAPERS.

To the Editor of the Hamilton Times:

Sir,—In your issue of the 8th inst. is an article concerning the name of the Bay of Quinte. Unable before to write, I now wish to inform you that said article is taken word for word from Canniff's "Settlement of Upper Canada," pages 373-76-77, which I dare say the editor of Notes and Queries in Montreal Star would readily acknowledge if aware of the fact. It is stated the communication was received from Mr. A. G. Parker, of the Bank of Montreal, Hamilton, who says he procured the extracts from a book owned by Mr. Arthur McGinnis, "the one antiquarian of Belleville, the one only man there to speak on the subject." Strangely, the name of the book is not given, and, equally strange, it is added that Dr. William Canniff believed in Kente. More than one person has the work and has some claim to a knowledge of the antiquities of the Bay of Quinte region, but does not pose as "the one only antiquarian" of the place. I may say that the facts contained in the extract were laboriously collected by myself, and when visiting Paris I made researches in the Imperial Library and learned facts, which, added to those obtained in Canada, enabled me to fully establish the origin of the name, "Bay of Quinte," originally pronounced "Bay Canty." Will you kindly insert this note and much oblige. Yours respectfully,

WM. CANNIFF.

THE YOUNG WIDOW.

(Philadelphia Bulletin.)

She is modest, but not bashful;
Free and easy, but not bold;
Like an apple—ripe and mellow;
Not too young, and not too old;
Half inviting, half repulsing,
Now advancing, and now shy;
There is mischief in her dimple,
There is danger in her eye.

She has studied human nature;
She is schooled in all her arts;
She has taken her diploma
As the mistress of all hearts;
She can tell the very moment
When to sigh and when to smile;
O, a maid is sometimes charming,
But the widow all the while!

Are you sad? how very serious
Will her handsome face become;
Are you angry? she is wretched,
Lonely, friendless, tearful, dumb,
Are you mirthful? how her laughter,
Silver sounding, will ring out;
She can lure, and catch, and play you
As the angler does the trout.

You old bachelors of forty,
Who have grown so bold and wise,
Young Americans of twenty,
With the love-locks in your eyes.
You may practice all your lessons,
Taught by Cupid since the fall,
But I know a little widow
Who could win and fool you all.

To the question, Why, if the Jews are so badly treated in Russia, do they not all leave Russia? the answer is now made: They are going away as fast as possible. They are going not merely by the thousands but by the hundred thousands, and the prospect is that the Hebrew population of that most Christian country will be reduced to small proportions within the next five years. Millions of these Russian Hebrews are coming to the United States, and it will not be strange if in 1910 the Jewish population of New York shall exceed one million persons.

The result, also, may justify the President's action, Mr. Hearst, the Democratic - Independence League candidate, is receiving many evidences of popular favor; but there is proof also of a strong drift of quiet opinion against him that makes it unlikely he will ever fill the office he aspires to.

BRITISH FLOUR TRADE.

Ottawa, Oct. 30.—Canada's commercial trade agent in Leeds says that Canadian flour is making great inroads in the milling business of Great Britain.

For the first nine months of 1905 the imports were 847,000 hundredweights, and the same time this year they were increased to 1,520,000 hundredweights.

It looks, says the agent, as if Canada were to capture this trade.

CATTLE MARKETS.

TORONTO LIVE STOCK.

Toronto, Oct. 30.—Receipts of live stock at the City Market were 81 carloads, composed of 1325 cattle, 1200 hogs, 1795 sheep and lambs, with 96 calves.

Exporters.

The export trade is simply dead, as there is no shipping space of any account to be had before the 1st of December. There were six or seven loads of light export cattle on the market to-day, for which there was no sale, and they are there yet, unsold, no person seemingly wanting them.

Butchers.

Few good butchers were to be had. These sold readily and more were wanted. Prices for these few sold at from $4.12½ to $4.50, and one lot of 11 were sold by McDonald & Maybee at $4.60; medium to good lots sold at from $3.60 to $3.90; good cows and lightweight heifers of good quality sold at $3 to $3.60; common and canners, of which there were far too many, sold at from $1 to $1.50 and $2.25 per cwt.

Feeders and Stockers.

Harry Murby reports the market draggy, and too many of the ill-bred, ill-fed, coming forward. Six or seven loads of this kind were offered to-day, the bulk of which were unsold at the close of the market. Mr. Murby stated that all classes of feeders were off in price, and gave the following quotations for the best in each class: Choice, well-bred short-keeps, of which there were few offered, would be worth about $3.90 to $4 per cwt. for cattle weighing 1150 to 1250 lbs.; best steers, 1000 to 1100 lbs., $3.60 to $3.85; best steers, 900 to 1000 lbs., $3.25 to $3.60; best steers, 800 to 900 lbs., $3 to $3.25; stockers of medium quality, $2.40 to $2.75; common stockers, $2 to $2.15 per cwt.

Milch Cows.

Few were offered, for which there was ready sale at $35 to $57 each.

Veal Calves.

Deliveries were not large, and prices ranged all the way from $3.50 to $7 per cwt., the bulk selling at $4.50 to $6.50 per cwt. Prime new milk fed calves are wanted, and would sell readily at $7 per cwt.; but we only heard of one of this class on the market to-day.

Sheep and Lambs.

There was a fair delivery—about 1800—which sold at firm prices. Export ewes sold at $4.50 to $4.85 per cwt.; lambs at $5.50 to $6.25, the bulk going at about $6 per cwt.

Hogs.

Mr. Harris reported having got 1200, of which 500 came in late in the day. Prices were cut down again, and $5.75 is now the top price for selects, with $5.50 for lights and fats.

"Grand Peninsular"
Is an Ornament to the Home.

Popular taste no longer clings to deeply carved, highly ornamental ranges.

People now want rich, yet simple, elegance.

That is the way I make my new Grand Peninsular Range.

The "Grand Peninsular" is easy to keep clean, because there are no deep carvings to collect the dust and dirt. The design is simple but very effective. No fuss or frills. Just smooth surfaces which take a beautiful bright polish. The nickelled castings are detachable, and can be lifted off without loosening a bolt, when the range is to be brushed or cleaned.

Then there is the ALL-STEEL OVEN—the THERMOMETER on the oven door—extra large GRATE BARS—and a dozen other time-and-labor-savings conveniences—that are exclusive with my GRAND PENINSULAR. Have your dealer show you all these points. 42

He was surprised at how the sores healed—"I took your New Method Treatment for a serious blood disease with which I had been afflicted for twelve years. I had consulted a score of physicians, taken all kinds of blood medicine, visited Hot Springs and other mineral water resorts, but only got temporary relief. They would help me for a time, but after discontinuing the medicines the symptoms would break out again—running sores, blotches, rheumatic pains, looseness of the hair, swellings of the glands, palms of the hands scaling, itchiness of the skin, dyspeptic stomach, etc. I had given up in despair when a friend advised me to consult you, as you had cured him of a similar disease 8 years ago. I had no hope, but took his advice. In three weeks' time the sores commenced to heal up and I became encouraged. I continued the New Method Treatment for four months and at the end of that time every symptom had disappeared I was cured 7 years ago and no signs of any disease since. My boy, three years old, is sound and healthy. I certainly can recommend your treatment with all my heart. You can refer any person to me privately, but you can use this testimonial as you wish." W. Chris shot Littimer an imploring glance. Merritt grinned in friendly fashion. Bell, in his tactful way, piloted the strange guest to the library before Littimer and Chris had reached the hall. The former polished his eyeglass and regarded Chris critically.

"My dear young lady," he said smoothly, "originality is a passion with me, eccentricity draws me as a magnet; but as yet I have refrained from sitting down to table with ticket-of-leave men. Your friend has 'convict' writ large upon his face."

"He has been in gaol, of course," Chris admitted, cheerfully.

"Then let me prophesy, and declare that he will be in gaol again. Why bring him here?"

"Because it is absolutely necessary," Chris said, boldly. "That man can help me—help us, Lord Littimer. I am not altogether what I seem. There is a scoundrel in your house compared with whom James Merritt is an innocent child. That scoundrel has blighted your life and lives of your family; he has blighted my life for years. And I am here to expose him, and I am here to right the wrong and bring back the lost happiness of us all. I cannot say more, but I implore you to let me have my own way in this matter."

"Oh!" Littimer said, darkly, "so you are masquerading here?"

"I am. I admit it. Turn me out if you like: refuse to be a party to my scheme. You may think badly of me now, probably you will think worse of me later on. But I swear to you that I am acting with the best and purest motives, and in your interest as much as my own."

"Then you are not entitled even to the name you bear?"

"No, I admit it freely. Consider, I need not have told you anything. Things cannot be any worse than they are. Let me try and make them better. Will you, will you trust me?"

Chris's voice quivered, there were tears in her eyes. With a sudden impulse Littimer laid his hands upon her shoulders and looked long and searchingly into her eyes.

"Very well," he said, with a gentle sigh. "I will trust you. As a matter of fact, I have felt that I could trust you from the first. I won't pry into your schemes, because if they are successful I shall benefit by them. And if you like to bring a carload of convicts down here, pray do so. It will only puzzle the neighbors, and drive them mad with curiosity, and I love that."

"And you'll back me up in all I say and do?" Chris asked.

"Certainly I will. On the whole, I fancy I am going to have a pleasant evening. I don't think dear Reginald will be pleased to see his friend at dinner. If any of the spoons are missing I shall hold you responsible."

Chris went off to her room well pleased with the turn of events. Brilliant audacity had succeeded where timid policy might have resulted in dismal failure. And Littimer had refrained from asking any awkward questions. From the window she could see Bell and Merritt walking up and down the terrace, the latter talking volubly, and worrying at a big cigar as a dog might nuzzle at a bone. Chris saw Littimer join the other two presently and fall in with their conversation. His laugh came to the girl's ear more than once. It was quite evident that the eccentric nobleman was enjoying the ex-convict's society. But Littimer had never been fettered by conventional rules.

The dog-cart came up presently and Henson got out. He had an anxious, worried look; there was an ugly frown between his brows. He contrived to be polite as Chris emerged. He wanted to know where Littimer was.

"On the terrace, I fancy," Chris said, demurely. "I guess he is having a long chat with that parson friend of yours—the brand plucked from the burning, you know."

"Merritt," Henson said, hoarsely. "Do you mean to say that Merritt is here? And I've been looking for—I mean, I have been into Moreton Wells. Why did he come?"

Chris opened her eyes in innocent surprise.

"Why," she said, "I fetched him. I'm deeply interested in brands of that kind."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Henson forced a smile to his face and a hand from his side as he approached Merritt and the rest. It was not until the two found themselves alone that the mask was dropped.

"You infernally insolent scoundrel," Henson said, between his teeth. "How dare you come here? You've done your work for the present, and the sooner you go back to your kennel in London the better. If I imagined that you meant any harm I'd crush you altogether."

"I didn't come on my own," Merritt whined. "So keep your 'air on. That young lady came and fetched me—regular gone on me, she is. And there's to be high jinks 'ere—a bazaar for the benefit of pore criminals as can't get no work to do. You 'eard what his lordship said. And I'm goin' to make a speech, like as I used to gull the chaplains. Lor', it's funny, ain't it?"

Henson failed to see the humor of the situation. He was uneasy and suspicious. Moreover, he was puzzled by this American girl, and he hated to be puzzled. She had social aspirations, of course; she cared nothing for decayed or reformed criminals, and this silly bazaar was only designed so that the ambitious girl could find her way into the country set. Then she would choose a husband, and nothing more would be heard of Merritt and Co. Henson had a vague notion that all American girls are on the look-out for English husbands of the titled order.

"Littimer must be mad," he muttered. "I can't understand Littimer; I can't understand anything. Which reminds me that I have a crow to pluck with you. Why didn't you do as I told you last night?"

"Did," said Merritt, curtly. "Got the picture and took it home with me."

"You liar! The picture is in the corridor at the present time."

"Liar yourself! I've got the picture on my mantel-shelf in my sitting-room rolled up as you told me to roll it up and tied with a piece of cotton. It was your own idea as the thing was to be left about casual-like as being less calculated to excite suspicion. And there it is at the present moment, and I'll take my hoath to it."

Henson fairly gasped. He had been inside that said sitting-room not two hours before, and he had not failed to notice a roll of paper on the mantel-shelf. And obviously Merritt was telling the truth. And equally obviously the Rembrandt was hanging in the corridor at the present moment. Henson had solved and evolved many ingenious puzzles in his time, but this one was utterly beyond him.

"Some trick of Dr. Bell's, perhaps," Merritt suggested.

"Bell suspects nothing. He is absolutely friendly to me. He could not disguise his feelings like that. Upon my word I was never so utterly at sea before in all my life. And as for Littimer, why, he has just made a fresh will more in my favor than the old one. But I'll find out, I'll get to the bottom of this business if it costs me a fortune."

He frowned moodily at his boots; he turned the thing over in his mind until his brain was dazed and muddled. The Rembrandt had been stolen, and yet there was the Rembrandt in its place. Was anything more amazing and puzzling? And nobody else seemed in the least troubled about it. Henson was more than puzzled; deep down in his heart he was frightened.

"I must keep my eyes open," he said. "I must watch night and day. Do you suppose Miss Lee noticed anything when she called to-day?"

"Not a bit of it," said Merritt, confidently. "She came to see me; she had no eyes for anybody but your humble servant. Where did she get my address from? Why, didn't you introduce me to the lady yourself, and didn't I tell her I was staying at Moreton Wells for a time? I'm goin' to live in clover for a bit, my pippin. Cigars and champagne, wine and all the rest of it."

"I wish you were at the bottom of the sea before you came here," Henson growled. "You mind and be careful what you're doing with the champagne. They don't drink by the tumbler in the society you are in now, remember. Just one or two glasses and no more. If you take too much and let your tongue run you will find your stay here pretty short."

Apparently the hint was not lost on Merritt, for dinner found him in a chastened mood. His natural audacity was depressed by the splendor and luxury around him; the moral atmosphere held him down. There were so many knives and forks and glasses on the table, such a deal of food that was absolutely strange to him. The butler behind made him shiver. Hitherto in Merritt's investigations into great houses he had fought particularly shy of butlers and coachmen and upper servants of that kind. The butler's sniff and his cold suggestion as to hock slightly raised Merritt's combative spirit. And the champagne was poor, thin stuff after all. A jorum of gin and water, or a mug of beer, was what Merritt's soul longed for.

And what a lot of plate there was on the table and sideboard! Some of it was gold, too. Merritt's greedy professional eye appraised the collection at some hundreds of pounds—hundreds of pounds—that is, after the stuff had been disposed of. In imagination he had already drugged the butler and was stuffing the plate into his bag.

Henson said very little. He was too busily engaged in watching his confederate. He wished from the bottom of his heart now that Chris had never seen Merritt. She was smiling at him now and apparently hanging on every word. Henson had seen society ladies doing this kind of thing before with well-concealed contempt. So long as people liked to play his game for him he had no objection. But this was quite different. Merritt had warmed a little under the influence of his fifth glass of champagne, but his eye looked lovingly and longingly in the direction of a silver spirit-stand on the sideboard.

The dinner came to an end at length, to Henson's great relief, and presently the whole party wandered out to the terrace. Bell dropped behind with Chris.

VANITY

From time immemorial moralists have railed at the vanity of woman. Here is a woman, and a beautiful one at that, who says that vanity is an imperishable instinct; that vanity, like love, is one of the great forces that makes the world go round; that to be vain is a duty to humanity and an essential of success.

It's an original view; what is your opinion? This defense of an old time sin is set forth in our new magazine—

THE FRANK A. MUNSEY CO., New York

"Now is your time," he whispered. "Henson dare not lose sight of Merritt before he goes to bed, and I'll keep the latter out here for a good long spell. I've muffled the striker of the telephone so that the bell will make no noise when you get your call back from Brighton, so that you must be near enough to the instrument to hear the click of the striker. Make haste."

Chris dropped back to the library and rapidly fluttered over the leaves of the "Telephone Directory." She found what she wanted at length and asked to be put on to Brighton. Then she sat down in an armchair in the darkness close under the telephone, prepared to wait patiently. She could just see the men on the terrace, could catch the dull glow red of their cigars.

Her patience was not unduly tried. At the end of a quarter of an hour the striker clicked furiously Chris reached for the receiver and lay back comfortably in her chair with the diaphragm to her ear. "Are you there?" she asked, quietly. "Is that you, Mr. Steel?"

To her great relief the answering voice was Steel's own. He seemed to be a little puzzled as to who his questioner was.

"Can't you guess?" Chris replied. "This is not the first time I have had you called. You have not forgotten 218, Brunswick Square, yet?"

Chris smiled as he heard Steel's sudden exclamation.

"So you are my fair friend whom I saw in the dark?" he said. "Yes, I recognize your voice now. You are Miss Chris—well, I won't mention the name aloud, because people might ask what a well-regulated corpse meant by rousing respectable people up at midnight. I hope you are not going to get me into trouble again."

"No, but I am going to ask your advice and assistance. I want you to be so good as to give me the plot of a story after I have told you the details. And you are to scheme the thing out at once, please, because delay is dangerous. Dr. Bell——"

"What's that? Will you tell me where you are speaking from?"

"I am at present located at Littimer Castle. Yes, Dr. Bell is here. Do you want him?"

"I should think so," Steel exclaimed "Please tell him at once that the man who was found here half dead—you know the man I mean—got up and dressed himself in the absence of the nurse and walked out of the hospital this morning. Since then he has not been seen or heard of. I have been looking up Bell everywhere. Will you tell him this at once? I'll go into your matter afterwards. Don't be afraid; I'll tell the telephone people not to cut us off till I ring. Please go at once."

The voice was urgent, not to say imperative. Chris dropped the receiver into its space and crept into the darkness of the terrace.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Bell seemed to know by intuition that Chris required him, or perhaps he caught a glimpse of her white dress from the terrace. Anyway, he strolled leisurely in her direction.

"Something has happened?" he whispered, as he came up.

"Well, yes," Chris replied, "though I should like to know how you guessed that. I had no difficulty in getting Mr. Steel on the telephone, but he would say nothing directly he heard that you were here beyond a peremptory request that you were to be told at once that Van Sneck has gone."

"Gone!" Bell echoed, blankly. "What do you mean by that?"

"He has disappeared from the hospital at Brighton to-day. Mr. Steel thinks they were extra busy, or something of that kind. Anyway, Van Sneck got up and dressed himself and left the hospital without being observed. It seems extraordinary to me."

"And yet quite possible," Bell said, thoughtfully. "Van Sneck had practically recovered from the flesh wounds; it was the injury to his head that was the worst part. He resembled an irresponsible lunatic more than anything else. Steel wants me, of course?"

"He suggests that you should go down to Brighton without delay."

"All right, I'll make some excuse to take the first train in the morning. We've got a fine start of Henson, and that's a good thing. If Van Sneck comes within his net we shall have a deal of trouble. I had hoped to get permission to operate on Van Sneck, and relied upon him to solve the mystery. And now you had better go back to your telephone."

Chris hurried back again. A whispered word satisfied her that Steel was still at the other end.

"Dr. Bell starts as early as possible to-morrow," she said. "If you will listen carefully I will give you a brief outline of all that has happened since I have been here."

Chris proceeded to tell her story succinctly and briefly. From little sounds and signs she could tell that Steel was greatly interested. The story of the man with the thumb fascinated him. It appealed to his professional instincts.

"And what do you want to do with him?" Steel asked.

"Well, you see, I have him in my power," Chris explained. "We can get the other Rembrandt any time we like now, but that is quite a minor consideration. What I want is for Merritt to know that I can have him arrested at any time for stealing my star. It's Enid's star, as a matter of fact; but that is a detail."

"An important one, surely," Steel's voice came thin and clear. "Suppose that our dear friend chances to recognize it? . . . No, don't ring off yet."

"I'm not. Oh, you are speaking to the Exchange people. . . . Yes, yes; we shall be a long time yet. . . . Are you there? Well, Henson has never seen the star. Enid bought it just before the great trouble came, and afterwards she never had the heart to wear it."

"I understand. You want Merritt to know this?"

"Well, I do and I don't," Chris explained. "I am anxious not to frighten the man. I want to get him in my power, and I want to prove to him that it would be to his advantage for him to come over to my side. Suppose that Enid gave it out that the star had been stolen? And suppose that I could save him at the critical moment? I shouldn't mind him thinking that I had stolen the star in the first place. That is why I am asking you as a novelist to help me."

"You would have made an excellent novelist yourself," David said, admiringly. "Give me five minutes. . . . Are you there? I fancy I have it. Can't you hear me? That's better. I'll see Miss Gates the first thing in the morning and get her to go over to Longdean and see you sister. . . . Confound it, don't cut us off yet. What does it matter so long as the messages are paid for? Nobody else wants the line. Well, I may for an hour more. . . . Are you there? Very sorry; it's the fault of the Post Office people. Here is the plot in a nutshell. Your sister has lost a diamond star. She gives a minute description of it to the police, and drops a hint to the effect that she believes it was taken away by mistake—in other words, was stolen—from her in London by a chance acquaintance called Christabel Lee——"

"Ah," Chris cried, "how clever you are!"

"I have long suspected it," the thin voice went on, drily. "The full description of the star will be printed in the Police Gazette, a copy of which every respectable pawnbroken always gets regularly. I suppose the people where the star was pawned are respectable?"

"Highly so. They have quite a Bond Street establishment attached."

"So much the better. They will see the advertisement, and they will communicate with the police. The Reverend James Merritt will be arrested——"

"I don't quite like that," Chris suggested.

Oh, it's necessary. He will be arrested at the castle. Knowing his antecedents, the police will not stand upon any ceremony with him. You will be filled with remorse. You have plunged back into a career of crime again a being who was slowly climbing into the straight path once more. You take the blame upon yourself—it was at your instigation that Merritt pawned the star."

"But, really, Mr. Steel——"

"Oh, I know. But the end justifies the means. You save Mr. Merritt, there is a bond of sympathy between you, he will regard you as a great light in his interesting profession. You saved him because you had appropriated the star yourself."

"And go to gaol instead of Mr. Merritt?"

"Not a bit of it. The star you deemed to be yours. You had one very like it when you saw Miss Henson, when you were staying in London at the same hotel. By some means the jewels got mixed. You are confident that an exchange has been made. Also you are confident that if Miss Henson will

You have No Reason for Not Using
Zutoo

Some people think that all headache cures are alike—that they all undermine the health, even if not perceived at the time of taking them.

Well, we'll admit that the drug cures do this, but that is no reason why you should not take Zutoo.

Zutoo is a harmless vegetable remedy. One ingredient is soda—just old-fashioned soda that our grandmothers used to take to settle the stomach, when they had sick headache. And there is nothing better.

The principal ingredient—the one that stops the headache, is a vegetable ingredient, imported for us from Japan. It won't hurt you any more than will the soda.

There is absolutely no reason why you should not use Zutoo.

If you suffer from headache there is every reason why you should.

Taken in time, two tablets will ward off a headache. Taken later, they will stop it in twenty minutes, and leave you feeling good every time.

If you are using a drug remedy, why not discard it?

Zutoo will cure just as quickly and will save you the penalty, that all must sometime pay, who take the drugs which these cures contain.

If you will give Zutoo one trial, you will never take any other headache remedy again.

Literary Notes

HEARST'S POTENT ORGANIZATION.

It is to be remembered that Hearstism has not only a chain of powerful newspapers ably manned to carry on its propaganda, but has behind it the colossal fortune left by the father of the prophet of this new dispensation. Hearstism, in short, has been developed into a great organization put into corporate form, taking advantage for its own purposes of all those opportunities afforded by American corporation law which Hearstism so constantly and so bitterly denounces, and organized in such a way that it could proceed upon its career of influence and power, even if its titular chief were absent in person for a long time—just as Standard Oil, for example, has long been able to dispense with the immediate personal control of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, notwithstanding the common opinion to the contrary. Thus it is very plain that Mr. Hearst has not come before the American people as a candidate for high office by usual or familiar means. In the present campaign he has changed his methods and has appeared constantly as a speaker before public gatherings throughout the State. So brief an experience on the platform could not be expected to make an orator of him, but it is to be said that he has faced the public with far greater freedom and frankness, and also with greater effectiveness than those who thought they knew him had expected. If he should win, he would have emerged from the movement which his name stands for as a distinct personality and a great political force. If he should be soundly defeated in this election, Hearstism would still remain a strong and potent "going concern" in journalism and American public life; but William R. Hearst himself as a political personality and a possible holder of high governmental position, would have fallen again below the horizon line, there to remain.—From "The Progress of the World," in the American Monthly Review of Reviews for November.

2,000 YEARS IN TABLEAUX.

More Than One Thousand Players Take Part in Great Historical Pageant at Warwick Castle.

A pageant which can only be compared in point of magnificence and historical interest to the "Passion Play" at Oberammergau has just been enacted in England. There, on the green of Warwick Castle, whose like is not to be found in the Midlands, the story of 2,000 years was told in tableaux. More than a thousand players, many of them great nobles, took part in the dramatic story, and from all parts of the world came visitors to witness the unparalleled scenes. From Australia and the United States 14 of the younger members of the great Warwick family were present and were a feature of the final spectacle, when the pageant was brought up to date and blended in the everyday life about the players.

Historical Moving Pictures.

The central figures in the pageant were the town and Castle of Warwick, and the idea was to re-enact scenes in which they had appeared, thus presenting what might be called historical moving pictures. One can well imagine how impressive must have been the scene, since the mere reading of an account of the pageant is like taking a special course in English history. Into 11 episodes have the designers of the fete divided the story of Warwick for the purposes of dramatic entertainment. The first three deal with the semi-historical phases, dating back to the Roman invasion, B. C. 55. At this early date Warwick ("the fortified town") was in existence, Kymbeline, a King of the Britons (Shakespeare's "Cymbeline"), and his son Caractacus figured prominently in the first episode, and the dawning of Christianity was represented.

The Bear and the Staff.

The second was devoted to the legendary wars of the first Earls of Warwick—Gwar, Arthal and Marvid. Arth, or Arthal, was the first Earl of the line, and from him and Marvid are derived the "bear and the ragged staff," that are to be seen on the Warwick coat-of-arms to-day. The bear is derived from Arth, meaning bear, and the ragged staff is the result of a terrific encounter Marvid had with a giant, armed with an uprooted tree. The third scene was dedicated to a display of the deeds of Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred the Great and wife of one of the Earls of Mercia, who won back the Midlands from the pagans. To her memory now stands a mound, or keep, erected 1,500 years ago in Warwick Castle.

Famous Earls of Warwick.

The centre of the fourth tableau was Guy, an Earl of Warwick, who helped redeem England from the Danes, slew a gigantic boar at Windsor, the deer-cow of Dunsmore, and a Northumberland dragon, crowning all these exploits by retiring to a cave, where he lived the life of a hermit and at last died. This cave may still be seen, about a mile distant from the castle at Guy's Cliffe, the seat of the Percys. Episodes five and six concerned the pious and foolish deeds of Roger, the second Norman Earl of Warwick, and Piers Gaveston, the friend of Edward II. The seventh scene introduces the greatest of the Warwicks, the Kingmaker. In the famous Wars of the Roses this earl dominated the situation, making first Lancaster King and then York, as best suited his pleasure. He was depicted as a man of remarkable craft, but of great courage and perseverance.

In Tudor Times.

Henry VIII. was introduced in the eighth episode, for he granted a charter to the town and school at Warwick. The latter had been established at an earlier period, but Henry VIII. freed it from clerical control and ordered that thereafter it should provide education free of charge to the Warwick children. Lady Jane Grey, the victim of the plottings of John Dudley, Earl of Warwick and Duke of Northumberland, was the heroine of the ninth episode, and this we can imagine to have been one of the most moving spectacles in the pageant. It was followed by the Elizabethan episode, in which Robert of Leicester figured as the Queen's favorite. Robert was a Dudley, a younger brother of Lady Grey's husband, and a son of John Dudley, Earl of Warwick and Duke of Northumberland. Elizabeth, as a sign of her favor to Leicester, created his brother, Ambrose, Earl of Warwick. After his death most of the property reverted to the Crown, and rested there until bestowed again by James I.

The Fatal Celebration.

The present earl derives his connection with the house back to the time when Sir Foulke Greville obtained the castle in fee and made of it the place of strength and beauty it is to-day. The final spectacle portrayed the ill-omened entertainment given to William III. by Lord Brooke, at Warwick. On this occasion there was a gigantic bonfire made in the court and 120 gallons of punch were consumed by hosts and guests. A combination of intoxicated revelers and unheeded fire resulted in the burning down of most of the town and the destruction of priceless specimens of architecture. The castle itself luckily escaped with small injury, but was severely scorched in 1871. To-day it stands completely restored, and the background of the noble walls make a fitting frame for the most remarkable pageant of modern times.

Scotland's National Drink.

One of the grossest misconceptions from which Scotland suffers in the south is that her national drink is, and always has been, whisky. But this is just as untrue—neither more or less—as that the national garb of Scotland is the kilt. Whisky, like the kilt, is a purely Celtic or Highland product, and up to the middle of the eighteenth century it was just as unfamiliar in the Lowlands as the clan tartans. It was only after the '45 that the Highlanders began to settle in the Lowlands, and bring their whisky with them, but before that the national drink of the Lowlanders, who constitute the bulk and backbone of the nation, had been ale. Tam o' Shanter and Souter Johnny got "roarin' fou"—not on whisky, but on strong beer.

The night drave on wi' sangs and clatter,
And ay the ale was growing better.

WOMAN'S WORLD

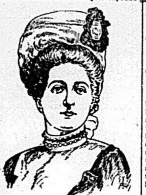
THE WOMAN WHO SPENDS.

Duties Which She Owes to the Woman Who Works.

Mrs. Frederick Nathan of New York, a woman of wealth, who works along philanthropic lines, speaking of the duties the woman who spends owes to the woman who works, says:

The women who spend are in large measure responsible for much of the existing distress and evil surrounding the women who work. For centuries women have worked, but not as wage earners. They used to work in cottages, surrounded by plenty of sunshine and air. Today, through the invention of cumbersome machinery, work has been taken out of the home and put into factories and workshops. Work for women in this new environment has become more monotonous, and the nervous strain is terrible.

Now, in what way can the women who spend alleviate the conditions surrounding the women who work? There seems to be little necessity to expound upon the economic truths relating to the laws of supply and demand. All modern economists agree that there is never a supply of anything until the demand of the purchasers be felt. Therefore let the women who spend (and women are largely the purchasers of the household) insist that whatever they buy be made under conditions wholesome to both the purchaser and the producer.



MRS. FREDERICK NATHAN.

If the women who spend patronize stores where women who work receive notoriously low wages, are not paid for overtime work, are given no vacations with pay and no half holiday in summer and are not even permitted to sit down when not occupied, then they are helping to keep down the standard of competition to a low level and are discouraging those merchants who are trying to raise the standard.

Many philanthropic women who have larger incomes than they care to spend on themselves will give away large sums of money in order to provide funds for working girls who have broken down physically, mentally and morally, yet had these women in providing for their own wants taken the precaution to spend their money in such a way as to create favorable conditions for working girls the workers in all probability would not have broken down and would not have required any aid.

Instead of organizing working girls' vacation societies let us give working girls vacations with pay. If there were no cruelty enacted toward animals and children there would be no necessity for the formation of societies to prevent cruelty. If there were no injustice dealt to the poor and helpless there would be no work for the Legal Aid society. We should hang our heads in very shame because of our need for so many charitable institutions; we should not feel that they are a commendable source of pride.—New York Herald.

Don't Save Silk.

It is a mistake to try to "save" a taffeta silk petticoat. Many women of moderate means will buy such a silk skirt and then keep it to be worn on special or rare occasions, but they might just as well wear it often, for the silk will wear out just the same hanging in the closet or lying in the bureau drawer as it will when worn. One girl had a very beautiful pink skirt presented to her and, not wishing to wear it just at the time, put it away until spring. At the end of three months she took out her skirt for wear with a new frock and found it full of tiny holes and cracks. As it is impossible to prevent this, even in the best silk, the most sensible plan is to wait until you need a taffeta skirt and, once bought, get the wear out of it at once. Carefully used, it will last through a season.—New York Press.

The "Fit" of Clothes.

More and more it is becoming absolutely essential in order to be well gowned, says Harper's Bazar, to have every detail of dress attended to, no matter how simple or inexpensive the materials. First of all, the gown must fit well, and here is one reason why the Frenchwoman is better dressed than the American. Every article of her lingerie fits well. Of course lingerie is less expensive in France than in America, but even here it can be made at home at much less cost than if bought at the shops. With a good pattern and the expenditure of some time the best results can be obtained at very small cost.

To Develop the Neck.

You will notice that when your shoulders are stooped and brought forward the bones in your neck are much more prominent than when the chest is held high, the head is kept erect and the shoulders fall back naturally. Place the finger ends on the shoulders, bringing the elbows out straight in front, then send the elbows round in wide circles. When you have the elbows back as far as possible drop the hands slowly, and the bones in your neck will have disappeared. A fat neck is not beautiful. The beautiful neck is the slender one—well shaped and with a regal, lovely poise. That may be acquired.

A Valuable Poultice.

Croup, pneumonia and diphtheria poultice: Take a piece of old flannel to fit chest and baste one layer of cotton batting on it, then spread this quite thickly with a layer of best lard, then sprinkle lightly with grated nutmeg; place in oven for a moment and then apply to patient's chest, pinning securely with small safety pins to undervest. This must not be removed for two weeks. It is said this poultice has been used with success by many prominent doctors.

Teething Children.

An excellent gruel for children that are cutting teeth is made as follows: Tie a quarter of a pound of wheat flour in a thick cloth. Place it in one quart of water and boil for three hours. Remove the cloth and expose the flour to the air until it has become hard and dry. When wanted grate from it one tablespoonful, put it into a pint of new milk. Place over the fire and stir until it comes to a boil. Then add a pinch of salt and a tablespoonful of cold water.

Bath Bags.

The invaluable bath bags are made by filling a thick muslin or thin calico bag with two-thirds of bran or oatmeal, bits of soap and orris root, just to give a sweet savor. Let this soak in the water before entering the bath, and make a splendid lather all over the skin. If you use this only two or three times a week it will make the body smooth. But each bag is good only twice using. Once sour it does more harm than good.

A Darning Help.

Try filling up a big hole with a bit of coarse net when you are darning the stockings of the young hopeful of the family, who goes through stockings with a superb disregard of the wearisome stitches somebody else has to take in consequence of his carelessness. Then darn back and forth, taking your stitches in and out of the net, yet darning as closely as you do ordinarily. He'll have trouble to wear that darn out.

Launder With Clean Apron.

Never allow your laundress to iron unless she is wearing a clean apron or a clean cotton dress. An old cloth dress is bound to be dirty if not germful, and no particular woman wants her clean underwear or table linen to be rubbed against such a dress as the woman stands at the board at work. However, this is exactly what happens if you are not careful to observe and insist on such cleanliness.

The Pincushion.

No pin tray, however expensive or beautiful it may be, can take the place of the pincushion either as an ornament or an article of use. The tray is easily upset, and when it is upset so are the pins and so are we. The pins go in a dozen directions. The cushion is more staple. It may accidentally be turned upside down, but the pins stick and our tempers remain unruffled.

Asking For an Invitation.

If you have been asked to a wedding and an unexpected guest arrives a day or two before it is perfectly good taste to call on the family of the bride and ask for permission to bring her along. But it would be the worst taste in the world to allow your friend to send a gift. The sending of a gift is the token of friendship and should be confined to friends.

Tincture of Benzoin.

You can make your own tincture of benzoin if you wish, but it is much easier to purchase it of your druggist. Take one part of pulverized benzoin and cover it with five parts of 86 degrees alcohol. Allow the mixture to stand for eight days, stirring occasionally, then filtering carefully.

The Skirt Band.

When a skirt band keeps wearing out and much strain is put on the band a piece of leather cut from an old glove should be stitched down the back of the placket and to the inside of the waistband. This will keep it firm and make a good foundation for sewing on hooks and eyes.

Bed For the Baby.

A lady remarks that, old fashioned though it may sound, there is no better bed for a baby than a bag of clean oat chaff laid in the bascinet, which should be emptied, aired and refilled once a month. This, she says, is cheap and clean and sweet.

Never hang one garment over another on the same hook. To do this would take all the freshness out of the undergarment, and it would not improve the upper one.

To remove stains made by iodine soak the stains in cold water for half an hour and then cover thickly with common soda.

If horseradish is to be grated the simplest way is to put it through the meat chopper.

Turpentine will remove tar from any kind of fabric.

THE TEETHING PERIOD.

It Does Not Necessarily Mean Sickness For the Baby.

The belief that cutting the first teeth means illness for infants is an exploded theory, according to the head physician of the Nursery and Child's hospital, who declares that there is no more reason why a healthy young child should be sick when teething than at any other time, says the New York Telegram.

"It has always been a subject of curious interest to me why the majority of mothers, and other persons, too, should think that a baby must have all kinds of ailments when getting its first teeth," he said. "Aside from being irritable, having a slight rise in temperature at morning or night, occasional disorders with the stomach and the desire to be constantly chewing on something, the normal child in good condition should be free from illness while cutting its teeth. The ailments in nine cases out of ten attributed to teething are caused from some other source, and for that reason a little one who appears to be weak and really indisposed should be placed under the care of a physician for treatment.

"There is no exact period at which teeth should begin to show. Some babies have them sooner than others, but if none has appeared at the end of six months I would advise a mother to consult a doctor, for by that time the normal infant should have had several. The easiest and most natural way for them to come is in pairs, though I have known many youngsters to get four at a time."

MARRIAGE.

The Development of Woman and the Passing of Matrimony.

It is woman's refusal to marry and woman's restiveness in marriage—for the immense majority of our divorces are asked for by the wife—which so alarm us today.

For both these facts there is the same explanation—the character of our women is changing faster than the character of matrimony. The women of the past were as children compared with the women of today.

Some few great names there always were to show what was possible to the sex, but the majority were ignorant, weak and absolutely isolated. Today in America our women are as well educated as men in many cases, often even more so, and then wide reading and general acquaintance with facts of life, past and present, together with rapidly increasing organization among them, give them a character and courage previously unknown.

This change is not, as some thinkers claim, a morbid demand for masculine power and privilege. It has nothing to do with sex. It is the development of the humanness in women.—Charlotte Perkins Gilman in Harper's Bazar.

SHE'S A WISE WOMAN—

Who keeps in mind that a little credit is a dangerous thing.

Who can tell the difference between her first child and a genius.

Who has learned the paradox that to have joy one must give it.

Who is able to mend both her husband's clothes and his ways.

Who appreciates that the largest room in the house is that left for self improvement.

Who acknowledges the allowance made her by her husband by making allowances for him.

Who manages to keep not only her house and her temper, but her servants and her figure as well.

Who can at once distinguish between the laugh of amusement and the one meant to show off a dimple.

Who gets off a trolley car the right way, though she runs the risk of being arrested as a man in disguise.—Watson's Magazine.

Gardens For Children.

It is an exceptional child who would not value flowers and a garden of its own. Boys and girls alike are delighted with the very idea of possessing a bit of ground where they can "plant things" and watch them grow. The workers in city missions know that even the most unpromising specimens of slum childhood can be won by flowers, and among children of more favored classes the moral influence of flowers is a force, though it is not recognized or extended as it might be. People living in villages or small cities usually have some ground around their homes in which they can set apart a place for the children's garden. The love of nature fostered by this garden making will prove a constant source of pleasure through a child's life. The cultivation of habits of close observation and the knowledge of useful and of harmful plants thus gained is sure to be of future value.—Woman's Home Companion.

Sponges.

Many people cling to sponges, although they are not supposed to be as sanitary as rough washcloths, because the sponges cannot be boiled. If properly cared for sponges are really quite sanitary. Only one person should use one sponge, and the sponge when not in use should be kept hanging in the air. An authority advises washing a sticky sponge in milk, which process wonderfully renews it.

Method in the House.

There is no "luck" in housekeeping, and the woman who trusts to the fickle god to help her out will get herself into trouble speedily. Method will accomplish much for a weak woman, but haphazard housekeeping will wear out the nerves of the strongest woman living. It means waste and slatternly work and unhappiness for all concerned.

THE REASON FOUND.

Why Britons Win Yankee Girls For Wives—Englishmen Are More Devoted, Says Harmsworth.

The reason why so many American girls choose English husbands is that the Englishman is "more devoted and knows how to treat her better than does the American, was the explanation recently given at the Hotel St. Regis, in New York, by Alfred Harmsworth, Lord Northcliffe, who arrived on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, says The New York American.

"The most interesting thing about America is her women—at least that is what Englishmen think, and we ought to know, for we have in London the very flower of American womanhood—women of your country who have married our men and who never come over to this side unless it may be to make 'mamma' a brief visit or to see how the States have grown," said the great English editor.

"The American girl likes our men better than she does the American. It's because he knows better how to treat her.

"I have studied the American girl, not a little bit, and it is after much careful observation that I have come to the conclusion that our men make better husbands for the American girl than your own men. The American woman likes him better. What the American woman likes—what any woman likes—is to be adored—to be made much of—to be worshipped, in truth—and that is where the Englishman has the advantage over the American. He adores, worships, lavishes his affection on his wife.

"The American calls us a stupid lot. He loves to tell the American girl those stories, referring to the slow-going wits of the average Englishman. The Englishman may be stupid—I don't think so—but if he is his stupidity is of a sort that appeals to the American girl so much that she marries him. Let the American man deny that! I can prove what I say by statistics—actual figures.

"Why, do you know, it has got to be so that when an American girl marries an American the public is truly grateful. The newspapers devote columns to the event. They speak of her common sense and of her—I was about to say heroism, but I will modify that—of her fine love of home and things of the sort. That in itself proves my statement. The American girl who through choice and of her own volition marries the American is so singularly rare that she needs be publicly commended for her noble act!"

"You say these conditions exist, Lord Northcliffe. Why is it so?" was asked.

"For many reasons. I have told you one—that the Englishman worships his wife. Then while the American is busy making money for his wife the Englishman is busy making love to his. In the last analysis a woman prefers a man who makes love to the one who can make money. The American woman is indeed fortunate. She has the advantage of having fathers who make money, and she marries the Englishman who makes love to her.

"Your men, I take it, are too much in a hurry in their love affairs. They 'rush' a girl. That word is strictly American in the sense I have just used it and very apropos of the methods your men pursue. The Englishman never rushes in anything, particularly not in matters that affect his heart. A woman is flattered by the time he takes in his lovemaking. To the American girl used to the other sort of man it is refreshing and has in it a subtle flattery, I dare say, that eventually wins her over. Your men 'rush' the poor creature to death, and all sentiment goes a-glimmering.

"American men may make fairly good lovers before marriage; they may shower their fiancees with American Beauties, they may stuff sweets down their pretty throats, they may provide all sorts of entertainment, but it is so palpably lavished upon the girl that she becomes surfeited with the purely material demonstrations of the man's affections.

"He forgets to tell her that he loves her; in his businesslike way he recalls the day when he honored her with the avowal of his affection and he looks with pride upon the four carat solitaire or the band of brilliants which gleam upon her third right hand finger, and like that famous 'ad' he thinks 'nuf ced.'

"But with us it is different. A man is more devoted after he is married than before, and while he does not buy roses by the ton, he does not forget the bunch of violets or the roadside buttercup, it might be, of which he has heard his wife express herself as fond on some happy occasion in the past—an occasion of which she may have forgotten until reminded of it through the thoughtfulness and sentiment of her husband.

"Those are some of the reasons why our men make American women better husbands. Your women are filled with sentiment; they must have flattery, must have affection, and when the American gets to taking too much for granted the 'stupid' Englishman comes in and flies off with the Yankee bride."

Shakespeare and Servian Politics.

A striking scene was witnessed, our correspondent says, at the performance of "King Richard III." at Belgrade. In the ghost scene a whisper ran round the house that the presentment of Hastings resembled the late Gen. Petrovit, who was murdered together with King Alexander. And in the monologue of the affrighted Richard the words, "I am a villain," were hailed with such frantic applause that the actor was unable to proceed. The whole audience from pit to gallery was in a state of indescribable emotion, and it was rumored that the piece will not be allowed to be given again.—St. James' Gazette.

Bruce the Explorer.

James Bruce, the eighteenth century traveler and explorer, owed his discovery of the source of the Blue Nile to his ability to amaze the Abyssinians. He had some reputation as an astrologer, but his cure of smallpox was more of a feather in his cap as a medicine man. His firing of a tallow candle through a table established his fame still higher as a worker of miracles. His taming of savage horses and shooting of kites on the wing were the final manoeuvres which opened the way to the river to whose discoverey he had dedicated his life.

An Air of Distinction

Have you ever noticed how distinguished you feel when you have on fine, shapely, well-made clothes?

There's a certain tone about good clothes that you feel the minute you put them on and that's what you'll find in our Suits and Overcoats at $12, $15, $18 and $20

Part of it is good fabric, part of it is good tailor work and part is the touch that the designer gives.

The $7 and $8 Suits have some of it, but those from $12 up are full of distinction.

The making of our fine garments is practically the same as custom work, except that they are ready to wear.

The hand-made collars and hand-worked button holes gives the smart fit and finish that you expect only in custom work as a rule.

Forget all previous opinions of "ready-made" Clothing and come prepared to get some new ideas when you see the character of the clothes we sell.

We'll give you an "eye-opener" as to securing smart clothes and then you can decide for yourself whether it is worth while to pay your tailor as much more.

GOOD AUTHORITY

Dr. George M. Thomas (a leading American Specialist) in a recent lecture, cites various ailments thought by many leading oculists to be due to eye-strain, viz., neurasthenia, hysteria, melancholia, nervous dyspepsia, vertigo, insomnia, migraine, epilepsy, chorea, hay fever, car and sea sickness, and also with less definite symptoms, faintness, nervous irritability, weariness, mental confusion, stammering, etc., in fact that there is a morbid structure, with eye-strain as the corner stone which must be removed ere health can be re-established. Dr. Simeon Snell in The Lancet, very aptly states that eye-strain produces a large number and variety of headaches and at times in addition, mental depression, nausea, indigestion, insomnia, giddiness, vertigo, etc., also that vision may be meanwhile excellent, in spite of the above symptoms, and that in those cases where vision is impaired in a majority of them. it is a small amount of error; we like to quote these high authorities as they corroborate our daily experience, and the effect of our Repression Glasses in these cases brings about marvellous curative results. Kleingbeil Trial Now Going On.

PRISONER, RE-INDICTED, WAS ARRAIGNED AND PLEADED NOT GUILTY WITH GREAT SHOW OF EMOTION—LOOKS LIKE A COMING BATTLE OF MEDICAL EXPERTS.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The Kleingbeil case, which was to have been taken up this morning, was not mentioned when the court opened, but the civil case of Switzer vs. Doyle, which was begun last night, was proceeded with.

Kleingbeil, who has been acting as cook in the jail, has been relieved from that duty. For the past few days he has shown the effects of the nervous strain under which he is laboring, and has been short-tempered and decidedly irascible. Otherwise he seems to have stood his confinement well. It looked this morning as though the case would be a conflict of medical experts, something like the Lloyd case at the last Assizes. The Intelligencer was told that not only would local medical men be placed in the witness box, but also Dr. McConnell, of the Kingston Asylum staff, and Drs. Johnston, Bruce Smith and Clarke, of Toronto.

BEFORE THE GRAND JURY AGAIN

Evidently the authorities changed their minds in regard to the Kleingbeil case and having the prisoner tried on the indictment brought in at the last Assizes, for this morning the case was submitted to the present Grand Jury, who were in court when the proceedings opened, and retired to their room at 10 o'clock to consider the case. There were one or two errors in chronology, it was said, which the Crown wished to have corrected.

FINDS A TRUE BILL.

At 10.40 the Grand Jury re-entered the court room and announced that they had found a true bill for murder against Ferdinand Kleingbeil.

It was stated in the court room that the trial would begin in a few minutes.

At 11 o'clock there were four local doctors in the court room, namely, Drs. Farley, Boyce, Clinton and MacColl. Shortly afterwards the visiting experts came in, and there was considerable hand-shaking among the disciples of Aesculapius.

At 12.30 Kleingbeil was brought into court. He wore his medal of the Austro-Prussian war, and looked exceedingly well, much better, in fact, than at the preliminary investigation before Magistrate Flint last spring. Kleingbeil took a seat in the prisoner's dock to await the end of the civil case then in progress.

Many curious eyes rested on the old German, who seemed calm and serene, and quite at peace with the world.

PLEADS NOT GUILTY.

At 12.40 the new indictment was read to the prisoner, who, when he heard the words, "did unlawfully kill and murder Wilhelmina Kleingbeil," broke down and began to weep. He pleaded "Not guilty," in a broken voice, and declared he was ready for his trial.

The court then adjourned till 1.45.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

At 1.50 the prisoner was brought into court, and the Judge arrived a minute later.

Steps were at once taken to empanel a jury, with the following result:

THE KLEINGBEIL JURY.

Thos. Wood.
Ernest Mouck, Belleville.
Alex. Morton, Rawdon.
Nelson McCutcheon.
Patrick Levesque, Hungerford.
Geo. W. Latta, Thurlow.
James White, Madoc.
William Andrews, Belleville.
Noble E. Clark, Tyendinaga.
Percy Millard.
George Ashley, Belleville.
William Lush, Hungerford.

There was some disagreement between the Crown Prosecutor and Mr. Porter in regard to the seat next the Jury box, which Mr. Arnoldi thought he should have. Mr. Porter would not give up possession, and the Judge would not order him to do so.

Thos Montgomery, an absent petit juror, was fined $5 by the Judge.

The defence challenged 17 jurors and the Crown 2.

While the jury was being charged the prisoner again broke down and wept copiously.

THE CROWN PROSECUTOR'S ADDRESS.

Mr. Arnoldi began his address to the jury at 2.50. A murder trial, he said was a most momentous occasion. There must be no undue pressure on the jury. Strict justice must prevail. The Crown Prosecutor very calmly and dispassionately laid the case before the jury. The prisoner, he said, had always been a man of peace, and had always, in his business, been assisted by his wife.

Here the prisoner broke down and wept again.

Continuing, the Crown Prosecutor told of how, six years ago, Mrs. Kleingbeil, the dead woman, had been stricken with paralysis, and practically lost the use of one arm and one leg. The lamentable occurrences of last spring were related by Mr. Arnoldi.

The Assizes.

Wright vs. O'Hara.—This was the first case upon the docket and occupied the attention of the court until late yesterday afternoon. It was an action for damages for slander. The parties reside in the Township of Madoc and the plaintiff charged the defendant, Mrs. O'Hara, with having uttered slanderous statements in regard to his daughter and afterwards refusing to sign an apology.

The defence was that, having heard the slanderous statement, Mrs. O'Hara went immediately and told the parents what she had heard.

The jury, after being out about three-quarters of an hour, brought in a verdict for the defendant. S. Masson for plaintiff; E. G. Porter and A. A. McDonald for the defendant.

SWITZER VS. DOYLE.

The case of Switzer vs. Doyle, an alleged slander case, occupied the attention of the court all the morning. The jury, after being out nearly four hours, came in and said they could not agree. Whereupon they were discharged. Mr. Northrup for plaintiff; Mr. Porter for defendant.

The York Loan

JOSEPH PHILLIPS WILL BE ARRAIGNED TO-DAY AND ASKED TO PLEAD.

Toronto, Oct. 3. — Although Joseph Phillips, former president of the York Loan and Savings Company, will be arraigned before Judge Winchester this morning on the two indictments preferred against him by the Grand Jury at the Court of General Sessions, the trial will not be proceeded with to-day, and the defendant will simply be called upon to plead. The charges against him are stealing $2,003, being the amount of a cheque on the Liszt Piano Company's account with the Bank of Montreal, alleged to have been applied in the purchase of a house on Macdonell Avenue, and, secondly, conspiracy in connection with York Loan affairs. The proceedings will be merely formal. The liquidators of the York Loan and Savings Company are finding their efforts considerably hampered by the fact that hundreds of shareholders are still withholding their stock certificates and books. Although the liquidators at first decided to keep back all statements of assets and liabilities until the shareholders books were all in, it is possible that in view of the difficulty in getting in these books an interim statement may be presented. Before disposing of the York Loan property in the Roncesvalles Avenue district, the liquidators are awaiting the advent of a car line along that thoroughfare.

A Big Dividend

Toronto, Oct. 30. — Less than two weeks ago the directors of the Hudson Bay Mining Company declared a dividend of 1,000 per cent. to stockholders. On Friday the directors met and decided to declare another dividend, excelling the previous one by 500 per cent., or a total of 1,500 per cent., or $15 on each $1 of paid-up stock.

This is the company which disposed of a small section of its holdings, now known as the Silver Queen property. The Hudson Bay company is still owner of upwards of 360 acres of property in the very centre of the Cobalt district. The original and present owners of the shares of this corporation were the pioneers of the Northern Ontario district. They underwent many privations in entering this new country, but if the present prospects hold out every one of them will be classed as many-times millionaires.

PHILHARMONIC ORGANIZES

The Philharmonic Society met last evening in the Council Chamber, and organized for the ensuing year. There were a large number of members present. Mr. C. H. Vermilyea, president, occupied the chair, and Mr. W. A. A. Chown acted as secretary pro tem.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

President — C. H. Vermilyea.
Vice-Presidents — F. E. O'Flynn, D. Price, W. H. Spooner, W. A. A. Chown.
Secretary—F. B. Hudson.
Treasurer—Dr. O. A. Marshall.
Conductor—V. P. Hunt.
Accompanist—Mrs. (Col.) Campbell.
Organist—W. H. Spooner.
Advisory Committee — S. Burrows, M. C. Gordon, D. A. Cameron, W. B. Riggs, J. T. Burns, T. Blackburn, T. P. Brown.
Ladies' Executive — Mrs. A. Ray, Miss Mary Yeomans, Miss Graham, Miss Mackie, Mrs. M. Sprague, Mrs. V. P. Hunt, Mrs. M. C. Gordon, Miss Elliott, Miss B. G. Price, Mrs. James Grant.

Practice will commence regularly on Tuesday evening next.

The matter of a hall for practice was left in the hands of a special committee composed of Mr. C. H. Vermilyea and Mr. T. Blackburn.

RE CHURCH FOR CONCERT.

A special committee composed of D. Price, W. A. A. Chown, and J. T. Burns was appointed to confer with the trustees of Bridge St. Church with reference to securing the church for the concert at a date to be arranged.

Messrs. V. P. Hunt and W. H. Spooner made a few congratulatory remarks, and the society then adjourned.

He Is Popular In Midland.

A Midland, Ont., paper of recent date, has a lengthy article on the work of the Y.M.C.A. in that town, and makes the following remarks about the gentleman who will shortly take charge of the Association work in this city:

The Belleville Y.M.C.A. has extended a unanimous call to Mr. Hess to become their General Secretary. Mr. Hess has had the matter under consideration for several days, and has handed in his resignation to the Directors of the local Association.

Mr. Hess has spent six years in charge of the Association here, coming when it was in its infancy. During his term of service, which has been a most faithful one, the Association has grown and developed year by year, until it stands to-day second to none north of Toronto as far as equipment and good management are concerned. Upon whom does the largest measure of credit fall? The answer we give to this is upon Mr. J. L. Hess, the General Secretary, who has earnestly, patiently and faithfully discharged the duties that have been yearly growing upon him. The directors are up against a proposition not easy to face. If they cannot retain the services of the present secretary, another man will have to be secured, and it is doubtful if they can obtain one that will satisfactorily fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Hess, if he is allowed to go.

Death at the Hospital

A young man, Edward C. Garlock, died yesterday afternoon at the hospital from an attack of typhoid fever. Deceased, who was 23 years of age, was a native of Sodus, N.Y., where the parents reside. He had been in the city for some time. The remains, after being prepared for burial, were to-day taken by relatives to Sodus for burial.

Russian Workmen Permit Manifesto Anniversary to Pass.

Czar Issues Ukase Granting Full Religious Freedom to "Old Believers," But Doukhobors and Standists Are Illegal, as They Refuse to Do Military Service—Terrorists Kill Policeman—Eight Robbers Taken.

St. Petersburg, Oct. 31.—The first anniversary of the proclamation of the manifesto giving a constitution to Russia, passed in undisturbed quiet. Disorder and bloodshed fortunately were avoided. Workmen complied absolutely with orders and abstained from any demonstration.

The Putiloff Iron Works' employes worked as usual, in obedience to orders from labor headquarters. These works are the heart of the labor movement.

Disquieting signs were observed near the works last week and yesterday an adequate force of men was stationed near by to cope with any emergency. The men of a score of smaller factories had the day off, but work was performed in a majority of the shops.

Several bands of black hundreds, armed with staves, paraded in a remote street, but there were no collisions with them, nor have there been any conflicts between the workmen and the public.

The Czar's Ukase.

At noon a special edition of The Official Gazette, containing the imperial ukase granting full religious freedom to the "old believers" was issued, the preamble of which is as follows:

"To guarantee to all Russian subjects liberty of faith and public worship according to the dictates of their conscience, we issued a ukase April 30, 1905. In continuance of this task of love and peace we deem it good to establish rules and regulations governing the internal organization of the 'old believers' and other dissident sects of the Holy Orthodox Church, charging the ministry of the interior at the same time to elaborate a similar law for the sects issuing from other Christian confessions. With trust in a beneficent Providence we believe that these measures will serve to strengthen the ties of loyalty by which the 'old believers' have been bound for centuries to the throne and fatherland and enhance the greatness of our general mother, the Holy Orthodox Church."

Religious Freedom.

According to the law, any dissident sect numbering fifty persons, whose aims are not immoral, or having tenets like refusal to do military service (the Doukhobors and Standists are illegal) can apply for and shall receive permission to organize churches, conduct services, build schools and elect clergy who shall be exempted from military service and be entitled to wear vestments and perform the baptism, marriage and other sacraments and keep registers of birth, marriages and deaths of equal authority with the official records of the Orthodox priests.

Introduces Civil Marriage.

The new law introduces an important innovation in the form of civil marriage, designed for the sects having no clergy, but of which non-members can easily take advantage, enabling thousands of persons, who on account of their objection to a religious rite and the absence of a civil ceremony, have lived together unmarried, to assume the legal tie and legitimatize their children. This law is of special importance to the Mariavists, the Polish Schismatics from the Roman Catholic Church, whose numbers are rapidly growing on the German frontier.

Terrorists Kill Policeman.

Warsaw, Oct. 31.—A band of terrorists shot and killed a policeman here last night. The streets were patroled by cavalry yesterday, and detachments of artillery were posted at strategic points. The police ordered house owners, under threats of arrest, to display flags during the day and illuminations at night.

Eight Robbers Executed.

St. Petersburg, Oct. 31.—Eight persons arrested here in connection with the robbery of $188,826 from Cashier Hermann of the custom house, Oct. 27, were tried by court-martial and executed yesterday.

Conductor Attacked.

Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., Oct. 31.—John Hawkshaw, conductor on the Algoma Central, was attacked by Frank Pietagot while on a train. Pietagot was under the influence of liquor, and the conductor told him he would have to move to another car. Pietagot objected, and when Hawkshaw tried to force him he drew a revolver and fired two shots. One bullet passed through his own arm, but the conductor escaped uninjured.

Alex. Warden Resigns.

Toronto, Oct. 31.—The resignation of the treasurership of the Presbyterian Church by Alexander Warden, which has been announced, is stated by those familiar with the situation to be due to Mr. Warden's having secured a better opportunity for advancement in the business world.

DEAD NUMBER SIXTY.

Fifty-Two Bodies Claimed and Seven Unaccounted For.

Atlantic City, N. J., Oct. 31.—With all of the recovered bodies identified, and seven persons reported missing, the authorities and railroad officials were yesterday certain that the number killed on Sunday in the drawbridge disaster in the West Jersey Seashore Electric Railroad will not exceed 60.

Fifty-two bodies have been claimed, two of those placed among the missing are known to be dead, and five are still unaccounted for.

These seven victims are believed to be wedged beneath the second passenger coach, which is held fast in the muddy bottom of the Thoroughfare.

Coroner Haskill, who has been conducting a rigid enquiry since Sunday night, was yesterday preparing for the inquest, which is to begin on Thursday. He anticipates an unusually long inquest, and thinks that it may be a week or more before a verdict is reached.

Later.—The bodies of Mrs. Paul Feisburg, Mrs. Selina Johnston and Mrs. Sarah Miller were recovered from under the third car. When the workmen were trying to lift it from the water the bodies worked loose.

Cars In Perfect Order.

New York, Oct. 31—The Pennsylvania Railway issued a statement yesterday to the effect that after a thorough examination of every theory advanced as the cause of the wreck at Atlantic City on Sunday, no explanation has been found. The trucks of the cars were intact; the bridge and the mechanism used in moving the draw were in perfect shape; the rails were exactly in place.

BUFFALO BILL MISSING.

Fears That He May Have Been Lost In Recent Blizzard.

Chicago, Oct. 31.—A despatch to The Chronicle from Omaha, Neb., says: "Fears are entertained for the safety of William F. Cody, "Buffalo Bill," and his party of sixteen, who left Cody, Wyoming, on a hunting trip in the Big Horn Mountains, Oct. 14, and who, it is feared, may have been lost in the blizzard which swept over the Rockies a week ago.

Included in the party are Col. Stanley of Liverpool, England, and three other Englishmen.

A letter was received at Cody, Wyoming, last week, from Cody's camp, which was two day's journey from the town, stating that the members of the party were enjoying themselves, and expected to return about Nov. 1. After that the storm came on and nothing has been heard from the party since.

CENSURES RAILWAY.

Verdict In the Case of Harry Clark Killed Near Cookston.

Hamilton, Oct. 31.—Coroner Balfe's jury last night returned the following verdict, after an enquiry into the circumstances:

"That Harry Clark, G. T. R. foreman, came to his death near Cookston, on the morning of Oct. 25, through a collision between engines 338 and 666, on the G. T. Railway, and that Engineed Jones of 666 disobeyed orders in stopping his engine when he had orders to go to Lynden, and that the G. T. R. officials were negligent in not calling medical aid and providing an ambulance with more despatch."

The evidence went to show that when Clark was brought to Hamilton he was kept at the station about 20 minutes before removal to the hospital.

Conservative Call to Arms.

Winnipeg, Oct. 31.—At the annual meeting of the Young Conservative Club last night a strong resolution was passed calling for a big general convention of the Conservative party, to be held in Winnipeg as soon as possible. The feeling of the meeting was strongly in favor of holding a convention to thoroughly re-organize and prepare for the next federal election.

Minister Borden Rebuked.

Kingston, Oct. 31.—The Kingston Reform Association last evening, reelected John McDonald Mowat president. The recent appointment of Major Shannon, a Conservative, to the Militia Department, was under review and Sir Frederick Borden received scathing criticism for allowing Tory officers at headquarters to run his Department.

Defects In Rifles.

Ottawa, Oct. 31.—Enquiry of the Mounted Police Department elicits the information that minor defects have been discovered in the mechanism of the Ross rifles recently issued to the force in the west. As a result the arms are being recalled, in order that this defect may be made good.

Catarrh of the Stomach

A PLEASANT, SIMPLE, BUT SAFE AND EFFECTUAL CURE FOR IT.

COSTS NOTHING TO TRY.

Catarrh of the stomach has long been considered the next thing to incurable. The usual symptoms are a full or bloating sensation after eating, accompanied sometimes with sour or watery risings, a formation of gases, causing pressure on the heart and lungs, and difficult breathing, headaches, fickle appetite, nervousness and a general played out, languid feeling.

There is often a foul taste in the mouth, coated tongue, and if the interior of the stomach could be seen it would show a slimy, inflamed condition.

The cure for this common and obstinate trouble is found in a treatment which causes the food to be readily, thoroughly digested before it has time to ferment and irritate the delicate mucous surfaces of the stomach. To secure a prompt and healthy digestion is the one necessary thing to do and when normal digestion is secured the catarrhal condition will have disappeared.

According to Dr. Harlanson, the safest and best treatment is to use after each meal a tablet composed of Diastase, Aseptic Pepsin, a little Nux, Golden Seal and Fruit Acids. These tablets can now be found at all drug stores under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and not being a patent medicine can be used with perfect safety and assurance that healthy appetite and thorough digestion will follow their regular use after meals.

Mr. R. S. Workman, Chicago, Ill., writes: "Catarrh is a local condition resulting from a neglected cold in the head, whereby the lining membrane of the nose becomes inflamed and the poisonous discharge therefrom passing backward into the throat, reaches the stomach, thus producing catarrh of the stomach. Medical authorities prescribed for me for three years for catarrh of stomach without cure, but to-day I am the happiest of men after using only one box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I cannot find appropriate words to express my good feeling. I have found flesh, appetite and sound rest from their use."

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the safest preparation, as well as the simplest and most convenient remedy for any form of indigestion, Catarrh of Stomach, biliousness, sour stomach, heartburn and bloating after meals.

UTES TO JOIN CHEYENNES.

Indians on Warpath Becoming Bolder—Won't Go Back to Utah.

Sheridan, Wyo., Oct. 31.—"We are going to visit Chief White Cow Bull of the Cheyennes at any cost, and will not be taken back to Utah to starve. We would rather die first." is the substance of the answer of Chief Kannapp to the soldiers.

The latest report from the front locates the main Ute band in the vicinity of Moorehead, going rapidly toward the Cheyenne reservation.

Two more troop trains are reported out of Fort Robinson following the first train unloaded at Aravada yesterday morning.

The Indians are becoming more bold. Doc. Spear and E. H. Bottings, who encountered a band of 20 Indians, were fired upon and one of their horses killed. Their camp wagon was looted by another band of Utes.

Settlers near Moorehead, Mont., are sending their women and children to places of safety, and have turned The Spear blacksmith shop into a fort banking the sides and boring loopholes in the log walls.

COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

Toronto Business Men Will Answer to Conspiracy Charge.

Toronto, Oct. 31.—There was little time lost in the Police Court yesterday, over the conspiracy charges laid against a number of business men in connection with certain civic contracts.

In connection with the roofing of St. Lawrence Market, the following were committed for trial:

"Metallic Roofing Co., Albert Ormsby, Thomas Douglas, Asa Matthews, Henry and John Hutson, Alex E. Wheeler, George Duthie.

The following will also stand their trial in the high court in connection with the contract for furniture for the City Hall; Charles Rogers & Sons Co., Limited; Office Specialty Manufacturing Co.; Canadian Office and School Furniture Co.; George N. Reynolds.

The conspiracy charges against the other firms, in other lines, will be heard next Monday.

Those who were committed yesterday will come before the Criminal Assizes, which commence Monday.

SECTIONMAN MURDERED.

Edward Way Found With Crushed Skull and Bullet In Head.

Liverpool, N. S., Oct. 31.—The body of Edward Way of Halifax was found by trainmen on the line of the Halifax and Southwestern Railway Monday night, near Granite Village, 20 miles west of Liverpool.

On examination it was found that the man had been murdered, having been struck back of the ear with a club, crushing the skull. There was a bullet wound in the head.

He was a sectionman on the railway, and it is supposed he was murdered and robbed, as a sum of money he was known to have on his person is missing.

An inquest was held here yesterday morning and the verdict was wilful murder.

TOLMIE WINS.

Succeeds In Downing Inexperienced Mr. McLelland By About 400.

Tara, Oct. 31.—The bye-election in North Bruce to fill the vacancy in the House of Commons, caused by the death of Leonard T. Bland, Conservative, resulted in the return of John Tolmie, Liberal, over Abram McLelland, Conservative, by a majority of nearly 400.

In the general election Mr. Bland had a majority of 107 over J. E. Campbell.

The victor of to-day was the member for West Bruce previous to the general election of 1904. In that year he lost the convention to Mr. Campbell.

He is immensely popular all through the riding, and this largely accounts for his extraordinary run. His opponent was Abram McLelland, a respectable farmer and drover, but woefully inexperienced in things political.

No one expected him to win, but it was not thought Mr. Tolmie's majority would be so decisive. The majorities follow:

FOR TEMPORARY PEACE.

Modus Vivendi Was Arranged With the United States.

London, Oct. 31.—Replying to further questions in the House of Commons yesterday regarding the Newfoundland fisheries question, Mr. Churchill, the Parliamentary Secretary for the Colonial Office, explained that the modus vivendi was a temporary arrangement made with the United States, intended to avoid the occurrence of untoward incidents during the negotiations necessitated by the action taken by the Colonial Government, in spite of the representations of His Majesty's Government.

Ample precedent for the course adopted could be found in the modus vivendi, into which the late Marquis of Salisbury entered, with France, respecting the Newfoundland lobster fisheries.

Foreign Secretary Grey announced that the correspondence with the United States and Newfoundland would be presented to the House as soon as it could be prepared.

DEATH OVERTAKES MINISTER.

Rev. Dr. Hutt Found Dead In His Study—Sad Circumstances.

Ingersoll, Oct. 31.—Shortly before 6 o'clock last night Rev. Dr. E. R. Hutt, for the past 17 years pastor of St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, was found dead seated in a chair in his study.

His sudden death is unusually sad in view of the fact that at 7 o'clock he was to have performed the ceremony at the marriage of his second son, and wedding guests had already arrived.

Dr. Hutt was down town until about 4 o'clock. He had not enjoyed good health for the past couple of years, but there was no outward sign that the end was so near. Death was due to heart disease.

The late Dr. Hutt was in his 55th year, and is survived by widow and five children, three sons and two daughters. He was one of the best known Presbyterian ministers of western Ontario, and was a very clever speaker.

George Lecouteur Held Criminally Responsible For Wife Murder.

Quebec, Oct. 31.—With his face buried in his hands most of the time, Geo. Lecouteur, who killed his wife Saturday morning on the Esplanade, heard the story of his horrible crime related to the coroner and the jury by his daughter, Katherine, yesterday morning, and heard her tell of his ill-treatment of her mother and his jealousy, etc., at the inquest.

After hearing the evidence of several witnesses, the jury rendered a verdict to the effect that his wife was killed maliciously and with premeditation by George Lecouteur, who is held criminally responsible."
